mortgagor and the mortgagee so long as the security subsisted. This being so, the cancellation of the mortgage on the records by Vann, it cannot be doubted, was a fraud upon the rights of Marbury, and the latter's rights remained unaffected as against all parties participating in, or cognizant of, the fraud. But, as between Marbury and the Woodlawn Cemetery Company, the question here presented is whether Marbury's rights are such that they can be asserted against a bona fide purchaser from the mortgagor, who, without notice of the claim of Marbury, has parted with its money relying upon the payment and cancellation of the only claim upon the land disclosed by the record, and which payment was made to, and cancellation made by, the party whom the record showed to be the proper party for such purposes. As we have said, the transfer of the note vested in Marbury no legal title to the land, but simply an equity. The legal title to the conditional estate in the land remained in Vann as fully after the transfer as before. This legal title, it may be, he held in trust for Marbury to the extent of the note held by the latter; but it was a trust not appearing from the mortgage itself, or by any record, but a latent trust, which could not affect the rights of bona fide purchasers, who, in ignorance of its existence, relied on the acts and declarations of the mortgagee within the scope of his apparent powers as legal owner of the mortgage; and any such acts of the mortgagee as would work an estoppel as against him would be equally effective against the holder of a latent equity arising from contract with the mortgagee. Swartz v. Leist, 18 Ohio St. 419.

Without discussing the question further, our conclusion is that Marbury, being a holder of the note as collateral security for an antecedent debt, and the mortgage failing to show that the note was negotiable, and the payment of the entire mortgage debt having been made by Mrs. Moore, and the purchase made by the Woodlawn Cemetery Company, in good faith, without notice by either of the transfer of the note, and in reliance upon the fact that the payment was made, to, and the surrender of the mortgage by, the party whom the record showed was the proper party, and who then represented himself as the owner of the note, and that it was temporarily mislaid, such payment and purchase defeat the right of the transferee, Marbury, to subject the land to the payment of the note, notwithstanding the failure of Mrs. Moore and the officers of the Woodlawn Cemetery Company to require the production and surrender of the note at the time of such payment and purchase. The decree of the chancery court is not in accordance with our conclusion. It is therefore reversed, and a decree will be here rendered denying relief to the complainant in the court below, and dismissing the bill of complaint.

Reversed and rendered.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON.

J. H. ADAMS, Receiver of the Citizens'
National Bank of Spokane Falls,

v.

SPOKANE DRUG CO.

(57 Fed. Rep. 388.)

A receiver of a national bank takes immature notes belonging to the bank subject to the right of the maker to set off against them his deposit account in the bank.

(October 7, 1898.)

ON DEMURRER to an answer pleading set-off in an action upon a promissory note. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. J. H. Adams, in propria persona, in support of the demurrer.

Mr. C. Wellington for defendant, contra.

Hanford, District Judge, delivered the following opinion:

This is an action by a receiver of a national bank upon a promissory note for $5,000, given to and owned by said bank. The answer alleges that the amount of the loan for which said note was given was not actually paid, but was credited by said bank to the defendant as a deposit subject to check; that thereafter the defendant purchased of said bank three bills of exchange on the Chase National Bank of New York, for sums aggregating $3,500, and paid for the same, by checks against said deposit; that the bills of exchange were presented in due course of business, but acceptance thereof was refused, for the reason that the drawer had failed; that, at the time of the suspension of said bank, part of said deposit still remained to the credit of the defendant; that, before the action was commenced, the defendant tendered to the receiver said bills of exchange, and a sum of money equal to the full amount of the principal and interest due on said note, after deducting therefrom the balance of said deposit and the amount of said bills of exchange, with protest fees, and the tender has been made good by bringing said bills of exchange and money into court. The suspension of the bank and appointment of the receiver occurred before the maturity of the note. The case has been argued and submitted upon a demurrer to said answer.

In the case of Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 36 L. ed. 1059, the Supreme Court held that the receiver of a national bank took the assets as a mere trustee, and not as a purchaser for value; that, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, demands and choses in action which belonged to the bank were in his hands, subject to all claims and defenses that might have been interposed as against the bank before the liens of the United States and the general creditors attached; and that there is nothing in the statutes relating to national banks to deprive a customer of an insolvent national bank of the right to set off a debt, or obligation of the bank to him, existing at the time of its failure, against a promissory note which did not become due until after the failure, according to the ordinary rule in equity applicable to cases wherein the reciprocal liabilities of insolvents and others have to be adjusted, and the judgment of the United States circuit court for the southern district of Ohio was reversed for error in sustaining a demurrer to a defense similar to the one pleaded in this case. I should have no difficulty in reaching a satisfactory conclusion, harmonious with the reasoning of that decision, were it not for the fact that in the same opinion the learned chief justice argues that the statute of Ohio, allowing a set-off to be interposed as a defense in an action at law, is not applicable as a rule of practice in the federal courts; and he makes the following emphatic announcement: "We are of the opinion that the circuit court had no power to grant the set-off in question in the suit at law." The reason given is that "legal and equitable claims cannot be blended together in one suit in the circuit courts of the United States, nor are equitable defenses permitted." In England the right to set off a debt due to a defendant from the plaintiff in an action at law is given by Stat. 2 Geo. II. chap. 23, § 13, and made perpetual by 8 Geo. II. chap. 24, § 4. Most of the states of the Union, if not all, have long ago enacted similar laws. We have such a statute in the state of Washington. The practice has prevailed in the courts of this country, state and federal, for so long, and has been so often sanctioned by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the right of a defendant having such a defense to avail himself of it would seem to be firmly established. 2 Parsons, Cont. 734; Partridge v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 578, 21 L. ed. 229; Dushane v. Benedict, 120 U. S. 630, 30 L. ed. 810. In the case last cited, Mr. Justice Gray shows that the Pennsylvania law of set-off has been in force nearly two centuries. In Scott v. Armstrong, the Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the circuit court for not allowing the set-off pleaded by the defendants in that case, and approved the decision of the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania in the case of Yardley v. Clothier, 49 Fed. Rep. 387, which was an action like the one at bar, and in which a similar defense was sustained. Considering what was done, notwithstanding what was said by the supreme court, I feel warranted in following Yardley v. Clothier.

The demurrer is therefore overruled, and, the plaintiff having elected to stand upon his demurrer, a judgment in favor of the defendant for costs will be entered.

NOTE.—As to right to set off against commercial paper in the hands of an assignee, claims against the assignor, see note, to VAN V. MARBURY, ante, 828, 23 L. R. A.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

E. W. BENSON

v.

Jonas HAYWOOD et al., Appts.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The statements in a written assignment of a judgment cannot in the absence of fraud or mistake be contradicted by parol in a proceeding by the judgment debtor to set off against it a cross-judgment held by him against the assignor.

NOTE.—Set-off against judgment in the hands of assignee.

The set-off of judgments, even before it was provided for by statute, was frequently compelled by the courts in their equitable jurisdiction over suitors. And while it was not a matter of strict right the rule was to allow it unless there were sufficient reasons to prevent it. It was generally considered that the right attached as soon as a judgment was entered in favor of each party, and that a subsequent assignee of one of the judgments would be bound by the equity of the set-off.

Although in Gildersleeve v. Burrows, 24 Ohio St. 224, it is questioned whether or not the insolvency of the assignor or other equitable ground must not exist in order to make available a set-off against an assigned judgment.

Yet the courts have not as a rule acted on that suggestion.

The assignee of a judgment takes subject to an existing right of set-off of a cross-judgment. Brislin v. Newhall, 5 Minn. 273.

At least if the assignee has notice of the existence of the cross-judgment. Irvine v. Myers, 6 Minn. 532.

A demand for a set-off prior to the assignment of one of the judgments is not necessary to charge it with the set-off in the hands of an assignee, if the equities had become perfect prior to the assignment. Dimock v. Wilbur, 1 N. Y. Supp. 205.

After a right of set off of judgments has attached it cannot be defeated by the assignment of one of them. McBride v. Fallon, 65 Cal. 301.

If the right to set-off of judgments has become perfect under the statute, it cannot be defeated by the assignment of one of them. Ballinger v. Tarbell, 16 Iowa, 401, 85 Am. Dec. 527.

After the right to set off cross judgments has become fixed, it cannot be defeated by assigning one of the judgments to the attorney. Dingee v. Shears, 29 Hun. 210.

The equity of the assignee of a judgment is subordinate to an existing equity of the judgment debtor to set off judgments which he had obtained against the assignor. Jeffries v. Evans, 6 B. Mon. 119, 43 Am. Dec. 159.

In Graves v. Woodbury, 4 Hill, 559, 40 Am. Dec. 236, the court says that the assignee of a judgment takes it subject to the right to have another judgment existing at the time set off against it, even although he has no notice of such judgment; but it is decided in that case that no judgment existed at the time of the assignment capable of being set off.

The assignee of a judgment takes it subject to the right to set off a cross-judgment existing at the time of the assignment. Brown v. Hendrickson, 30 N. J. L. 239; Chamberlain v. Day, 3 Cow. 853; Hobbs v. Duff, 23 Cal. 586; Filbert v. Hawk, 8 Watts, 443.

In the last case above cited the court explains Ramey's App., 2 Watts, 223, 37 Am. Dec. 301, 15 23 L. R. A.

2. An assignment of a verdict to secure the attorney's compensation does not relieve the judgment to be entered thereon from liability to offset of a judgment then existing in favor of the judgment debtor against the assignor.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court of Buena Vista County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to compel the set-off of certain judgments. Affirmed.

which the set-off was apparently denied, as being one in which the one judgment was assigned before the other was recovered. Filbert v. Hawk, supra.

An assignment of a judgment for costs to the attorney will not prevent the set-off of a judgment in a former action in favor of the opposing party. Yorton v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 62 Wis. 367.

At law a judgment assigned to attorneys to secure costs without any prior agreement to that effect remains subject to set-off on the part of the judgment debtor. Davidson v. Alfaro, 80 N. Y. 600.

The assignee, in satisfaction of a precedent debt, of a bill of costs due a solicitor, takes the same subject to the right of the debtor to set off against it a claim then existing on a judgment against the solicitor. Utica Ins. Co. v. Power, 3 Paige, 365, 3 L. ed. 190.

Where, prior to the assignment of a judgment, the right exists to have another judgment set off against it, the assignee takes subject to such right, especially if he has notice of it; and it is immaterial that the assignment was to secure an antecedently earned attorney's fee. Skinker v. Smith, 48 Mo. App. 91.

If an assignee's lien on a judgment is satisfied, the right to set off an existing judgment against the original judgment creditor will arise and is not defeated by a subsequent assignment of the judgment to secure other indebtedness. Stillwell v. Carpenter, 2 Abb. N. C. 259.

If demands are mutual, a set-off of the judgments acquired on them cannot be defeated by assignment. But the right of an attorney who has made advances may be protected. Hooper v. Brundage, 22 Me. 460.

But it was held that prior to the Connecticut statute of set-off, one of two existing cross-judgments might be assigned so as to defeat the right of set-off. Rumrill v. Huntington, 5 Day, 163.

This case was followed in Benjamin v. Benjamin, 17 Conn. 110, and the same was true with claims which had not passed into judgment. Ripley v. Bull, 19 Conn. 53.

This note will not go into the question of the statutory right to set off executions in the hands of the sheriff, as was the case in Gallaher v. Pendleton, 55 Iowa, 142.

Assignment of verdict.

It has been held that the right to set off judgments cannot be defeated by the assignment of the claim on which the later one is rendered. Johnson v. Taylor, 1 Disney (Ohio) 168.

In Orr v. Spooner, 19 U. C. Q. B. 601, as assignment of a verdict was held to be no obstacle to set off the judgment to be entered on it against another judgment already existing. There was some evidence of an assignment to defeat the set-off, but the decision was not based on this ground but upon the apparent haste of the assignment during a time

Statement by Given, J.:

Plaintiff owns a judgment rendered in his favor against defendant Haywood for $200, drawing 10 per cent interest, and $16.25 costs. Judgment was rendered against plaintiff in favor of Haywood for $187.50, and for $70.95 costs, in another action. Defendant James, as sheriff, holds executions on both judgments, but refuses to offset the lesser against the larger, for the reason that the judgment against plaintiff was assigned to defendants Chapman and Irwin. Plaintiff asks that the judgment against him be credited on the judgment in his favor, and that defendants be enjoined from collecting said judgment against him. Decree was entered offsetting said judgments, except as to costs. Defendants appeal.

Messrs. C. A. Irwin and T. H. Chapman, for appellants:

Code 8097 provides that mutual judgments the executions on which are in the hands of the same officer, may be set off one against the other. Under this section the plaintiff is entitled to relief only upon a showing that the judgments were mutual at the time that suit was brought.

Gallagher v. Pendleton, 55 Iowa, 143, was on that defendant had the right reserved to him to move for a new trial.

But it seems to be elsewhere considered that while the claim is merely in verdict the equity of the cross-judgment does not attach to it so as to defeat an assignment.

The assignment of a verdict together with a judgment to be entered thereon to the attorneys for their services and disbursements in the action gives them an equity superior to that of the defendant to set off a judgment existing in his favor against the assignor at the time the judgment is entered on the verdict. Mackey v. Mackey, 43 Barb. 53.

The assignment of a verdict to the attorney to secure his charge for service, frees the judgment when entered of any right to set off an opposing judgment then existing. Ferguson v. Bassett, 4 How. Pr. 172.

Assignment of a claim for damages before entry of the judgment will prevent the set-off of an existing adverse judgment for costs in other actions. Hackett v. Connett, 2 Edw. Ch. 73, 6 L. ed. 513.

But the assignment of a verdict, while an opposing judgment is in the hands of assignees for creditors, will not prevent the debtor from taking a re-assignment of it, and setting it off on the judgment under the verdict when it is entered. Jacoby v. Guier, 6 Serg. & R. 443.

How far subject to set-off of demand not in judgment.

The language of some of the cases makes the same rule applicable in case of a judgment that is applicable to an ordinary chose in action.

An assignee of a judgment takes subject to the equities existing between the original parties. Cutts v. Guild, 37 N. Y. 229; Rowe v. Langley, 49 N. H. 393.

The assignee of a judgment takes it subject to all equities of set-off then attached to it. Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Clarkson, 5 Mont. 393, 2 Mont. 230; Burtis v. Cook, 16 Iowa, 194.

Under the Georgia statute a judgment is subject to set-off in the hands of an assignee. Langston v. Roby, 68 Ga. 406.

Under the Michigan statute any claim held by the judgment debtor, before notice of the assignment of the judgment, may be set off in a suit upon the judgment by the assignee. Finn v. Corbitt, 33 Mich. 313.

Indebtedness on promissory notes from a judgment creditor to the judgment debtor existing when the judgment is assigned to a third person may be set off against the judgment in the hands of the assignee. Way v. Colyer (Minn.) June 23, 1892.

Under the Maine statutes to enable an assignee of a judgment to resist a set-off of a claim against the assignor, he must make it appear that the assignment was made before defendant became entitled to the sum claimed by him from the assignor. New Haven Copper Co. v. Brown, 45 Me. 413.

A claim for damages for wrongfully taking back property which had been sold, and for which a note was given, cannot be assigned so as to place the verdict and judgment beyond the liability to set-off against the note. Bonte v. Hall, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 33.

An individual claim by one member of a partnership against another, which was due at the time of the latter's obtaining a judgment against the former in a proceeding to settle the partnership accounts, may be set off against a judgment in the hands of an assignee. Weston v. Turner, 23 N. Y. Supp. 141.

But it is elsewhere positively stated that equity will not set off against an assigned judgment a simple claim against the judgment creditor existing at the time of the assignment. Catron v. Cross, 8 Helak. 583.

So the assignee of a judgment recovered by a bank, which afterwards becomes insolvent, was held not subject to the set-off of money deposited by the debtor in the bank and lost by its insolvency, in Spilman v. Payne, 34 Va. 435.

By implication at least the latter cases are supported by those which hold that an assignee of a judgment is not subject to set-off of a cross-judgment subsequently entered. Hughes v. Trahera, 64 Ill. 43; Ullmann v. Kline, 37 Ill. 263; Wyllie v. Barwise, 43 Minn. 171; Ledyard v. Phillips, 53 Mich. 204; Roberts v. Carter, 38 N. Y. 107; Peckham v. Barcalow, Hill & D. Supp. 112.

A judgment may be assigned free from liability of set-off of a cross-judgment subsequently recovered. Middlesex County Chosen Freeholders v. State Bank at New Brunswick, 38 N. J. Eq. 33.

A judgment will not be permitted to be set off against an assigned judgment, if the record does not show that it was procured until long after the assignment, although the equitable interest had existed in it long prior thereto. Horton v. Miller, 44 Pa. 266.

A judgment assigned to the attorney to satisfy his charges is not subject to set-off of a cross-judgment subsequently entered. Roberts v. Carter, 17 How. Pr. 347.

A claim which could not have been set off in an action ex delicto cannot be set off against the judgment, if the claim was assigned before judgment in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Marine Sawmill Co's App. (Pa.) Jan. 4, 1836.

An assigned verdict and the judgment to be entered thereon is not subject to set-off of cross-judgment thereafter entered. Nash v. Hamilton, 3 Abb. Pr. 37.

Judgments for costs on the dismissal of chancery suits brought for breach of covenant cannot be set off against a judgment in a pending action at law for damages for the same cause of action, which is subsequently entered, if prior to the entry the claim has been assigned for value to a third person. Hackett v. Connett, 2 Edw. Ch. 73, 6 L. ed. 313.

An assignment of the judgment to the attorney all fours with this. Like this the plaintiff had a judgment against a person who afterwards obtained a judgment against him. The defendant Pendleton procured an assignment of the second judgment. This court said that such assignment destroyed the mutuality that had existed and that the judgments could not be set off one against the other.

Such an assignment would prevent an offset, even though it were verbal.

Gray v. McCallister, 50 Iowa, 508. See also Gallagher v. Pendleton, and Bell v. Perry, supra.

Under the written assignment the appellants cannot show that the actual agreement was different from the terms of the writing.

Foster v. Trenary, 65 Iowa, 622; Moore v. Lowrey, 25 Iowa, 886, 95 Am. Dec. 790; Conyngham v. Smith, 16 Iowa, 474.

Mr. H. F. Galpin, for appellee:

In case of the assignment of a thing in action, the action by the assignee shall be without prejudice to any counterclaim, defense, or cause of action whether matured or not, if matured when plead, existing in favor of the defendant and against the assignor before notice of the assignment.

Code, § 2546 (McClain's Anno. Stat. 8751).

The assignee (of a judgment) of course, takes it subject to any defenses which the judgment debtor may have against it.

Edmonds v. Montgomery, 1 Iowa, 148; for services is not subject to the claim of the judgment debtor to set off against the judgment a judgment against the plaintiff which he had procured after the entry of the judgment against himself, and before notice of the assignment. Terney v. Wilson, 45 N. J. L. 287.

An assignee of a judgment does not take subject to the right to set off a cross-demand on which a judgment is subsequently entered, unless there are equities which will compel the chancellor to allow the set-off, as the insolvency of the judgment debtor or his absence from the state. Davis v. Milburn, 3 Iowa, 183.

Where a defendant executed an undated assignment of the costs in his favor to his co-defendant, and in the trial the action was dismissed as to him with costs, and the co-defendant immediately filled up the assignment and, after a verdict had been entered against himself and assigned to a third person, perfected his judgment, after which the assignee perfected his, the co-defendant cannot insist on a set-off, because at the time his judgment was perfected the opposing claim had passed into the hands of a third person. Wood v. Merritt, 45 How. Pr. 471.

So under the Kansas statute, the assignee of a claim takes subject to have a cross-claim set off against it, but if the set-off is not claimed and the action proceeds to judgment, which is assigned, it defeats the right of set-off. Leavenson v. La Fontaine, 3 Kan. 623.

But it has been held that an assignee of a judgment, with notice of the cross-demands, will take subject to the right of set-off, although the cross-judgment is not then recovered. Lammers v. Goodeman, 69 Ind. 75.

Where cross-judgments are in same action.

An assignment cannot defeat the right to set off judgments entered in favor of each party in the same action. Porter v. Liscom, 23 Cal. 433, 33 Am. Dec. 76.

Where judgments had been entered in favor of both parties to an action, after which one assigned his judgment to the attorney for his services, the attorney was held to be entitled only to the surplus after setting off the other judgment. Tiffany v. Stewart, 60 Iowa, 207.

The assignee of a judgment takes it subject to the debtor's right to set off against it the costs in his favor, under the statute providing that if defendant offers judgment and plaintiff refuses it and fails to obtain a more favorable judgment, defendant is entitled to costs. Hibbard v. Randolph, 73 Hun. 626.

But it has been held that the costs of a motion cannot be set off against the costs of a prior motion in the same case, which had been assigned before the second motion was made. Wellman v. Frost, 28 Hun. 399.

Notice.

The question of notice is made material in some of the cases.

An assignment of judgment is subject to equities accruing before notice. Lockwood v. Bates, 1 Del. Ch. 435, 12 Am. Dec. 121.

An assignee of a judgment must allow all set-offs purchased against it before notice of the assignment. Townsend v. Quinan, 47 Tex. 1.

An action on a judgment is within the Massachusetts act that when the demand on which an action is brought has been assigned and defendant had notice of the assignment, he shall not set off a demand that he acquired against the original creditor after such notice. Smith v. Brown, 151 Mass. 888.

The assignee of a judgment, with notice of the existence of a larger judgment against the assignor in the hands of the debtor in the assigned judgment, takes subject to the right of the latter to insist on a set-off. Greene v. Hatch, 12 Mass. 195.

A judgment upon a claim purchased without notice of an adverse claim is not subject, in the hands of the assignee, to a set-off of a judgment upon the other claim. Ames v. Bates, 119 Mass. 397.

Claims purchased after notice of assignment of judgment are not available. Pass v. McRea, 33 Miss. 143.

The right to set off an existing judgment is not defeated by notice of the attorneys that an interest in a newly entered judgment has been assigned to them. Wright v. Treadwell, 14 Tex. 255.

Set-off of claims against one who never had title not available.

A judgment debtor cannot set off against the judgment his claim against one who had negotiated for a purchase of the judgment but induced a third person to purchase it before any claim of his own had attached to it. Avery v. Russell, 125 Mass. 571.

Assignees protected.

Under their equitable control over the question of the set-off of judgments courts are inclined to protect superior equities of assignees as well as those of the one asking the set-off.

In Beard v. Puett, 105 Ind. 68, it is said that a court can order one judgment to be set off against another only when equity and good conscience require that such set-off should be made.

The right to use against an assignee debts due by the assignor and purchased before notice of the assignment is a statutory right, and the statute does not provide that it shall be enforced after judgment. And equity will not permit the set off of judgments to the prejudice of bona fide assignees. Pheiffer v. Harris, 11 Bush, 400.

The right to set off judgments is to be exercised by a court of law ex gratia and is wholly within its discretion and will not be enforced when equity

Hurst v. Sheets, 14 Iowa, 322; Davis v. Milburn, 8 Iowa, 170; Merrill v. Souther, 6 Dana, 305; Robbins v. Holley, 1 T. B. Mon. 191; Burtis v. Cook, 16 Iowa, 194.

Knowledge of Chapman and Irwin was charged, and it was incumbent on them to prove they had no notice of the fact or were not chargeable with notice.

Sillyman v. King, 86 Iowa, 207; Kibby v. Harsh, 61 Iowa, 196.

The promptitude with which the other party attempted to transfer the verdict is calculated to excite suspicion that it was done in anticipation of such a motion (to set-off) and for the purpose of defeating it.

Duncan v. Bloomstock, 2 McCord, L. 318, 18 Am. Dec. 728.

will not be promoted, or when the rights of others will be seriously infringed. Rowe v. Langley, 49 N. H. 306.

Equity will protect a bona fide assignee of a judgment. Davidson v. Geoghagan, 3 Bibb, 233.

The court will not permit a set-off of judgments when it appears that parties other than the nominal creditor are interested by assignment of the demand on which one of the judgments is rendered. Makepeace v. Coates, 8 Mass. 451.

But although one judgment at law cannot be set off against another which has been assigned prior to the entry of the later one, yet if the equity of the set-off is stronger than that of the assignment, if the assignee is compelled to come into equity for relief, he may be compelled to allow the set-off. Gay v. Gay, 10 Paige, 309, 4 L. ed. 1015; Barber v. Spencer, 11 Paige, 617, 5 L. ed. 218.

One desiring a set-off of judgments should not delay until the interests of third persons have become involved. Williams v. Evans, 2 McCord, L. 203; Payne v. Webb, 29 W. Va. 627; Nuzum v. Morris, 25 W. Va. 559.

The equitable right of setting off judgments will not be permitted to affect an equitable assignee for value. Ramsey's App. 2 Watts, 223, 27 Am. Dec. 301.

In that case it is said that the equitable right of setting off judgments is permitted only where it will infringe on no other right of equal grade, consequently it is not to affect an equitable assignee for value. Ibid.

Fraudulent assignment or for the purpose of defeating set-off.

A fraudulent assignment of one of the judgments cannot prevent a set-off. Russell v. Conway, 11 Cal. 93.

A fraudulent assignee of judgment takes subject to set-off. Hurst v. Sheets, 14 Iowa, 322.

An assignment of a judgment to one who has illegally furnished money to carry on the action is subject to the right of the judgment debtor to set off a judgment against the assignor. Puett v. Beard, 86 Ind. 172, 44 Am. Rep. 230.

To prevent injustice, one judgment may be set off against another, although the latter has been assigned to a third person. Hovey v. Morrill, 61 N. H. 9, 60 Am. Rep. 315.

A set-off of judgments will be allowed if the assignment was made for the purpose of defeating it. Morris v. Hollis, 2 Harr. (Del.) 4; Duncan v. Bloomstock, 2 McCord, L. 318, 18 Am. Dec. 728.

A wife to whom is assigned a judgment recovered by her husband in tort in accordance with an agreement that if she would advance money to prosecute the action she should have an assignment of the judgment, may hold it as against the claim of the judgment debtor to set off claims against the husband which he held at the time, but which 23 L. R. A.

Given, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The facts necessary to be noticed are these: On March 26, 1890, plaintiff, Benson, obtained his judgment against defendant Haywood, of which fact defendants Chapman and Irwin had knowledge, they being engaged as attorneys in that case. At the August term following a verdict was returned in favor of defendant Haywood against plaintiff, Benson, in another action, wherein Chapman and Irwin appeared as attorneys for Haywood. On August 28th following the verdict, but before judgment was entered thereon, Chapman and Irwin filed notice claiming an attorney's lien "upon the judgment" for services as attorneys, for $75-he took no steps to set off until after the assignment. Beard v. Puett, 106 Ind. 68.

Insolvency as an equity.

Insolvency raises an equity to have judgments set off against each other which cannot be defeated by an assignment of one of them. Merrill v. Souther, 6 Dana, 305.

Mere assignees of a judgment in favor of an insolvent take subject to the right of set-off, unless they can show some superior equity. Marshall v. Cooper, 43 Md. 61; Levy v. Steinbach, Id. 212.

But insolvency of one of the parties is not sufficient to cause the set-off of cross-judgments, one of which has been assigned, unless it existed before the assignment was made. Henderson v. McVay, 32 Ala. 471.

Insolvency of the assignor is not a sufficient equity to cause a set-off against a judgment in the hands of the assignee, unless the insolvency is shown to have existed at the time of the assignment. Robbins v. Holley, 1 T. B. Mon. 191.

Where assigns the real party.

A set-off of cross-judgments will not be prevented by the assignment of the claim on which one of them is entered, if the assignee is the real plaintiff and also the real defendant in the cross-action. Standeven v. Murgatroyd, 27 L. J. Exch. 425.

In testing the right to a set-off it is not necessary that the judgments should be in the same right; it is enough if the judgment prayed to be set off may be enforced at law against the party recovering the judgment to be satisfied by the set-off, provided it is not in a representative capacity. Brown v. Hendrickson, 39 N. J. L. 239.

Assignment without consideration.

One who takes an assignment of a judgment without consideration holds it subject to the right of the judgment debtor to set off a judgment, of which he attempted to get an assignment, but which, because of a mistake in the transaction, resulted simply in an equitable assignment. Frybarger v. Andre, 106 Ind. 337.

Want of legal title.

One having merely an equitable title to a judgment cannot prevent a set-off. Williams v. Taylor, 69 Ind. 48.

In Dorsey v. Reese, 14 B. Mon. 157, an assignee of a judgment was held subject to the right of set-off of a note procured before the assignment, although it was procured under the agreement that it should be returned, if the set-off should not be allowed.

Judgment on note.

Following the rule in the case of set-offs to commercial paper assigned after maturity it is held that a judgment recovered on a note assigned each, and on the same day they filed an assignment, as follows: "Storm Lake, Iowa, Aug. 28, 1890. For value received, I hereby assign, transfer, and set over to T. H. Chapman and Chas. A. Irwin all my right, title, and interest in and to the judgment this day recovered by me in the case of Jonas Haywood v. E. W. Benson for legal fees due from me to them for labor and services performed for me in the above-entitled case. Jonas Haywood." On August 30th judgment was rendered on the verdict against plaintiff, and in favor of Haywood, and on September 3, 1890, executions were issued on both judgments, and placed in the hands of the defendant James, as sheriff, who refused to offset the one against the other, and thereupon this action was brought. The right of Chapman and Irwin to an attorney's lien is not questioned, nor is the validity of the assignment to them. There is no allegation of fraud or want of consideration, and the evidence shows that the value of their services to Haywood in the case was equal to the amount of the judgment.

2. Appellants introduced evidence, over appellee's objection, tending to show that the consideration for this assignment was service rendered as attorneys for Haywood in the action wherein the judgment against Benson was rendered of the amount of $82.50, and $55 for services rendered for Haywood in another case. The assignment from Haywood recites that it was "for legal fees due from me to them for labor and services performed for me in the above-entitled case." The above-entitled case is Jonas Haywood v. E. W. Benson. There is no allegation of fraud or mistake in the making of this writing, nor is it ambiguous or its meaning uncertain. It plainly states the consideration to be labor and services in the case wherein the judgment was rendered, and the evidence introduced is in direct contradiction of this plain recital, and therefore not admissible. Appellants cite Moore v. Lowrey, 25 Iowa, 338, 95 Am. Dec. 790, and Fluster v. Trenary, 65 Iowa, 623, where it is held that such an assignment may be verbal or in writing, "and if in writing, and the intent and contract of the parties is not fully expressed therein, it may be shown by evidence al-after maturity is subject to set-off of cross-judgments by the maker against the payee. Burham v. Tucker, 18 Me. 179.

Rights of holder of assigned judgment.

A judgment procured by assignment, which was not rendered when the cross-judgment was assigned to a third person cannot be set off against the latter. Harper v. Keys, 54 Ind. 512.

The holder of an assigned judgment cannot insist on a set-off against a judgment which has been assigned. Goodwin v. Richardson, 44 N. H. 125.

A judgment assigned to the attorney for services was held not to be subject to the set-off of a judgment obtained against the assignor by a third person, and assigned by him to the judgment debtor, on the ground that his equities were inferior to those of the attorney. Lundgreen v. Stratton, 79 Wis. 227.

Waiver.

The right to set off judgments may be waived by neglecting to make the application for set-off pending the action, if the claim is then existing. Dunkin v. Calbraith, 1 Browne (Pa.) 47.

After the entry of a judgment in favor of the assignee on the assigned claim, a judgment then existing against the assignor cannot be used as a set-off, since the existence of all defenses to the suit is negated by the judgment. Ault v. Zehering, 38 Ind. 429.

Although it was held in Harpstrite v. Vase, 3 Ill. App. 121, that a judgment against the assignor cannot be set off in a suit on a simple contract by the assignee.

Set-off of contingent liability.

The assignee of a judgment takes it subject to the right of the debtor to set off any sums he may be compelled to pay upon his existing obligation as surety for the creditor. Neal v. Sullivan, 10 Mich. Eq. 276.

A surety may set off against a judgment obtained against him by his principal, on private transactions between them and marked for the benefit of one claiming to be trustee for the principal's creditors for the use of the trust, under a parol agreement, the amount which he is compelled to pay because of his principal's default in the obligation upon which he was surety. Gordon v. Bixey, 86 Va. 863.

Assignment in accordance with prior agreement.

There can be no set-off if a judgment has been assigned to the attorney in payment for services in pursuance of a prior parol agreement, and in turn assigned for value to a stranger, both parties being ignorant of the opposing judgment, although the latter was in existence when the assigned judgment was entered. Simmons v. Reid, 81 S. C. 389.

When before the recovery of the judgment, the plaintiff agrees with the attorneys to assign the judgment to them for their costs, which agreement is carried out, the defendant is not entitled to set off against the judgment in the hands of the attorneys a judgment previously recovered by him against the assignor, since at the time the judgment is recovered in favor of the assignor, it does not belong to him, but to the attorneys. Perry v. Chester, 53 N. Y. 243; Ely v. Cooke, 28 N. Y. 305.

And a similar ruling was made in Zogbaum v. Parker, 55 N. Y. 120, on the ground that the equities of the attorney were superior to those of the holder of the opposing judgment.

Set-off on motion.

Set-off has been denied at times on motion when under precisely similar circumstances it might have been allowed in an action to compel it. The motion is a process quite too summary to always meet the requirements of the adjustment of equities such as are usually represented in proceedings to procure a set-off against assignees.

Thus it has been held that a set-off cannot be obtained by motion, where the claim upon which one of the judgments was entered was assigned prior to the judgment. Swift v. Prouty, 64 N. Y. 546.

A claim assigned to counsel for services just before judgment is not subject to set-off of another judgment existing at the time, on motion. Swift v. Prouty, 6 Hun, 34.

But the fact that a motion to set off judgments has been denied does not bar a suit to obtain such set-off. Pignolet v. Geer, 19 Abb. Pr. 267.

Assignment to attorney may defeat his lien.

The assignment of the judgment for costs to the attorney may defeat his lien thereon so as to preclude his objecting to the set-off of a cross-judgment. Perry v. Chester, 4 Jones & S. 228.

unde." In this assignment the intent and contract is fully expressed, and, under familiar rules, that writing may not be contradicted, in the absence of an allegation of fraud or mistake. This evidence cannot be considered, but the consideration must be taken to be as expressed in the writing.

8. Appellants contend that it is only mutual judgments that may be set off; that to be mutual they must in fact belong to the respective parties; and that, by the assignment, the judgment against plaintiff ceased to belong to Haywood, and is therefore not a mutual judgment. Appellee's contention is that under section 8097 of the Code, and also under the rules of equity, the right to have these judgments set off against each other arose when, by the verdict, it was determined that plaintiff was indebted to defendant Haywood; and that by the assignment Chapman and Irwin took the judgment subject to all defenses which Benson has against it, including the right of set-off. It requires no citations to show that the judgments must be mutual. If it were not for the attorney's lien and assignment, there would be no question of the right of either party to have these judgments set off. It is well established that the assignee of a judgment takes it subject to any defense which the judgment debtor may have against it. Code, § 2546; Edmonds v. Montgomery, 1 Iowa, 148; Hurst v. Sheets, 14 Iowa, 822; Davis v. Milburn, 8 Iowa, 170; Burtis v. Cook, 16 Iowa, 194; Preston v. Turner, 36 Iowa, 671; Ballinger v. Tarbell, 16 Iowa, 491, 85 Am. Dec. 527; Tiffany v. Stewart, 60 Iowa, 211. The attorney's lien is upon "money due his client in the hands of the adverse party." Code, § 215. Plaintiff having the right to have the amount due from him to Haywood set off by his larger judgment against Haywood, there was no money due from him upon which the lien could attach. We understand appellants to rest their defense upon the assignment alone; hence the matter of the lien need not be further noticed. The question is whether the valid assignment of a judgment deprives the judgment debtor of the right to thereafter have a judgment in his favor against the assignor rendered in a different action before the assignment set off against the judgment assigned. The basis of the right to set off judgments is not different from the right to set off mutual claims of any kind. If these parties had held mutual accounts against each other, and one of them had assigned his account against the other to a third person, and that person sued upon it, the right of the one sued to set up his account against the assignor, as an offset, would hardly be questioned. In such case the assignee takes the account subject to defenses. There is no distinction between such an assignment and an assignment of a judgment. It seems to us entirely clear that Chapman and Irwin took this judgment subject to plaintiff's right to offset it with his judgment, even though at the time they did not know that the judgment in favor of plaintiff was unpaid. Tiffany v. Stewart, 60 Iowa, 207, supports the view we have expressed. In that case two judgments were rendered against Henderson in favor of Tiffany, for costs on appeal, which Tiffany had paid. Upon the final trial judgment was rendered in favor of Henderson and against Tiffany. Tiffany sought to offset the judgments in his favor against that in favor of Henderson. Stewart, White, and Parks claimed an attorney's lien and assignment of the verdict and judgment in favor of Henderson. Tiffany asked an injunction against the defendants Stewart, White, and Parks, to restrain them from collecting the judgment against him. This court held that the injunction should have been granted. What is said in that case applies with equal force to this. It is true those judgments were all rendered in the progress of the same action, but they were separate and independent judgments, and though, as said, "they were more than mutual in the ordinary sense of that term," that does not question the mutuality of these judgments. See also Ballinger v. Tarbell, Burtis v. Cook, and other cases cited above.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Washington, ex rel. Thomas M. REED, Jr.,

v.
W. C. JONES, Attorney-General.

(6 Wash. 452.)

An enrolled bill on file in the office of the secretary of state must be accepted without question by the courts as having been regularly enacted by the legislature.

(June 5, 1893.)

NOTE.—Conclusiveness of enrolled bill.

The question how far courts must treat an enrolled bill as conclusive of the existence of the law including the regularity and validity of its passage through all necessary stages is one of some difficulty. The conclusion which will be reached depends upon the line of argument adopted. One of two different premises is usually adopted as a basis for the decision. Either of these seems perfectly proper and the one will be adopted which at the time

APPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to approve a bond tendered by relator as one of the board of land commissioners. Writ granted.

An Act passed by the state legislature on March 15, 1893, purported to create a board of land commissioners, and charged the attorney-general with the duty of approving the official bond of persons appointed as members of such board. Relator was duly appointed a member of that board under the provision by the act, seems most important. But the arguments from them lead inevitably to opposite conclusions. The one premise is that the constitution is binding on the legislature and that unless its provisions are complied with the legislative acts will fail. The other is that the legislature is a co-ordinate branch of the government and that it must be presumed to obey its conscience and do its duty and its assertion that it has done so in the manner usually adopted is conclusive of that fact. Of course if and tendered to respondent a bond which was admitted to be sufficient but which the respondent declined to approve on the ground that the act creating the board had not been constitutionally passed. The objections made by respondent to the constitutionality of the act are as follows: (1.) It was not introduced into either house of the legislature ten days before the date of final adjournment, as provided by section 36, article 2, of the State Constitution. (2.) Section 1 and section 23 of the enrolled bill are substantially different from such sections as they passed both houses of the state legislature. (3.) An important section was added to the bill in the house and was a part of that bill when it passed that body in the regular way, which section was not acted upon by the senate in any way, and does not appear in the enrolled bill. (4.) It appears from the journals that the house and senate did not pass the same bill. That after the bill had received a preliminary consideration by the senate, it was sent to the house and important changes made, and that when it was returned to the senate it was never passed again in that body in the manner provided by section 22, article 2, of the Constitution. The ayes and nays were not called on any of the amendments on the bill so amended.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Greene & Turner, for relator:

Unconstitutionality of the statute, even supposing it to have been in fact unconstitutional, was not a good ground for the attorney-general to refuse his approval of the bond.

It was not for the defendant officer charged with the simple duty of approving an official bond to sit in judgment upon the constitutionality of this enactment and refuse to approve the bond on the sole ground that the law charging him with the duty of approval was unconstitutional. He should have assumed the constitutionality of the act until the contrary had been decided in some appropriate direct proceeding in a court of competent jurisdiction.

The act in question is authenticated by the signatures of the presiding officers of both houses and approved by the governor, and being so authenticated this court will not go behind that authentication and search to ascertain whether such facts exist as gave these officers constitutional warrant for their action. It is not a function of the journals under our constitution to enable the courts to try the validity of statutes.

Dec. 93, overruling Fowler v. Pierce, 2 Cal. 165; People v. Burt, the constitution requires the evidence of proper action to be preserved its absence may be fatal to the law.

The English rule.

In England there is no written constitution to control the action of parliament and its acts cannot therefore be questioned. Hence the courts there hold that—

The parliament roll is sufficient to prove the authenticity of an act. Rex v. Jeffries, 1 Strange, 446.

The journals of parliament are not records and cannot weaken or control a statute which is a record and to be tried only by itself. Rex v. Arundel, Hob. 110.

So nil tui record cannot be pleaded against a general act of parliament. The Prince's Case, 8 Coke, 28.

Even the certificate of the bill from chancery is conclusive without resorting to the original act. College of Physicians v. Hubert, 3 Keb. 537.

Decisions holding the enrolled act conclusive.

There are many decisions in this country which go to the full extent of STATE v. JONES, supra, and refuse to go behind the enrolled bill.

Where the legislature had provided a method of authenticating the revised statutes of the state, the court held that the authenticated statutes became part of the records of the legislature and imported absolute verity. Eld v. Gorham, 20 Conn. 8.

The certificate of the presiding officers that the act was passed is conclusive on courts. Stout v. Grant County Comrs. 107 Ind. 343.

The right to look behind the enrolled act is not sustainable on the theory of the independence and separate action of the three branches of the state government. Louisiana State Lottery Co. v. Richoux, 23 La. Ann. 743, 3 Am. Rep. 602; Whited v. Lewis, 25 La. Ann. 568.

The original act is the ultimate proof of the law. Clare v. State, 5 Iowa, 509; Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 1.

The enrolled bill is better evidence of what law is than the journals. Fouke v. Fleming, 13 Md. 362; Annapolis v. Harwood, 32 Md. 471.

In considering the effect of omitting a law from the printed volume, the court said: "The highest and most conclusive evidence of a statute is the enrolled bill." Greer v. State, 54 Miss. 373.

In Com. v. Martin, 107 Pa. 185, the trial judge held that an act was a record which imported absolute verity and could not be impeached by journals which were not records. The supreme court reversed the decision on other points while concurring in most that the presiding judge decided, but the ruling in preference to the records does not seem to have been questioned in such a way as to have brought the matter before the supreme court.

The court cannot look to the journals to see if a constitutional quorum was present when the act was passed. Evans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514, 95 Am. Dec. 710; Bender v. State, 63 Ind. 324; Madison County Comrs. v. Burford, 66 Ind. 388.

In the following cases it has been held that the authenticated act is conclusive evidence of its existence and contents: State v. Young, 32 N. J. L. 20, recognized in Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Attorney-General, 46 N. J. Bq. 270; Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 256, 39 Am. Dec. 93; People v. Burt, 43 Cal. 500; Weeks v. Smith, 31 Mo. 538; Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650; Swann v. Buck, 40 Miss. 268; Ex parte Wren, 63 Miss. 512, 56 Am. Rep. 825; overruling Brady v. West, 50 Miss. 68; Hunt v. Brethauer, 70 Ill. 167, 22 Am. Rep. 70.

Mr. W. C. Jones, Atty-Gen., in propria persona:

In the brief of the government filed in the case of Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 661, 36 L. ed. 294, an exhaustive collation of the authorities on this subject is given. From that it appears that in twenty-two of the states the courts have unhesitatingly gone to the journals to ascertain whether the legislature has complied with the provisions of the constitution, in the enactment of laws. From that digest it appears that California and Kentucky at first adhered to the English rule, but since the adoption of the new constitution in the former state, the other rule has been adopted, and it would seem from the case of Norman v. Kentucky Managers of World's Columbian Exposition, 18 L. R. A. 556, 93 Ky.—, that Kentucky has also placed itself in line with the weight of authorities and the more modern ideas.

The courts will look beyond even the journal and consult the files of the legislature, the 581; Williams v. Taylor, 33 Tex. 667; Usener v. State, 3 Tex. App. 177.

Of these cases perhaps those which best set out the argument of this side of the question are: State v. Young, Sherman v. Story, Green v. Weller, Pacific Railroad v. The Governor, and State v. Swift, supra.

There are besides the above some cases in which although the question is not positively decided the judges writing the opinions have plainly indicated a leaning towards that rule.

In Falconer v. Campbell, 2 McLean, 195, the court, although stating that the question is not before it, plainly intimates that the enrolled act is conclusive upon the question of its having received the constitutional majority.

In State v. Robinson, 81 N. C. 409, where the question was as to the effect of the omission from the act of the signature of the presiding officer of the assembly, the court seems to incline to the opinion that the journals are not competent evidence.

Day Land & Cattle Co. v. State, 63 Tex. 526, shows a disinclination on the part of the court to go behind the legislative action.

The effect of constitutional provisions.

There is another class of cases in which the courts have considered it part of their duties to ascertain that the legislature has complied with the constitutional provisions although conceding as stated by the West Virginia court that, "when an act has been constitutionally passed the court cannot go behind it for any purpose whatever." Lusher v. Scites, 4 W. Va. 11.

So the presumption from the enrollment is conclusive except as to matters upon which the constitution makes the validity of the enactment rest. State v. Wray, 109 Mo. 594.

So the journals are not admissible to show that the bill did not pass. But this does not preclude an inquiry into the prerequisites fixed by the constitution of which the journals are required to furnish evidence. State v. Chester (S. C.) May 18, 1893.

If the constitution requires certain things, the court may look to the journals to see that they are done. Hunt v. State, 22 Tex. App. 390.

The court may take notice of the journals to determine whether or not constitutional requirements were complied with. People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; Atty-Gen. v. Joy, 55 Mich. 94; Callaghan v. Chipman, 59 Mich. 610.

Provisions as to quorum and recording vote.

One of the provisions of the constitution which are most frequently relied on to give the court the right to inspect the journals is that requiring the record of the yeas and nays, and requiring a certain number of members to be present.

Under a constitution requiring all bills to be passed by yeas and nays votes of record, the court may look to the journals to see if an act was actually passed. Rode v. Phelps, 80 Mich. 598; Detroit v. Detroit Board of Assessors, 91 Mich. 78.

The journals are competent to show that an act was not passed by the required majority. Skinner v. Deming, 2 Ind. 553, 54 Am. Dec. 463.

Journals may be examined to see if the act received the required vote. Fordyce v. Godman, 20 Ohio St. 1.

Where the constitution requires the vote to be taken by yeas and nays, to be entered on the journal, and a certain number to pass an act, the court may look to the journal to see if the act was passed. Osburn v. Staley, 5 W. Va. 85, 13 Am. Rep. 640.

Resort to the journals is not precluded by a constitutional provision that the bills shall be signed by the presiding officers in open session and the fact noted on the journals when it elsewhere provides that each house shall keep a journal and that after a bill has been rejected, no similar bill shall original bills on file in the office of the secretary of state or any other competent evidence to determine these questions.

Under our constitution it would seem that the court must of necessity examine the files and original bills in case any question is presented which necessitates such an examination for its correct solution.

Article 2, § 38, provides as follows: "No amendment to any bill shall be allowed which shall change the scope and object of the bill." When it is alleged before our courts that any act is obnoxious to the constitution because the legislature has violated this provision by allowing an amendment to a bill which changed its "scope and object," the court can only determine the question by examining the bill as it was originally introduced, the amendments which were made and the bill as finally passed.

be passed at the same session. Brewer v. Huntington, 86 Tenn. 732.

Under a constitutional provision that on the final passage of bills, the vote shall be by yeas and nays, entered on the journal, and that no bill shall become a law without a concurrence of a majority of the members elected, the court to determine whether or not a bill was constitutionally passed will look to the journals. San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 13 Fed. Rep. 722.

But the Supreme Court of the United States has held that a constitutional provision that each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings and the yeas and nays of the members shall be entered thereon, does not make the journal better evidence of the bill as passed by the legislative body, than the bill as enrolled, attested by the presiding officers of each house, signed by the president, and deposited in the office of the secretary of state. Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 38 L. ed. 294.

Although in United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 321, the court assumes without deciding that the journals may be resorted to for the purpose of determining whether or not constitutional requirements were complied with in passing a law, although at the same time pointing out matters which suggest the unreliability of such evidence.

Requirements as to special legislation.

Where the constitution requires notice to be given of intention to introduce special or local bills, and that the legislature shall provide the means for obtaining and preserving the evidence thereof, the authentication of the bill is not conclusive, but the courts may look to the preserved evidence to see if the requisite notice was given. Pascala County Chosen Freeholders v. Stevenson, 48 N. J. L. 173.

But in Arkansas it was held that no issue can be raised in the courts as to whether or not the legislature complied with the constitutional require-

Hoyt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent, as attorney-general, was charged by an act of the legislature, or what purports to be such, with the duty of approving the bond of the relator as one of the board of state land commissioners provided for by said act. This duty he refused to perform, on the ground that what purported to be the act of the legislature was not in fact such, for the reason that the constitutional requirements had not been observed by the legislature in its passage. This proceeding is brought on the part of the relator to compel such action by respondent.

There is a line of authorities which we might follow and dispose of this case without at all entering into the question as to whether or not in fact said purported act of the legislature should have force as such; but in view of the great importance of a prompt determination of the question as to whether or not said purported act is in force, and of the further fact that the elaborate briefs filed upon the part of the respective parties will enable the court to as intelligently determine that question in this proceeding as in any other, we have concluded that our duty to the parties and to the public will be best performed by disregarding all preliminary questions which might be raised, and determining the rights of the parties upon the broad ground, upon which it has been largely argued, as to whether or not such purported act is in fact a part of the statute law of this state.

ments as to notice of special legislation. Davis v. Gaines, 48 Ark. 370.

General expressions as to compliance with constitution.

If it appears affirmatively on the journal that in the passage of any bill some mandatory provision of the constitution has not been complied with it will be fatal to the validity of the statute. Smithee v. Garth, 38 Ark. 17.

It is well settled that courts will look to the legislative journals to ascertain whether or not the act in fact passed in accordance with the forms and in the manner prescribed by the constitution. Worthen v. Badgett, 32 Ark. 496.

The courts are gravitating towards the English rule, for while they say that the enrolled bill is not conclusive of the valid enactment of a law and that they may look behind it to the journals, they supply by presumption everything necessary to its validity save where the journals affirmatively show a violation of the constitution. Glidewell v. Martin, 51 Ark. 559.

Courts will see if constitutional provision is complied with. Weill v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111.

The courts may go behind the act itself to inquire whether or not the legislature or the executive has violated or disregarded the mode pointed out by the organic law. The power is incident to all courts of general jurisdiction and necessary to the protection of public rights and liberties. Fowler v. Pierce, 2 Cal. 165.

The bill is a nullity if the journals show that the constitutional requirements were not complied with. McCulloch v. State, 11 Ind. 424.

The journals may be examined to ascertain whether or not the act was constitutionally passed. People v. Burch, 84 Mich. 408.

As to fact of passage.

Some of the cases contain expressions at least

It is claimed on the part of the respondent that it cannot have such force, by reason of the fact that the legislature has not complied with the constitutional requirements by which a certain subject-matter can be enacted into a law. It is not contended but that the enrolled bill on file in the office of the secretary of state is in all respects regular upon its face, and bears the signatures of the presiding officers of the respective houses of the legislature in due form, and has been regularly approved by the governor, and deposited in said office, as required by the provisions of the constitution in that regard; but it is claimed that an examination of the journals of the respective houses will show that the legislature disregarded several mandatory provisions of the constitution which it was incumbent upon them to observe before any bill could become a law. The argument upon what is shown by the journal, and the effect thereof, has been elaborate and full; and the publicity which has been thereby given to the manner in which such journals have been kept, and the want of care exercised by the legislature in seeing that a compliance with constitutional provisions is made to appear therein, cannot but be beneficial, whatever may be the effect thereof in the decision of the question now before the court.

Preliminary to entering upon the question thus argued, we must decide another question, which, if determined adversely to the position of the respondent, will make it improper for us to enter at all upon the discussion as to the effect of the journal entries above referred to. This is as to the effect to be given to the enrolled bill on file in the office of the secretary of state. It is claimed on the part of the relator that such enrolled bill is absolutely conclusive of the fact that it had been regularly enacted into a law by the legislature, and, if this be true, it is of course immaterial as to what the journals or any other proof may or may not show upon this subject. As to just what force the respondent is willing to concede to such enrolled bill is not entirely clear from his argument, though it may probably be fairly deduced therefrom that he is willing to concede that it prima facie establishes the fact of the regularity of its passage through the legislature, but that such prima facie proof is overcome whenever there is a suggestion to the court that the journal or other competent proof shows that some constitutional requirement has not been complied with; that, upon such suggestion, the courts must take judicial notice of what the journals show in that regard, and, if it appear to the court therefrom that there has been such violation of constitutional requirements, it must be held that the enrolled bill is not in force as a law. That this is the position of the respondent seems certain from the line of authorities which he has cited to sustain it, as nearly or quite all of them hold that such prima facie presumption attaches to the enrolled bill. If this is not his position, then it must be that the enrolled bill is proof of nothing, and that in every case the courts which tend to show that the journals may be examined as to each and every step in the course of the passage of a bill, and that the enrollment creates merely a presumption in favor of the bill which may at any time be overthrown by evidence furnished by the journals. Of course such a rule makes the journals a record of higher grade than the enrolled bill.

In State v. Hagood, 18 S. C. 46, the chief justice in discussing the question of the right of the court to go behind the enrolled act, said: "Fictions of law are often convenient when dynastic interests are to be upheld against the reason that commends popular rights, but have no place in interpreting the instrument from which all governmental power springs and by which its efficacy is to be tested."

The court will look to the journals to ascertain whether or not a statute has a legal existence. Jones v. Hutchinson, 43 Ala. 721; Moody v. State, 48 Ala. 115, 17 Am. Rep. 28; Henderson v. State, 94 Ala. 95.

The court may go behind the certificate of the presiding officers as to the fact of passage. State v. McLelland, 18 Neb. 226, 38 Am. Rep. 814; State v. Robinson, 20 Neb. 96.

The journals are official records. State v. Wright, 14 Or. 365.

court to look into the journals, and the judge writing the opinion states that in his opinion it is right for the courts to look to the journals for certain purposes, although he further states that it is not necessary to determine in that case how far it may be examined to impeach duly authenticated acts.

Gaines v. Horrigan, 4 Lea, 608, stated that the weight of authority was that journals were admissible but refused to determine whether or not such was the rule in Tennessee.

Also in Kentucky it has been stated that the majority of the states permit resort to the journals. Norman v. Kentucky Managers of World's Columbian Exposition, 18 L. R. A. 556, 98 Ky. —.

It is stated in the brief of the attorney-general in the case of Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 291, that in Wyoming the journals may be examined,—citing Brown v. Nash, 1 Wyo. Terr. 85; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Carr, 1 Wyo. Terr. 93.

In the following cases it is held that the enrolled act is not conclusive but that the court may resort to the journals for the purpose of overthrowing it under certain circumstances. Re Roberts, 5 Colo. 525; *Illinois Cent. and all the inhabitants of the state must take notice of the course of the legislature as to every step relating to the passage of a bill, so far as such steps are made obligatory upon the legislature by the constitution. If the courts were to hold with this latter contention, it would lead to such results as to almost justify revolution on the part of the people. With such a construction once sanctioned by the courts, it would follow that, in however good faith an individual or an officer might act in view of the law as it appeared in the enrolled bill, such seeming law or such good faith could in no manner protect him from the result of his acts if in fact the journals failed to show that the act had been regularly passed by the legislature. Hence a person might, while supposing that he was acting directly in accordance with the laws of the state, be in fact committing a crime, and an officer who should venture to pay out money in pursuance of what thus seemed to be the law could be called upon to account for the same as having been paid out in violation of all law if in fact such seeming law had not been constitutionally passed, as shown by the legislative journals. That such must be the result if the signing by the presiding officers and the approval by the governor are to be considered only as steps in the act of making the bill a law, and not in themselves proof of such fact, seems clear under well-settled rules relating to construction. If such signing and approval are only steps, then the fact that they have been taken in no manner proves that any other required step has been taken, and it must follow that, before the courts can find that the bill has become a law, they must look and see that all the steps required by the constitution to constitute it such have been observed by the legislature. Such a construction given to the enrolled act would render it practically impossible for the courts even to determine what was the law, and would render it absolutely impossible for the average citizen to ascertain that of which he must at his peril take notice. There is enough injustice in requiring the citizen to take notice of the statute law when to do so he has only to determine the legal effect of the enrolled acts on file in the office of the secretary of state, and, if he is further required to take notice of all that is shown by the journals of the legislature which may affect the regularity with which such acts have been passed, he will indeed be in a sorry condition. The absolutely disastrous result of this construction has led the courts which have held that they could go behind the enrolled act to adopt the theory, which seems to us to be entirely illogical, that the enrolled acts prima facie, but not conclusively, establish the fact of their regular enactment. Such holding compels the further one that, whenever the attention of the courts is directed to the particular parts of the journal which show a want of compliance with constitutional requirements, the courts must take judicial notice of all facts therein contained in relation to the point to which their attention has thus been called, and, if such

State v. Mead, 71 Mo. 296; Ballou v. Black, 17 Neb. 389; Opinion of the Justices, 35 N. H. 579, 45 N. H. 607, 62 N. H. 622; Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119; Nelson v. Haywood County, 91 Tenn. 596.

In a few of the cases in this class the statutes have been attacked for failure to comply with some constitutional requirement, or the court has limited the right to go to the journals to such cases: as in Spangler v. Jacoby, 14 Ill. 297, 58 Am. Dec. 571; People v. Starnes, 35 Ill. 126; People v. DeWolf, 62 Ill. 258; Ryan v. Lynch, 68 Ill. 160; Turley v. Logan County, 17 Ill. 151; Prescott v. Illinois & M. Canal Trustees, 19 Ill. 324; State v. Brown, 20 Fla. 407.

If it affirmatively appears that the act was not passed, the court will pronounce it invalid. State v. Rogers, 23 Or. 343; Currie v. Southern Pac. Co. 31 Or. 563.

To contradict enrolled bill.

In accord with the expressions found in cases cited under the last preceding subdivision some of the courts have held that the enrolled bill was not conclusive, even upon the question of the language of the act, but that it might be contradicted or corrected by entries found in the journals.

The journals may be consulted to determine what the act was which passed the legislature and whether or not it corresponds with the enrolled act. State v. Platt, 2 S. C. N. S. 150, 16 Am. Rep. 647; State v. Deal, 24 Fla. 298.

The court may examine the journals to see whether or not the act as published was the one which received the assent of the legislature. Berry v. Baltimore & D. P. R. Co. 41 Md. 446, 20 Am. Rep. 60; Legg v. Annapolis, 42 Md. 203; Strauss v. Heise, 43 Md. 222.

The act will be declared void if it differs materially from that shown by the journals to have been passed. Moog v. Randolph, 77 Ala. 597; Sayre v. Pollard, Id. 603; Abernathy v. State, 78 Ala. 411; Stein v. Leeper, Id. 517.

Journals may be examined to determine what the bill is. Ohio County v. Davies, 40 Ark. 200.

In Hollingsworth v. Thompson, 45 La. Ann.—, the court looked into the journals upon an allegation that the act as published was not the same as the one enacted, without any extended discussion of the right to do so, and also without noticing its former decisions on the subject.

Where the enrolled bill showed interlineations on its face, the court looked to the journals stating that the rule of Green v. Weller must be received with some qualification. Brady v. West, 50 Miss. 63.

But in Texas it has been held that the journals are not admissible for the purpose of showing that the enrolled bill is not the one which passed the house. Re Tipton, 8 L. R. A. 326, 28 Tex. App. 433.

How far journals may establish a law for which no enrolled bill is found.

The journals cannot be used to show the passage of a law which cannot be found among the enrolled acts. Graves v. Alsap, 1 Ariz. 274.

That the act contained an emergency clause when passed cannot be shown by the journals. Re General Appropriation Bill, 16 Colo. 539.

The journals cannot be used to add an alleged omission to the enrolled bill. State v. Leidtke, 9 Neb. 462.

But in Texas it has been held that the journals may show the passage of a bill if other evidence is wanting. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Odum, 53 Tex. 343.

It seems that in some of the states no weight whatever is given to the enrollment, but the whole question of the existence of the law is determined from the journals alone. In such jurisdictions the journals show any want of compliance with the mandates of the constitution, declare such prima facie presumption overcome, and the law invalid. The result of this construction will lead to results as disastrous and embarrassing as would the other construction of which we have been speaking. For a number of years after the passage of an act it may be given force by the courts, by reason of the prima facie presumption flowing from the finding of the act regularly enrolled and signed in the office of the secretary of state. Then, after said act, to all intents and purposes, has been treated as in force during all of these years, upon the suggestion of some person that there was a fatal omission in the journal entries regarding the passage thereof, the court must take judicial notice of such facts, if shown by the journal, and from that time on it must be held, not only that such bill was not then a law, but that it never had been such. The confusion as to rights and duties growing out of such a state of uncertainty as to what the statute law of the state is may well appall one who even superficially contemplates the same. Worse than this may happen, however. The suggestion as to the invalidity of the law may be made to one superior court in the state, and from that moment such court must hold the law invalid if the journal shows any constitutional irregularity in its passage; while in another superior court said act will still be given full force as a law, by reason of the fact that no suggestion has been made which will authorize the court to go behind the prima facie presumption flowing from the enrolled bill. If, from the enrolled bill on file, it can be conclusively presumed that it has been regularly enacted by the legislature, none of these evil consequences will follow, and the duty of the courts will be confined exclusively to ascertaining the effect of such law. It follows that, as a matter of public policy, as well as of convenience and certainty, the court should adopt the rule which makes such enrolled bills conclusive evidence of their regular enactment, if it can do so without violating some fundamental constitutional provision or well-settled rule of construction. As we have already stated, none of the cases cited by respondent go to the extent of holding, as first above suggested, that the enrolled act on file is proof of nothing at all, and that the fact of its being thus found on file must be supplemented by the further affirmative finding from the journals that it has been regularly enacted before it can be given any force whatever; nor have we been able to find any cases going to that extent. We may therefore dismiss that construction from further consideration, though to us it seems to follow more logically from the course of the argument of respondent than does that upon which, under the authorities, he must rest his case.

As a basis for our further discussion, then, it may be accepted as a fact that all of the courts hold that these enrolled bills are prima facie the law, and that they must be given force as such until their invalidity is suggested in some proceeding. Yet to hold that signatures of the presiding officers to the bill are not necessary. Speer v. Alleghany & M. Pl. Road Co., 22 Pa. 378; Cottrell v. State, 9 Neb. 128.

The fact of passage might be determined from the journals. Leavenworth County Comrs. v. Higginbotham, 17 Kan. 62.

Although if the enrollment was to be considered as a record the signatures of the presiding officers to the bill would be essential, as was held in an Ohio case. State v. Klesewetter, 45 Ohio St. 263.

The New York decisions.

The New York decisions are not very satisfactory on this question. The early cases held that—

The objection that the act was not passed by the constitutional majority cannot be taken by demurrer. Thomas v. Dakin, 23 Wend. 9.

In Warner v. Beers, 23 Wend. 172, it is intimated that the bill is conclusive with the possible exception of the question whether or not it received the vote required by the constitution.

In Hunt v. Van Alstyne, 25 Wend. 605, the chief justice stated that in his opinion the court could not go behind the certificate of the presiding officers to determine whether or not the bill received the constitutional majority.

In Commercial Bank of Buffalo v. Sparrow, 2 Denio, 97, it was held that the original act may be inspected, but as that referred simply to the enrolled bill as against the printed one, the case is not very valuable on this question.

In People v. Purdy, 2 Hill, 84, it is stated that the court may look beyond the printed statute back to the enrolled bill, and that case was affirmed on that point in 4 Hill, 384, while Senators Page and Franklin were of opinion that the investigation might extend to the journals. The court may examine the original law on file in the office of the secretary of state. And it seems that the journals 23 L. R. A.

may also be consulted. De Bow v. People, 1 Denio, 9.

The later cases have likewise exhibited an uncertainty which suggests a doubt as to what is the rule in that state.

It is not permissible to prove that a quorum was not present or that the yeas or nays were not entered on the journal. But the court states that the failure of the presiding officer to state that a required three-fifth majority were present at the passage of the act is not conclusive that it was not, but that fact can be shown by the journals. People v. Chenango Supra, 8 N. Y. 317.

Courts cannot go to the journals to impeach a statute. People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 299, 38 Am. Dec. 377.

Whenever the question arises as to the constitutionality of a statute the court may resort to any source of information which in its nature is original evidence of any fact relating to the inquiry including the journals of the legislature. People v. Petrea, 32 N. Y. 128.

The certificate to the original bill may be aided by the journals. Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 130 N. Y. 88.

Special circumstances.

The journals will not be searched to overthrow a law after it has been recognized and acted upon for a long period of years, in this case nearly ten. Mitchell v. Campbell, 19 Or. 198.

In case where the certificate of the proper officers raised a doubt as to whether or not the act had passed the court thought proper to look into the journals to determine that question. Burr v. Ross, 19 Ark. 250.

The legislative journals will not be consulted to determine the validity of an act creating a court which was duly enrolled, signed by the presiding his prima facie presumption attaches, and a conclusive one does not, seems to us to be illogical in the highest degree. Besides, there is something ridiculous in holding that there can be such a thing as a prima facie law. It is true that it is frequently the duty of courts and citizens to accept certain things as prima facie proof of what the law is, but that is an entirely different proposition from holding that a certain thing is prima facie a law. An act of the legislature, when regularly on file in the office of the secretary of state, is, and must necessarily be, either a law or not a law; and it is preposterous to hold that that which is the law is so only prima facie, or to hold that that which is in fact not a law is even prima facie so. What constitutes the statutory law of a state must necessarily be an absolute proposition, and not simply a prima facie one. The statutes published by authority do not purport to be the law; they only purport to be copies of the law as it is, and prima facie show that fact. It is perfectly competent for the legislature not only to so provide, but it may in almost any other way provide what may prima facie be taken to have the force and effect of the original law, but this is the extent to which the legislature can go. It can provide various methods of proving the existence of the original law other than its actual production, but the entire force of all these substitutes is to show what the original law on file in the office of the secretary of state is. The enrolled bill on file is either what it purports to be,—a law regularly passed through the legislature,—or it is nothing whatever. If it was in fact regularly passed, it is a law; not simply prima facie a law, but conclusively so. If the courts can give any force whatever to the fact that it has not been regularly passed through the legislature, then the courts must take it as the facts show, and cannot, in the event of its not having been regularly passed through the legislature, give it any force whatever. But, as we have seen, there are none of the courts but what go so far as to hold that such enrolled bills are prima facie the law. Upon what ground can they do this? We are unable to discover but one ground upon which any satisfactory reasoning can be founded, and that is because they are the final records of the acts of the legislative department, regularly certified by it, as required by the constitution, for the information and guidance of the other departments of the government. If they are not such final records, then the placing of them on file, signed and approved, can be no more than one of the steps devolving upon the legislature in making a law, and, until the other necessary steps are also made to appear, there is nothing to show the court in any manner whatever that the necessary steps to make it a law have been taken. It seems therefore to follow as a necessary conclusion that all of the courts have looked upon these enrolled bills as the final records of the legislative department in the enactment of law, and, if this is so, why should they not be given the sanctity and force incident to final records? If they are final rec-officers of each house, approved by the governor, and promulgated with the other laws of the session in a collateral attempt to impeach a judgment of the court by showing that it was not lawfully constitutional. Comstock v. Tracey, 46 Fed. Rep. 163.

What evidence may be considered.

The court will not go behind the journals. Wise v. Bigger, 79 Va. 266; Miller v. Goodwin, 70 Ill. 659. Courts will not go behind the act itself, the enrolled bill, and the journals. Hughes v. Felton, 11 Colo. 439.

Parol evidence is not admissible to impeach the enrolled bill. State v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 343.

In deciding that extrinsic evidence cannot be given to show that proper notice was not given of the introduction of a local law, the court said: "The legislative journals are the only evidence which courts can receive in an attack of this kind upon the constitutionality of an act." Speer v. Athens, 9 L. R. A. 402, 85 Ga. 49.

As to the consideration of extrinsic evidence to show unconstitutionality of statute, see note to Stevenson v. Colgan (Cal.) 14 L. R. A. 459.

Evidence.

The impeaching evidence must be offered. The appellate court will not examine the journals for the first time when the case reaches it. Bedard v. Hall, 44 Ill. 91; Groh v. Cushman, 45 Ill. 119.

Evidence to overthrow the statute must be introduced to the trial court. State v. Brown, 33 S. C. 151.

The court will not take judicial notice of the journals. Burt v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 31 Minn. 472.

The invalidity of a statute cannot be proved by admissions of the parties. Happel v. Brethauer, 70 Ill. 167, 32 Am. Rep. 70, 23 L. R. A.

Parties cannot stipulate that the act was not properly passed. Atty-Gen. v. Rice, 64 Mich. 385.

Collateral decisions.

Many of the decisions which are sometimes referred to as authorities upon the question whether or not the court could look into the journals to determine the existence or constitutionality of a statute have turned upon the question of the effect of the failure of the journals to state certain facts and are therefore of no positive authority upon the main question, and are valuable merely as showing the policy of the court in reference to going behind the enrolled bill.

Among the cases of that class are the following: South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U. S. 260, 24 L. ed. 154; Amoskeag Nat. Bank v. Ottawa, 105 U. S. 667, 26 L. ed. 1204; Illinois v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 33 Fed. Rep. 761; Harrison v. Gordy, 57 Ala. 49; Walker v. Griffith, 60 Ala. 361; Hall v. Steele, 82 Ala. 532; Jennings v. Russell, 92 Ala. 603; Vinsant v. Knox, 27 Ark. 268; English v. Oliver, 28 Ark. 317; State v. Little Rock & M. R. Co. 31 Ark. 701; State v. Crawford, 35 Ark. 237; People v. Dunn, 80 Cal. 212; Territory v. O'Connor, 3 L. R. A. 355, 5 Dak. 307; Schuyler County Suprs. v. People, 25 Ill. 181; Wabash R. Co. v. Hughes, 38 Ill. 189; State v. Robertson, 41 Kan. 200; Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Manhattan, 45 Kan. 419; State v. Hastings, 24 Minn. 78; State v. Peterson, 38 Minn. 142; Lincoln v. Haugan, 45 Minn. 451; Hull v. Miller, 4 Neb. 503; State v. Van Duyn, 24 Neb. 588; Mumford v. Sewall, 11 Or. 71, 50 Am. Rep. 462; Bond Debt Cases, 12 S. C. 200; State v. McConnell, 3 Lea. 322; Williams v. State, 6 Lea. 549; Blessing v. Galveston, 42 Tex. 641; Bound v. Wisconsin Cent. R. Co. 45 Wis. 542.

The court looked into the journals in Division of Howard County, 15 Kan. 194, without deciding whether or not it had the right to do so, but held ords in any sense whatever, it is because under the provisions of the constitution, interpreted in the light of the universal practice of legislative bodies, it must be held that such bodies are authorized to make up an authoritative record certified in a certain way, and that this record, when so made up, carries with it as a necessary import the fact that all the steps which led up to the making of such record have been regularly taken; and, if from such record it can be prima facie presumed that all the necessary steps have been taken, it seems to logically follow that such facts should be conclusively presumed therefrom. The legislature is a co-ordinate branch of the government, and cannot in any sense be said to be an inferior body. Consequently its final record, when certified and recorded as required by the constitution, imports absolute verity. There is no reason why the final record thus made up by the legislative department of the government should not be conclusive of the fact that all the steps necessary to make up such record had been regularly taken, the same as the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is of all the facts necessary to sustain it. The decree of a court of general jurisdiction, if fair upon its face, proves itself, and is conclusive of all the facts necessary to sustain it, and, upon principle, the same rule should obtain as to the final record of the legislature in the enactment of a law. In this regard it may be suggested that the final record of a court of general jurisdiction may be attacked upon several grounds, and the attack sustained by proof of what occurred in the progress of the case before it was made up. This is only true when such attack is made in a direct proceeding against such record, and never when the same is brought in question collaterally; and, as there is no method provided by the constitution or laws for a direct attack upon an enrolled bill, it follows that, if an attack upon it is to be made at all, it must be made in a collateral proceeding; hence the point we are trying to make is aided, instead of met, by such suggestion.

But it is argued with great force on the part of the respondent that if the courts do not look into the proceedings of the legislature, and set aside laws when not enacted with the formalities required by the constitution, the legislature can at pleasure nullify all such provisions. This is no doubt true, and it is upon this line of reasoning that those courts which have gone behind the enrolled bill have justified themselves in so doing. This line of reasoning seems to assume that the judicial department is charged with seeing that all the mandatory provisions of the constitution are complied with. But is this a reasonable construction in view of the theory of our government, and the principles enunciated in our constitution? Each of the three departments into which the government is divided are equal, and each department should be held responsible to the people that it represents, and not to the other departments of the government, or either of them. What are the respective duties of these departments? They may be briefly stated thus: The legislature enacts laws, and is commanded by the constitution to enact them in a certain way. The executive enforces the laws, and by the constitution it is made his duty to take certain steps looking towards such enforcement in the manner prescribed therein upon the happening of certain contingencies. The judicial department is charged with the duty of interpreting the laws, and adjudging rights and obligations thereunder. What is the law upon which the judicial department must thus determine rights and obligations? It is—First, the constitution of the state; second, so much of the common law as is in force here, and the laws of the legislature; and, third, the acts of the executive department in those matters in which, under the constitution, it is given the power to exercise discretion under certain contingencies. Such being the respective duties of the several departments, that even by so doing, the enrolled bill was not avoided.

In Norman v. Kentucky Managers of Worlds Columbian Exposition, 18 L. R. A. 556, 93 Ky.—, the question is not decided, but there is a valuable discussion of principles and authorities in the dissenting opinion.

In Bradley v. West, 80 Mo. 33, the court decided the case on the ground that the question cannot be raised in the supreme court for the first time.

In Lyman v. Martin, 2 Utah, 136, the question was raised but not decided.

The enrolled bill is the best evidence as between it and the printed statutes. Central R. Co. v. Hearn, 32 Tex. 546.

The printed law may be rebutted. Meracle v. Down, 64 Wis. 323.

Vacillation of judicial opinion.

It will be noticed that in many instances decisions from the same state appear on both sides of the question, and it is a fact that many of the states have changed their rule once, and sometimes two or more times, and in some instances where judges have felt themselves bound by precedent to follow the rule established they have expressed their dissatisfaction with it and their conviction that the rule which had not been adopted in their state was the proper one.

As illustrations of the change of opinion see the New York decisions cited supra. Compare Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294, with United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 321; Fowler v. Pierce, 2 Cal. 165, and Well v. Kenfield, 54 Cal. 111, with Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 266, 39 Am. Dec. 93, although in California there was a change of constitutional requirements which may account for the second change of opinion. Examine also the Mississippi and Indiana and Texas decisions as cited supra. The Missouri decisions also show some change. In fact the court seems to be exceptional which has adopted at the outset a rule which has proved perfectly satisfactory.

In State v. Moore, 36 Neb.—, the court in following State v. McLelland, 18 Neb. 236, 53 Am. Rep. 814, says: "Were the question a new one, they would say that a bill duly deposited and authenticated would import absolute verity."

In Webster v. Little Rock, 44 Ark. 536, the writer of the opinion expressed his individual preference for the English doctrine but followed the precedents of the state.

it seems to us that the acts of each of them, when certified as required by the constitution, or by such a universal course of practice as to have the force of a constitutional provision, should be conclusive upon each of the other departments; and there would seem to be no more impropriety in the legislature seeking to go behind the final record of a court, for the purpose of determining whether or not it had obeyed the constitutional directions in making such a record, than there would be in the courts seeking to go behind the final record made by the legislative department. As we have seen, the executive, under the constitution, is charged with doing certain things upon certain contingencies happening, and under the constitution he is given no power thus to act excepting upon such contingency; yet if the governor determines that such contingency exists, and acts in pursuance thereof, no court, so far as we have been able to see, has ever sought to inquire into the fact as to whether or not the contingency upon which the governor had founded his action in fact existed. For instance, under the constitution, the governor is authorized to convene the legislature upon extraordinary occasions, and there would seem to be the same reason for a court refusing to give force to his proclamation thus convening the legislature if upon investigation it found that the extraordinary occasion upon which the governor had assumed to act did not in fact exist as there would be to go back of the record made by the legislature. To preserve the harmony of our form of government it must be held that these several mandatory provisions are addressed to the department which is called upon to perform them, and that neither of the other departments can in any manner coerce that department into obedience thereto. Courts have gone behind the final records of the legislative department upon what seems to us a false theory. They have assumed that the mandatory provisions of the constitution are safer if the enforcement thereof is intrusted to the judicial department than if so intrusted to the legislature; in other words, they have acted upon the presumption that their department is the only one in which sufficient integrity exists to insure the preservation of the constitution. How the courts have obtained this idea is somewhat difficult to ascertain, but that they entertain it, and have allowed it to influence their decisions, is so evident that even a superficial examination of such decisions will satisfy any one of the fact.

But it is said that all courts assume some superiority over the legislature, for the reason that they refuse to give force to an act which upon its face violates some provision of the constitution. A brief examination will show that such conclusion is unwarranted by the fact stated. The courts are called upon to adjudicate rights under the laws of the state. Those laws are made up of the provisions of the constitution, the common law, and the acts of the legislature, and the acts of the executive when by the constitution he is authorized to act in such a way as to affect rights or obligations. The constitution comes to all of the departments directly from the people, and is the supreme law of the land, and can in no manner be changed or affected by the action of either the legislative or executive department. The rest of the law comes to each of such departments, authenticated in the way the constitution or custom requires, from the hands of the other departments; and though they each take it as verity, and give it the full force which it can derive as the expressed will of the department from which it emanates, yet when it comes in conflict with the constitution, it must yield, for the reason that such constitution has a sanction greater than could be given by the action of all of the departments, and must stand as against the action of any one or all of them. Upon principle, then, in view of the division into departments under our form of government, each of equal authority, one department cannot rightfully go behind the final record certified to it or to the public from either of the other departments; and the judicial department is no more justified in going behind the final act of the legislature to see if it has obeyed every mandatory provision of the constitution than has the legislature to go back of the final record made by the courts to see whether or not they have complied with all constitutional requirements. If we investigate the question in the light of authority, and analyze the cases upon the subject in the light of the principle at the bottom thereof, it will be found that the overwhelming weight of authority is in favor of the proposition that courts will not go back of the enrolled bills on file in the secretary of state's office. It is true that a large number of courts have held that they would investigate the proceedings of the legislature to see if constitutional requirements had been complied with, but even these courts have nearly all of them conceded that the older decisions clearly establish the doctrine that such enrolled acts are conclusive, and have yielded their assent to such doctrine under the constitutions existing at the time the older cases were decided. They have argued, however, that, for the reason that the newer constitutions contain many provisions mandatory upon the legislature as to its practice in enacting laws, the courts must see to it that such mandatory provisions are enforced, and, as they cannot do this if they hold to said doctrine they must refuse so to do, and look to the proceedings of the legislature which culminated in the enrolled act. If the courts are justified in the position above suggested, that the judicial department is superior to the others, this reasoning will have force; otherwise, it cannot.

It is further argued that, from the fact that most constitutions recently adopted contain an increased number of mandatory directions to the legislature, the courts are justified in changing the old rule, and in going behind the enrolled act to see that the legislature obeys such directions. We are unable to see any force in such an argument. Under every government which has as a part thereof a legislature, certain formalities on the part of such legislature are necessary before any subject-matter can be given the force of law; and, if the courts could not properly inquire into the fact as to whether or not such formalities had been complied with when but a single one was enjoined upon the legislature, there can be no good reason why it could do so when several are thus enjoined. The theory upon which the courts refused to go behind the enrolled bill when only such single formality was required was that the enrolled bill was a final record, and imported verity; and, if it imported verity when the one formality was required, why should it not import like verity when more than one is required? Under no government of this form could a bill become a law without the vote of a majority of a quorum in its favor, as such must be taken to be a part of the constitution, either written or unwritten, of every government proceeding according to any constitutional form whatever. If the alleged want of any requirement would justify going behind the enrolled bill, it would seem that it would be the one that a quorum was not present when the bill purported to have been passed, for the reason that such an allegation would not only show that a formality required by every constitution before a bill should become a law had been omitted, but would also show that a legal legislature had not been present at that time; yet, when such requirement was the principal one, substantially all of the courts held that the enrolled bill imported verity, and could not be attacked by showing that a quorum was not present when it was passed. The cases were not only practically uniform when such single formality was required, but they so continued even after they were called upon to adjudicate as to the effect of such enrolled acts, where some provisions of the constitution as mandatory as any of ours were in full force; and, in many of the states where such formalities were required by the constitution, there was fully as mandatory a provision as to the keeping of a journal, and requiring these formalities to be made of record therein, as is that in our constitution. This course of decisions continued for a long time, until at last some of the appellate courts seemed to assume that it was their duty, not only to supervise inferior courts, but also the other departments of the government.

We shall hereafter review a few of the many cases upon this subject, but at this point a word as to the opportunities for fraud growing out of the holding of such enrolled bills to be conclusive as compared with the contrary holding. We have already seen the disastrous results of the contrary holding in its general effect upon the community, and even a superficial examination of the question will show that the opportunities for committing a fraud upon the members of the legislature themselves will be much greater if the journals are allowed to control than they would be if the enrolled act is held conclusive. The enrolled acts are prepared with some care, and, under the rules of our legislature and of every legislative body of which we have any knowledge, some committee is charged with the responsibility of seeing that such enrolled bills are compared with the one which actually passed the legislature before they are presented to the presiding officer for signature. There is therefore some protection thrown around these enrolled acts, and it would be a difficult matter for any one through carelessness or fraud to prevent the will of the legislature, as expressed in the bill actually passed, being embodied in the enrollment thereof. But, if the doctrine be once established that the fact that such bill had passed can be negated by the journal, there would be very little to prevent a bill which had been properly passed being defeated by the carelessness or fraud of the journal clerk or some employé under him. Under the practice prevailing in the legislature of this state, and in most of the other states, there is very little assurance that the journal will fully and accurately show the proceedings of the body for which it is kept. The practice in nearly all such bodies is to have the journal read, if read at all, from loose slips of paper, made up partly in writing and partly by pasted slips, and, after being thus read, ordered approved. It is also a fact of which every one has knowledge that often upon such reading there is such inattention on the part of the members of the legislature that gross errors might pass unnoticed. The journal, as thus read and approved from loose slips of paper, is then passed to the journal clerk, and by him, or under his direction, transcribed into a book, and the slips then carelessly preserved or entirely destroyed. The transcription of these minutes, without any further action on the part of the legislature, or of any person but the one who makes it, except superficial examination by the journal clerk, and possibly by the presiding officer, becomes the formal journal. It follows that the chances of mistake are very great, and for fraud upon the part of the copyist even greater. The constitution requires that there should be a majority of the body recorded as voting in favor of a bill upon its final passage. Upon such passage the bill in fact receives one or two more than such constitutional majority, and is duly passed; but if, by carelessness or fraud, the copyist should change one or two of the names of those voting, from the affirmative to the negative, the will of the legislature, regularly expressed, would be defeated; and the same result might follow if in copying he should omit a name. Not only would such results follow in the cases specified, but in many other ways the least error in making up or transcribing the journal might result in the defeat of the will of the legislature. Unless the method of keeping journals should at once be revolutionized, and so much attention be paid to them that they will be made to absolutely represent all the doings of the body to such an extent as to very much prolong the sessions of the legislature, the sanctity of legislative enactments will be entirely dependent upon the carefulness and good faith of some copyist employed by the legislature at a few dollars a day. Much less evil will grow out of a course of decision which will give the people to understand that the legislative is a department of the government, of as high authority as the judicial, and that with the mandatory provisions directed to it the other departments of the government have no concern. When this is once well understood, the people will see to it that such mandatory provisions are complied with by the legislature, or, if they do not, the blame must rest upon themselves or the system of government which has as its basis the equal authority of the three departments into which it is divided.

We shall not attempt to review to any great extent the cases upon this subject. They are very numerous, and the older ones almost universally recognize the conclusiveness of the enrolled acts, and, even under mandatory constitutional provisions of substantially the same effect as our own, there are enough of the states which have adhered to the old doctrine to furnish us abundant authority for so doing, especially as such a course will, in our opinion, best subserve the public interest. The reasoning of the cases which uphold such doctrine is much more satisfactory than that of those upon the other side, for, as we have seen, the reasoning of the latter class of cases is founded upon the assumption that the courts are the guardians of all the mandatory provisions of the constitution, whether addressed to the judiciary, legislative, or executive department. This seems to us to be an untenable position, and, if it is, the reasoning of this class of cases is worthy of very little consideration. While, upon the other side, the cases have for their sanction not only a course of decisions running back hundreds of years, but are also abundantly supported by the reasoning therein contained, founded upon the nature and form of our government, and upon grounds of public policy. In our review of the cases upon the subject we shall omit entirely all reference to the older ones, as it is conceded that they are substantially all in favor of the proposition that the enrolled acts are conclusive. We shall confine ourselves to the cases which may be called modern, and substantially to those in states which have one or more provisions in their constitution directed to the legislature as mandatory as any in our own and where, by the provisions of the constitution, the legislature is required to keep and publish a journal of its proceedings.

The Constitution of the United States expressly requires a quorum of congress to be present for the transaction of business. It further requires that congress should keep a journal of its proceedings, and publish the same from time to time. In Marshall Field & Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649, 38 L. ed. 294, the effect which the court would give to an enrolled act was directly passed upon, and, after an elaborate consideration, it was held that the court must accept it as conclusive proof that it had been regularly passed by congress. This case is entitled to more than ordinary consideration, for the reason that it was briefed by counsel of national reputation, and involved questions of the greatest magnitude. It is contended by respondent that much of the force of this case is lost by reason of the fact that the number of mandatory provisions in the Constitution of the United States is small compared with that in our own, but since, as we have attempted to show, the single requirement was of the most radical character, and went to the foundation of our form of government, such fact can in no manner detract from the force of the decision. And we cannot agree with the further contention of the respondent that the judge who wrote the opinion intended to give any force to this line of argument in the reference therein made to the course of decisions in the states which had, as a part of their constitution, numerous mandatory provisions of this nature. We look upon the use of such language as having been simply by way of argument, and as tending to show that, even although the decisions in such states might be warranted under their constitutional provisions, yet such fact did not necessarily militate against the position taken by him.

In the state of Louisiana, when the constitution of that state contained, among other mandatory provisions, one requiring it to keep a journal, and the express provision that "no bill shall have the force of a law until on three several days it be read in each house of the general assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless four fifths of the house where the bill is pending may deem it expedient to dispense with that rule," the supreme court of that state, in the case of Louisiana State Lottery Co. v. Richour, 23 La. Ann. 743, 8 Am. Rep. 602, directly held that the enrolled bill was conclusive upon the courts of the fact that all constitutional requirements had been complied with in its passage. In Whited v. Lewis, 25 La. Ann. 568, the question was again before the court, and the same doctrine was unhesitatingly announced.

The constitution of the state of Mississippi contained many provisions as mandatory as any in our constitution, and in Green v. Weller, 32 Miss. 650, after a most elaborate consideration, it was adjudged by the supreme court of that state that the enrolled act was conclusive. Under the particular facts of that case, there was some division of opinion among the members of the court, for the reason that the bill the effect of which they were passing upon was one providing for a constitutional amendment, and some of them thought that proposals for amendments to the constitution should stand upon a different basis than other acts of the legislature; but they all agreed that the rule would obtain in full force when applied to an ordinary act of the legislature. In Suann v. Buck, 40 Miss. 268, the same court had before it the question of the effect to be given to an enrolled act on file in the proper office, and held directly that such acts, when enrolled, signed by the presiding officers of the two houses, approved by the governor, and deposited in the office of the secretary of state, had all the legal incidents of a record, imported absolute verity, and could not be impeached. In Brady v. West, 50 Miss. 68, this court seems to have inclined to the contrary doctrine; but in Ex parte Wren, 63

Mias. 512, 56 Am. Rep. 825, after a very full consideration of all the cases, the court returned to the doctrine originally announced, and showed by the most cogent reasoning that such enrolled acts were and must necessarily be conclusive upon the courts.

In the constitution of the state of New Jersey there were many mandatory provisions directed to the legislature, among which was one requiring a majority of all the members to vote in favor of the final passage of a bill before it became a law by ayes and nays to be entered upon the journal. In State v. Young, 32 N. J. L. 29, the question under discussion was passed upon by the court of errors and appeals of that state, and, after most elaborate consideration, it was held that the courts could not go behind the enrolled act.

The state of Indiana has several provisions in its constitution of the mandatory nature of which we have been speaking; yet its supreme court has in a number of cases decided that the prior proceedings of the legislature could not be gone into for the purpose of affecting the validity of the enrolled act on file in the office of the secretary of state. One of such cases was that of Eans v. Browne, 30 Ind. 514, 95 Am. Dec. 710, in which the court made use of language which so well meets the position taken by many who argue against the rule which we are contending that we quote a portion thereof: "But it is argued that, if the authenticated roll is conclusive upon the courts, then less than a quorum of each house may, by the aid of corrupt presiding officers, impose laws upon the state in defiance of the inhibition of the constitution. It must be admitted that the consequence stated would be possible. Public authority and political power must, of necessity, be confided to officers, who, being human, may violate the trusts reposed in them. This, perhaps, cannot be avoided absolutely. But it applies also to all human agencies. It is not fit that the judiciary should claim for itself a purity beyond others; nor has it been able at all times with truth to say that its highest places have not been disgraced. The framers of our government have not constituted it with faculties to supervise co-ordinate departments, and correct or prevent abuses of their authority. It cannot authenticate a statute. That power does not belong to it. Nor can it keep the legislative journal. It ascertains the statute law by looking at its authentication, and then its function is merely to expound and administer it. It cannot, we think, look beyond that authentication, because of the constitution itself. If it may, then, for the same reason, it may go beyond the journal when that is impeached; and so the validity of legislation may be made to depend upon the memory of witnesses, and no man can in fact know the law, which he is bound to obey. Such consequences would be a large price to pay for immunity from the possible abuse of authority by the high officers who are, as we think, charged with the duty of certifying to the public the fact that a statute has been enacted by competent houses. Human governments must repose confidence in officers."

It may be abused, and there may be no remedy. Nor is there any great force in the argument, which seems to be regarded as of weight by some American courts, that some important provisions of the constitution would be a dead letter if inquiry may not be made by the courts beyond the rolls. This argument overlooks the fact that legislators are sworn to support the constitution, or else it assumes that they will willfully violate that oath. It is neither modest nor just for judges thus to impeach the integrity of another department of government, and to claim that the judiciary only will be faithful to its obligations."

In the state of California the courts have been upon both sides of the question. In the first case, reported in 2 Cal. 165 (Forster v. Pierce), it was held that the courts would go behind the enrolled act. But in Sherman v. Story, 30 Cal. 253, 89 Am. Dec. 93, the court, after a most thorough consideration of the question in all its aspects, and in an opinion showing great research and learning, rendered by that distinguished jurist, Judge Sawyer, came to the conclusion that the enrolled act was conclusive, and overruled the former case. This case, in our opinion, is entitled to great weight, for, although there has been an attempt to show that a different ruling would have obtained had the present constitution of California been in force, we are not satisfied that such would have been the case; for while it is true that the supreme court of that state, since the adoption of its new constitution, has gone back to its original position, the opinions in the cases in which it has done so show upon their face that they received no such consideration as did the one reported in 30 Cal., above cited. It is true that the distinguished jurist who wrote the opinion in Sherman v. Story, supra, afterwards, when holding a federal court, came to the conclusion that, under the new constitution of California, the courts were authorized to go behind the enrolled act, but we do not think that in the latter case his reasoning at all compares with that in the former, and it is probable that his mind was unconsciously influenced by the fact that the legislation embodied in the bill under consideration was so unjust that Judge Field, of the Supreme Court, was willing to set it aside, as being in violation of the Constitution of the United States. And here it may be remarked that in the great majority of cases, in which the courts have held that they could go behind the enrolled act, the legislation attacked has been of such a vicious nature that the mind of any honest judge would naturally seek some excuse by which its effect could be destroyed.

The constitution of Pennsylvania had mandatory provisions directed to its legislature of a pronounced type, and yet the supreme court of that state, in a comparatively recent decision,—that of Kilgore v. Magee, 85 Pa. 401,—fully recognized the doctrine for which we are contending, and, in its opinion therein rendered, made use of the following pertinent language: "In regard to the passage of the law, and the alleged disregard of the forms of legislation required by the constitution, we think the subject is not within the pale of judicial inquiry. So far as the duty and the consciences of the members of the legislature are involved, the law is mandatory. They are bound by their oaths to obey the constitutional mode of proceeding, and any intentional disregard is a breach of duty and a violation of their oaths. But when a law has been passed and approved, and certified in due form, it is no part of the duty of the judiciary to go behind the law as duly certified to inquire into the observance of form in its passage. The presumption applies to the act of passing the law that applies generally to the proceedings of any body whose sole duty it is to deal with the subject. The presumption in favor of regularity is essential to the peace and order of the state. If every law could be contested in the courts on the ground of informality in its enactment, the floodgate of litigation would be opened so widely, society would be deluged in the flow."

In Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 538, the supreme court of that state, after a review of the authorities pro and con, decided that the enrolled act was conclusive upon the courts.

In Pacific Railroad v. The Governor, 28 Mo. 353, 66 Am. Dec. 673, the supreme court of that state, in sustaining the doctrine for which we are contending, made use of the following language: "The constitution is designed to limit the powers of the government, and to confine each of the departments to its appropriate sphere. If the legislature exceed its powers in the enactment of a law, the courts, being sworn to support the constitution, must judge that law by the standard of the constitution, and declare its validity. But the question whether a law on its face violates the constitution is very different from that growing out of the noncompliance with the forms required to be observed in its enactment. In the one case, a power is exercised not delegated, or which is prohibited, and the question of the validity of the law is determined from the language of it; in the other, the law is not in its terms contrary to the constitution. On its face it is regular, but resort is had to something behind the law itself in order to ascertain whether the general assembly in making the law was governed by the rules prescribed for its action by the constitution. This would seem like an inquisition into the conduct of the members of the general assembly, and it must be seen at once that it is a very delicate power, the frequent exercise of which must lead to endless confusion in the administration of the law."

In State v. Robinson, 81 N. C. 409, this question, in principle, was passed upon, and the peculiar circumstances render it particularly pertinent to the question now under discussion. In that case an act had regularly passed the legislature, but had failed to receive the signature of one of the presiding officers, and it was sought to give it force by proving the fact of its regular enactment otherwise than by the enrolled bill properly signed. The court held that this could not be done; that the enrolled bill was the final record of the legislature in the enactment of a law; and that such final record was the only thing of which the court could take notice.

The constitution of the state of Texas abounded in mandatory provisions of the most positive nature, directed to the legislature; yet in the recent case of Ex parte Tipton, 28 Tex. App. 438, it was held, after full consideration, that the courts could not go behind the enrolled act for any purpose whatever.

In State v. Swift, 10 Nev. 176, 95 Am. Dec. 710, this question was fully considered, and, in the opinion therein rendered, the matter very ably argued, and the conclusion reached that enrolled bills are conclusive.

In addition to the above cases we have examined each of the following cases, and cite them as being directly in point upon the question which we are discussing: People v. Burt, 43 Cal. 560; Standard Underground Cable Co. v. Atty. Gen. 46 N. J. Eq. 270. And the following cases, which, though not so directly in point, clearly sustain the principle for which we are contending: Duncombe v. Prindle, 12 Iowa, 1; Clare v. State, 5 Iowa, 509; Eld v. Gorham, 20 Conn. 8; Warner v. Beers, 23 Wend. 172; Hunt v. Van Alstyne, 25 Wend. 605; People v. Devlin, 83 N. Y. 269, 88 Am. Dec. 377; People v. Marlborough Highway Comrs. 54 N. Y. 276, 13 Am. Rep. 581; Fouke v. Fleming, 13 Md. 392; Bender v. State, 53 Ind. 254; Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244; Passaic County Chosen Freeholders v. Stetenson, 46 N. J. L. 173.

This citation of cases not only furnishes us abundant authority for holding that the enrolled acts are conclusive, but equally good reason for so holding appears in what has been said by the courts of the states in which the contrary doctrine obtains. In recent opinions rendered in several cases in the courts of these states, the judges, while recognizing the fact that the rule was so well settled there that they could not properly change it, have expressed regret that the rule which holds to the conclusiveness of such enrolled bills had not been adopted therein. Even in the state of Illinois, where the courts have established a rule of the utmost liberality as to their right to go behind the enrolled acts, the judge who pronounced the decision of the supreme court of that state, in a comparatively recent case,—that of People v. Starnes, 35 Ill. 136,—seems to clearly indicate that he regretted that a different rule had not been adopted by the courts of that state. If in that state, which may be said to have been the leader upon that side of the question, even a doubt is expressed as to the policy of the rule there adopted, it is a fact so pertinent that it is entitled to great consideration when a rule upon this subject is to be first announced by the courts of a state.

In our opinion, authority, reason, public policy, and convenience require us to hold that the enrolled bill on file, when fair upon its face, must be accepted without question by the courts, as having been regularly enacted by the legislature.

It follows that the act under consideration is a part of the statute law of the state, and that thereunder it was the duty of the respondent to have approved the bond of the relator, and, he having refused to perform this duty, a peremptory writ of mandamus must issue requiring such action on his part.

NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL, ex rel. George T. WERTS, Governor, c.

Maurice A. ROGERS et al.

(.....N. J.)

1. The judicial department has jurisdiction to decide which of two rival bodies, each claimed to be the state senate, is the constitutional body.
2. The president of the senate is an officer whose title can be tested by quo warranto, under a statute providing that remedy in case of any office or franchise within the state.
3. The senate of New Jersey is not a permanent, continuous body, such that the old or hold-over members are entitled to pass upon the title of the newly elected members, but the latter are entitled to enter the body, since the constitution appoints a day on which "the two houses shall meet separately," imposing the duty of yearly organization, and also provides that the senate shall be composed of "one senator from each county," thus entitling each senator to a voice in all proceedings.

ON RULE to show cause why leave should not be granted to the Attorney-General to exhibit an information in the nature of a quo warranto against defendants for usurping, introducing into, and unlawfully holding and exercising the office of president of the senate of the state of New Jersey. Judgment in favor of defendant Rogers.

Statement by Beasley, Ch. J.:

The facts are substantially as follows:

On the 21st day of February, 1894, the attorney-general presented to this court the petition of the relator, who is the governor of the state, setting forth that the defendants each claimed to be possessed of the office of president of the senate of New Jersey, with all the rights, powers, and privileges appertaining to that office, and that each of them, in pursuance of such claim, is actually engaged in exercising the functions of said office. The petition shows that the interests of the people of this state are being greatly imperiled by these conflicting claims, and that a speedy determination of the same is imperatively demanded, in the interest of good government and public order. On the filing of this petition, a rule was granted requiring the defendants to show cause before this court why leave should not be given to the attorney-general to exhibit an information in the nature of a quo warranto against them, and each of them, for usurping, intruding into, and unlawfully holding and exercising the office of president of the senate of the state of New Jersey. Leave was also given to all parties to take affidavits, to be used on the return of the rule. The attorney-general immediately gave notice to both defendants of the taking of affidavits before a supreme court commissioner on the 24th day of February last. At the time designated, both defendants appeared in person and by counsel, and the examination of witnesses was proceeded with. On behalf of the attorney-general and the relator only two witnesses were examined. They were Samuel C. Thompson, secretary of the body which elected Robert Adrain president, and Wilbur A. Mott, secretary of the body which elected Maurice A. Rogers. Several witnesses were sworn on behalf of Maurice A. Rogers, and one on behalf of Robert Adrain. The testimony was closed on Wednesday, February 28, and the parties are now here to present their case.

The state of facts thus exhibited, in so far as it appears to be pertinent to this inquiry, is as follows: A short time before 3 o'clock on the afternoon of January 8, the nine Democratic hold-over senators assembled in the senate chamber. At about three minutes before 8 o'clock, Samuel C. Thompson, who was secretary of the session of 1893, called the senate to order, and Senator Daly offered a resolution naming Robert Adrain as president pro tempore. This resolution was immediately adopted. Robert Adrain thereupon took the chair, and, after waiting until 8 o'clock or later, ordered a roll call of the senate. The nine senators referred to alone answered to their names. There was then another wait of three or four minutes, ending in another roll call. To this roll call, also, only the nine senators referred to answered. Thereupon Senator Daly moved a recess of five minutes which motion was adopted. At about fifteen minutes past 8 o'clock the senate came to order again. At this time the four hold-over Republican senators, accompanied by the seven Republican senators-elect, entered the chamber, and took their seats on the floor. Immediately after the Republican senators had taken their seats,

NOTE.—The above decision is we believe the pioneer on the important question of the continuing existence of the senate and the right of the hold-over members to exclusive authority in organization of the body. The unseemly controversies and conflicts of authority between departments of government which have in recent years been shamefully frequent and sometimes alarming have at least done something to develop constitutional law relating to the powers of the different departments of government.

—3 L. R. A.

Robert Adrain, as presiding officer, ordered another roll call. The names of the hold-over senators, both Republican and Democratic, were called. At the conclusion of the call, the secretary announced, in a loud tone of voice: "Mr. President, there are thirteen senators present, and have answered to their names." The secretary testified that he believed the whole thirteen did answer to their names. He did not, however, swear positively that they did; and the evidence given by other witnesses makes it very clear, I think, that they did not. However, no objection was made by anybody to the announcement of the result of the roll call by the secretary as above mentioned, and the president thereupon declared that there was a quorum present. No objection appears to have been made by anybody to this declaration. While this roll call was proceeding, Senator Stokes, one of the hold-over Republican senators, arose, and entered a protest against the organization of the senate on account of its having been effected in the absence of the Republican senators. Senator Adrain ruled him out of order, on the ground that a roll call was in progress. At the conclusion of the roll call, Senator Adrain recognized Senator Stokes, and the latter said he arose to a question of the highest privilege, and asked Senator Adrain, as presiding officer, if the usual custom would be followed, and senators admitted on their credentials. Senator Adrain replied that he was only one of the body, and could not give the desired information. Senator Skirm, another of the Republican hold-over senators, then arose, and announced to Senator Stokes, without addressing the chair, that he had the credentials and affidavits of the seven newly elected Republican senators. At that point Senator Adrain stated that Senator Daly had a resolution which he thought would cover the matter and give the information desired. Thereupon Senator Daly, one of the Democratic hold-over senators, offered the following resolution: "Resolved, that all certificates of election or other credentials of those claiming seats in this senate by virtue of the election held on the 7th day of November, 1893, together with all protests, petitions, and other communications or papers presented to this senate concerning its membership, be in the first instance referred to a special committee of three, to be appointed by the president, which committee shall report upon the validity of such credentials, and shall make such report concerning such protests, petitions, communications or papers as shall be necessary." After the resolution was offered, Senator-Elect Voorhees, one of the newly elected Republican senators, arose in his seat, and attempted to address the chair, stating that he claimed his rights on the floor of the senate as senator-elect from the county of Union. Senator Adrain refused to recognize him, and ordered him to take his seat. Senator Voorhees declined to be seated, and Senator Adrain thereupon directed the sergeant at arms to seat him. Senator Voorhees still refused to be seated, and, after some further protest, invited the Republican senators and senators-elect to withdraw to one of the lobbies of the senate chamber, and they all immediately did so. No notice was taken of the withdrawal of the Republican senators by the nine Democratic senators. Soon after such withdrawal, the resolution last offered by Senator Daly was adopted, and a committee on credentials appointed. Immediately after such appointment, Senator Daly arose, and presented the credentials of Christopher S. Staats, a Democratic senator-elect from the county of Warren. These credentials were referred to the said committee, who immediately reported favorably upon them, and Senator Staats was thereupon admitted, sworn in, and took his seat.

Next, a resolution was passed, as follows: "Resolved, that no one shall be admitted to membership of this senate except on motion made for his admission, and its adoption by a majority of the qualified and admitted senators." Senator Daly then offered a resolution "that the officers of the session of 1893 be, and the same are hereby, appointed officers of this session, to hold until further orders shall be made concerning their positions by the vote of a majority of the qualified and admitted members of the senate." After the passage of this resolution, Senator Daly offered the following: "Resolved, that the president pro tempore of this senate shall hold said office of president until his successor shall be elected by the votes of a majority of the qualified and admitted members of the senate." This resolution was also adopted. A number of the old officers thereupon took the oath of office. The president, however, does not seem to have done so. This body, thus organized, continued in session some time after the passage of these resolutions, and transacted, or attempted to transact, considerable business. Among other things, it appointed a committee to wait upon the governor, and inform him that the senate had organized. It also directed the secretary of the senate to inform the house of assembly that the senate had organized. It also passed a resolution adopting the rules of the senate of 1893 for its guidance, and received and referred to committees, when appointed, three or four legislative bills. Ever since said organization, or attempted organization, this body has met as a senate, at intervals of not more than three days each. Its presiding officer has always been Robert Adrain. It recognizes him as president of the senate, and he claims to be such, we are informed, not only by virtue of his election as temporary president, and his after election as president until his successor should be elected, but also by virtue of his election as president at the beginning of the session of 1893. He has done no act as president, however, so far as the testimony discloses, except to preside over the deliberations of this body.

Upon the withdrawal of the Republican senators and senators-elect, as aforesaid, they proceeded at once to organize a senate in the lobby of the senate chamber, to which they had withdrawn, as above mentioned. Before proceeding with their organization, Senator Stokes stepped into the door opening from the lobby upon the floor of the senate chamber, and announced to the Democratic senators there remaining that the senate was about to proceed to organize, and requested them to participate in such organization. No notice was taken of this announcement, and the Republican senators proceeded to organize alone. Senator Stokes assumed the chairmanship of the meeting, and Wilbur A. Mott assumed the position of temporary secretary. The credentials of the newly elected Republican senators were produced and inspected, and handed to the secretary pro tempore. Those senators had taken the oath of office before appearing in the senate chamber, and their respective oaths were produced, with their credentials, and handed to the secretary pro tempore. The secretary thereupon called a roll of the senators, including those newly elected. The eleven Republican senators all answered to their names. Thereupon Senator Skirm moved that they go into an election of a president. Maurice A. Rogers was nominated, and upon a roll call he received eleven votes. A secretary and the usual number of officers of the senate were next elected by the same vote. After the officers were elected, they were all sworn in, including Maurice A. Rogers. Mr. Rogers thereupon took his seat as president of the senate. A committee was then appointed to wait upon the governor, and inform him that the senate was organized. A message was also received from the house of assembly to the effect that the assembly was duly organized, and had proceeded to business. The body thus organized has also been in session at intervals of not more than three days each ever since its organization. Senator Rogers regularly presides over it, and is recognized by it as president of the senate. It has passed bills, and Senator Rogers has authenticated them as president of the senate. It has also been recognized regularly and continuously by the house of assembly as the true senate, and has met in joint assembly with the house, and such assembly has elected, or attempted to elect, a state treasurer and comptroller.

Upon this state of facts, the attorney-general and the relator ask the court to determine which of these claimants, if either of them, is the true president of the senate of New Jersey.

Mr. R. V. Lindabury, for relator:

By our statute an information, with the leave of this court, lies at the suit of the attorney-general upon the relation of any person desiring to sue or prosecute the same against any person or persons who shall usurp, intrude into, or unlawfully hold or execute any office or franchise within this state.

Under this act any intruder into any office of a public character in this state may be judicially ousted by a proceeding in this court.

State v. Utter, 14 N. J. L. 84; State v. Meehan, 45 N. J. L. 190.

Is, then, the office of president of the senate a public office within the meaning of this act as interpreted by the courts?

The office is recognized in the Constitution in four places.

Art. 4, § 6, par. 7; art. 5, pars. 12-14.

The Act of February 14, 1845, vested in the president of the senate the powers, privileges, duties, and remunerations formerly granted to or imposed upon the vice-president of council.

Since the adoption of the constitution, the president of the senate has been made ex officio one of "the trustees for the support of public schools."

Rev. p. 1081, § 65; and a member of the "state board of education."

Rev. p. 1071, § 1.

It seems to me there can be no doubt that an office of this character, with these duties, is a public substantive one.

In State v. Meehan, supra, the court held that the jailor of the workhouse on the county farm of Hudson county is an officer against whom quo warranto would lie.

In State v. Utter, supra, an information was sustained against the deputy adjutant general of the Essex brigade of militia of Newark.

Maurice A. Rogers has presided over his senate, and has attested legislative bills as president of the senate. In so doing he is clearly guilty of a user of that office unless he has a title thereto. Besides he has taken the official oath to "perform all the duties of the office of president of the senate," according to the constitution, and that, by all the cases, is a sufficient user to support an information.

Rez v. Harwood, 2 East, 177; Rez v. Tate, 4 East, 387; People v. Callaghan, 83 Ill. 128.

I admit that the court cannot inquire into and determine the titles of these gentlemen without inquiring into and determining the status of the respective senates which elected them, but I deny that the court is without the power to do this for any of the reasons stated or for any other reason. To admit this proposition would be to elevate the legislature above the people; to nullify the provisions of the constitution which limit and control its powers, and to rob this court of its prerogative to pass upon all judicial questions that arise in the state, and are not committed by the constitution to other tribunals.

Nothing can be more obvious, than that power must exist in the judicial department of any constitutional government to pass in some way or other upon the constitutional existence of any body setting itself up as the law-making power.

In 1868 a man named Barstow usurped the governorship of Wisconsin. The attorney-general filed an information against him on the relation of the rightful governor. Barstow came into court and moved to dismiss the information on the ground that it would not lie against a man occupying the office of governor. He was represented by Matthew Carpenter and other distinguished counsel, who pressed the motion with the utmost zeal and ability. The court, however, refused to dismiss the information and finally gave judgment of ouster, holding that although it had no control over the executive department of the government it did have the power to ascertain and decide whether or not the executive held his office according to the constitution or was a mere usurper.

Atty.-Gen. v. Barstow, 4 Wis. 567; Boyd v. Nebraska, 148 U. S. 135, 36 L. ed. 108; State v. Bulkeley, 14 L. R. A. 657, 61 Conn. 287.

In the fall of 1879 a question arose in the state of Maine as to which of the two great political parties had elected a majority of the legislature.

The court said: "When different bodies of men, each claiming to be and to exercise the functions of, the legislative department of the state, appear, each asserting their titles, to be regarded as the law-givers for the people, it is the obvious duty of the judicial department, who must inevitably, at no distant day, be called to pass upon the validity of the laws that may be enacted by the respective claimants to legislative authority, to inquire and ascertain for themselves, with or without questions presented by the claimants, which of those bodies lawfully represents the people, from whom they derive their power. There can be but one lawful legislature. The court must know for itself whose enactments it will recognize as laws of binding force, whose levies of taxes it will enforce when brought judicially before it, whose choice of a prosecuting officer before the court it will respect. In a thousand ways it becomes essential that the court should forthwith ascertain and take judicial cognizance of the question: Which is the true legislature?"

70 Me. 609; Prince v. Skillin, 71 Me. 367, 36 Am. Rep. 825.

When a law passed by one of these legislatures was challenged, the court reaffirmed its former decision upon precisely the same grounds. In January, 1893, two houses of representatives, each claiming to have been elected by the people, met and organized in the state of Kansas.

The court took jurisdiction of the question and held that to be the legal house in which, at the time of the organization, there was a majority of duly certified members.

Re Gunn, 19 L. R. A. 519, 50 Kan. 155; Burnham v. Morrissey, 14 Gray, 238, 74 Am. Dec. 678.

But it has been argued, as the constitution makes the senate the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its members, and as the title of the defendants, respectively, depends, not so much upon the action of their respective senates, as upon the qualifications of the members of those senates to act, the court cannot try such titles without passing upon the very questions exclusively committed to the judgment of that tribunal.

Suppose that two houses of assembly should convene in this state. That one should be composed of twenty-nine certified members and thirty-one members without certificates. That the other should be composed of thirty-one certified members and twenty-nine members without certificates. That each should immediately organize itself into a court and pass upon the qualifications, election, and returns of all its members, and admit them to seats. The court could without difficulty, upon a proper case, determine which was the true house by determining which was organized according to the constitution. Trying them by that standard, it would be found that the true house was that body which organized with a quorum of certified members, and that the fact that the other body consisted of sixty members whose election, qualifications, and returns had been regularly passed upon by their fellows, would go for nothing because of the fact that the body which passed upon them was without jurisdiction as a court for want of a quorum.

Re Gunn, supra; State v. Tomlinson, 20 Kan. 692; State v. Francis, 26 Kan. 724.

No question can arise in this case as to the de facto existence of either of these bodies. As was pointed out by the judges in both Maine and Kansas cases, there can neither be two de facto legislatures, nor a de facto and de jure legislature at the same time.

McCrary, Elections, § 596.

Lord Brougham said, in Darley v. Reg., 12 Clark & F. 529: "My lords, I have one very material consideration, which inclines my mind, independently of the balance of authority, being, as I think with the learned chief justice it is, in favor of the judgment of the court below,—in favor of the defendant in error. I mean, that if there is not this remedy, there really is no other. It is necessary that there should be this remedy, or else a case like the present would be remediless."

Chief Justice Kinsey said, State v. Mid-dlesex County Justices & Freeholders, 1 N. J. L. 244: "The power of this court to give redress is as unlimited and universal as injustice and wrong can be. . . . No government can be properly carried on, unless a power resides somewhere to afford justice to every individual. . . . It is a rule that when you plead to the jurisdiction of the court, you must point out in your plea another court which has jurisdiction, and the reason is obvious,—the subject has a right to protection and redress somewhere. I never have heard it directly contended that injuries may be committed beyond the jurisdiction of every tribunal. If therefore this court has not cognizance of this cause, it was incumbent on the defendants to show where the injury complained of may be redressed; for to assert that a person injured is without redress in any court, is to say what never did exist under our constitution or the common law."

The objection that the question presented is political and not judicial cannot prevail.

McCrary, Elections, § 847; Cooley, Const. Lim. 786.

Mr. Cortlandt Parker, for respondent Rogers:

The Constitution declares (art. 8, Distribution of the powers of government): "The powers of the government shall be divided into three distinct departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person or persons belonging to, or constituting, one of these departments shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except as herein expressly provided."

And then it says (art. 4, § 4, pl. 2) "Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority shall constitute a quorum to do business."

The petition against Maurice A. Rogers states that the respondent was elected president of the senate by four men, called hold-over senators, joined with seven more, not denied to have credentials, but appearing to claim through such credentials to be senators elect of the senate. The court will take notice that eleven men are a majority of a legal New Jersey senate. So, upon the petition itself it appears that such a majority has elected the respondent. The only ground taken against him is that the credentials of seven of this majority had not been passed upon by the minority in an "attempt to organize a senate." Do not the members of this court seek to exercise the power belonging to the members of the senate when they review the question whether the respondent, for failure of form, or ceremony, or lack of votes, was or was not elected president of the senate? If they decide that he was not elected, is not that a decision which could be made, under the constitution, only by the majority itself?

The respondent Robert Adrain, was not elected president of the senate, or of a senate. He appears to have been elected president pro tempore, of a minority of the senate. So, the inquiry before the court is confined to the status of the respondent Rogers. He received eleven votes of senators, duly certified to be senators, elected, four before 1893, seven in 1893, at a meeting in state house, on the day appointed by law for them to convene. He has since regularly acted in that office. Why is he not president of the senate?

It is said, because, to be a senator, a man must not only be elected to that office, and certificated by legal credentials, but must also be admitted by the vote of those members who had in two former years been such, upon presentation of credentials which they must approve. This, because, say those who support this view, the senate is a continuous body to this:

I. The senate is no continuous body in the sense of one continuing from session to session. The members all continue members "until the second Tuesday in January of each year, at which time of meeting the legislative year begins."

Art. 4, §§ 1, 3.

During the period between their adjournment sine die, and the meeting of the new senate, the old subsists, but in a state of suspended animation. The governor, by calling a special meeting of the legislature, can break this suspended condition. The same is true of the house of assembly. It continues to exist—in identically the same way; that is, the members remain members for the year, without power to convene, except at the governor's call. When the time of meeting which begins the legislative year arrives, then the old members of the assembly go out and the new members take their places. And this is true of one third of the number of the senators. They go out and others take their places. The fact that all do not go out does not make the senators who remain constitute a body. They cannot do so till they meet their new fellows. Then the old and the new make up the senate of that year.

II. If the senate be a continuous body in any sense, its members possess no power to sit upon the right of their fellows in organization.

From 1789 to 1849, the practice year by year was that the record names all senators appearing, then states the new ones, and that they produced their credentials, generally adding that they were read, and then stating that they took their seats and were sworn in. Often men were sworn in and took their seats without producing credentials, sometimes because left at home—oftener, when presented before. All this preceded the resolution for notifying the house and the executive that a quorum was in session. In the 23d Congress, 1833, the journal is noticeable. A full list of members is given, then new ones named in it are mentioned and stated to have produced their credentials, been sworn in, and to have taken their seats.

Then occurs this entry: "The president communicated an act of the general assembly of Rhode Island declaring void the election of Asher Robbins, and a certificate by the governor of that state of the election of Elisha R. Potter." Then a motion was made to administer the oath to Mr. Robbins whose credentials were received at the last session. Mr. Benton then moved to refer the matter to a committee to consider and report. Ayes and nays being called that motion was lost. Then the motion to administer the oath was put and carried. The oath was administered and Mr. Robbins took his seat.

And then came the resolution of notification that a quorum was in session ready for business.

Throughout the long period examined, this is the city case in which action was formally taken upon the right of a member during the process of organization. And the vote of the court indorsed the law that not even the statute of the state represented declaring the election void, and the contesting credentials of a governor authorized considering the members' credentials.

Now when it is considered that there never has been any one legally enacted form for the credentials of a member,—that each state had its own,—the improbability that such credentials should not sometimes differ, and that during sixty years they never were referred, never appeared to have been examined, but were simply read or known or believed to exist, and that the rights of members elect were never affirmed by a vote of their fellows, except in this one case of contest, and never were denied, and that they took their seats, several times voting before their credentials were even read,—what becomes of the idea that the senate of the United States taken as the pattern of that of the state of New Jersey, justifies the assumption, whether it be a continuing body or not, that the hold-over members in our senate had the right to sit in judgment upon the credentials of their newly elected fellows, and, if they pleased, deny them the seats to which they were certified to have been elected by the people?

III. If any practice has obtained in the New Jersey senate of passing upon credentials of senators elect, it has no warrant of law, and is not obligatory. On the contrary it is a breach of the constitution.

IV. The constitution and the statutes rule, and under these the method of organization pursued by the eleven senators who elected the respondent president is legal and proper.

The Constitution says: "Members of the legislature shall, before they enter on the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation." Then comes the oath comprising allegiance to the Union, to the state, and faithful discharge of his official duty, and the section proceeds: "And members elect of the senate or general assembly are hereby empowered to administer to each other the said oath or affirmation."

Art. 4, §§ 1, 8.

Now taking this oath or producing it in an assembly of a quorum is the initial act of organization of the body.

Something more is necessary before the body is "ready for business." That the quorum must do. They must elect a president and a secretary. This done, they are ready for business.

The framers of the New Jersey constitution foresaw the possibility of just what has happened and still exists, the refusal of partisans in power to swear in members of the party opposed to them, "members elect," and so they gave these persons the right to administer the official oath to each other.

If a man comes, bearing a certificate that he is a member elect, and an official oath is taken or has been taken by him, administered by a fellow member elect, is not that man a senator, entitled to take his seat and without legal right on the part of any other man to say him nay?

Constitution, article 10, schedule, provides: "It is hereby declared and ordained that the common law and statute laws now in force not repugnant to this constitution shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation or be altered or repealed by the legislature."

At this time there subsisted a statute which by its 78th section directs the county clerk to certify the result under the county seal, and deliver the certificate to each member, and by section 94, it provides that, "in the organization of each house the certified copied of the statements of determination made under the direction of the 78th section shall be deemed and taken to be prima facie evidence of the right of the persons therein mentioned to seats in the houses respectively, to which they will have been so determined to be elected."

Pub. Laws 1839.

This Act of 1839 was followed in 1846 by an Act to regulate elections, approved April 17, 1846, the 96th section of which re-enacts section 94 of the Act of 1839, with an addition.

Pub. Laws, 222.

It reads as follows: "96. And be it enacted that the senate and general assembly shall convene and hold their sessions in the state house at Trenton; and in the organization of each house, the certified copies of the statements of determination made under the direction of the 79th section of this Act shall be deemed and taken to be prima facie evidence of the persons therein mentioned to seats in the houses respectively, to which they shall have been so determined to be elected."

How any such practice has sprung up as that alleged to exist in the senate in the face of these enactments, the constitution and the statutes regulating elections is difficult to comprehend.

It did not begin its sessions thus. The senate journals for 1845, 1846, 1847, and the evidence of Mr. Daniel Dodd, the first secretary of the New Jersey senate show this.

In 1849 the new practice seems half begun.

This is the first time when any one as president pro tempore administered the oath of office. It would seem probable that some one got hold of a journal of the United States senate, and did not notice the difference between its president pro tempore, an officer directed to be created by statute, and one who was a mere chairman of an unauthorized meeting taking the place of president over such members as appeared in their seats to facilitate an orderly organization. And so the use of the word "approved," an entirely incorrect word to express the only fact, to wit, that the credentials as read appeared to come from the right source, a word not found in the early minutes of the United States senate, was a mistake. There was no more right to approve than there is in a judge to approve the record of a judgment put in evidence by its production before him. Yet it could mean nothing more than that it was in form.

The method of organization adopted by the hold-over senators had not the warrant of the constitution of New Jersey or of its statutes, and was besides dissimilar to that with which the New Jersey senate began, and to that which the United States senate has practiced from 1789 to 1849, if not to the present day.

For this reason there was no lawful claim on the four hold-over senators or the seven senators elect to remain with the nine hold-overs who convened and still convene as the senate of New Jersey, and that this convention of the nine or the ten is not only no senate but it is yet acting contrary to their duty in refusing to join the majority.

The proceedings of the eleven in their organization of the senate were sufficient.

The constitution and the law was fully obeyed and by a quorum. Why, is there not a senate of New Jersey?

Even if the action by the four members was secession on their part, still their union with those whose rights to be and act as members the nine denied, transferred the locality of the senate. It created a quorum of that body and its proceedings then and from thence forth made a senate de facto and de jure acting from and after that moment, lawfully.

They were senators all of them, because certificated. They were the majority. Like conduct was confirmed in State v. Foster, 7 N. J. L. 123; Kendell v. Camden, 47 N. J. L. 67, 54 Am. Rep. 117, indorsing this decision, confining it to action during the same way, and so approving it. This view of course takes it for granted that members elect are members. But surely this is so. And see State v. Roe, 35 N. J. L. 123, where a majority of a board of chosen freeholders, part hold-overs, part members elect, acted without notice to the minority.

Here are two organized assemblies each claiming to be the senate. That body consists of twenty-one members. One of these assemblies consists of ten men—a minority, not a quorum. The other consists of eleven members a number which constitutes a quorum. All these twenty-one have proper certificates of their election. The eleven have enough rightful members to do all that they have done and to legislate authoritatively. Is not this body the senate de jure? What does such a senate need? Enough members to make a quorum? It has them. That they should be regularly elected? They are so, and most of them by tremendous majorities. That they should be lawfully sworn in? They are so; who can doubt it, with the constitution in his hand? That the quorum should be organized? Yes, with president, secretary, sergeant-at-arms—all officers. That it should be accepted by the house of assembly? It is. That body will have nothing to do with the ten who, having seized the senate chamber thence arrogate themselves to be the senate. Is it not true that here is a legislature of two houses, de jure, even if customary forms have not been observed in the organization? And was not, then, the duty of the governor, by communicating with the quorum, to make the legislative power complete? Should not the court even if not sure as to technical theoretical regularity, advise him to this when he asks it?

Adjudications are but few. But these are corroborative of the line of argument pursued.

The case in Maine (70 Me. 609), that in Kansas, and a late one in Nebraska, are all which I have found exactly touching the points here litigated.

We have two or three which in principle are in unison.

Kearns v. Edwards (N. J.) Jan. 6, 1894; State v. Prambach, 47 N. J. L. 85; State v. Roe, 35 N. J. L. 123; Kendell v. Camden, 47 N. J. L. 67; State v. Fielder, 44 N. J. L. 381; State v. Puterson, 35 N. J. L. 191; Re Contested Election of McNeill, 111 Pa. 235.

Mr. Samuel H. Grey, also for respondent, Rogers:

The proposition that this court may, in a proceeding of this sort, make inquiry by quo warranto into the actual title—that is, the fact of election—of the president of the senate is an absolutely novel one.

The object of the proposed inquiry is to ascertain by what title Rogers holds his office as president. The writ is asked for because he is in possession as officer de facto, 33 L. R. A.

for the purpose of determining whether he is entitled to that possession as an officer de jure.

Shortt, Informations, p. 122.

Hence, the inquisition can only be made by a tribunal having power to investigate and determine the title challenged. That tribunal is not this court. It is another one which alone can decide. It is one whose jurisdiction is exclusive. It is fixed by the constitution. It is the senate of New Jersey when organized as a "house."

As the office in possession of Mr. Rogers, the title to which is challenged, is that of the president of the senate, we cannot determine who holds title as president of the senate without determining who have been lawfully "elected" as members of the senate possessing the necessary "qualifications" and exhibiting the proper "returns," because as there can be no president of the senate who is not himself a member and as such chosen by the majority of its "members" so "elected, qualified and returned."

Into this field of investigation this court cannot enter.

Nor can this court make inquisition for the purpose of deciding whether the senate which, in organizing itself into a constitutional "house" elected Mr. Rogers as its president, was, or was not composed of a majority of the members of that body, unless it accepts the certificate of election as prima facie evidence of right to a seat for organization purposes.

Judge Story, in his Commentaries upon the Constitution, section 374, uses this language: "In measures exclusively of a political, legislative, or executive character, it is plain that as the supreme authority as to these questions belongs to the legislative and executive departments they cannot be re-examined elsewhere."

To the same effect is Chancellor Kent's view. 1 Kent, Com. pp. 221-235; Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 50, 51.

The principle which controls and which the authorities quoted recognize, was declared in the supreme court of New Jersey by Chief Justice Green in the case of the State v. The Governor, 25 N. J. L. 331.

See also State v. Young, 32 N. J. L. 29; State v. Pritchard, 36 N. J. L. 101; Throop, Officers, § 793; Ex parte Echols, 39 Ala. 698, 38 Am. Dec. 749.

Is the office of "president of the senate" an office of the state of New Jersey as an organized government, one of the "civil offices" spoken of in the constitution, or is it an office of the legislature only, one of the co-ordinate branches of the state government?

We have under the provisions of the fundamental law an office created by the constitution, for the express purpose of making the legislative power effective, whose incumbent must possess as his sole qualification the character of a legislator, whose title rests entirely upon that of his fellow members, who is chosen from and exercises his official function wholly among them, whose compensation is based upon theirs, whose official oath defines his functions and duties, as those appertaining to the exercise of legislative power, and whose term is limited by that of the legislature of which he is a member. Can it be said that such an officer holds an office of the state of New Jersey as an organized government? He is but the "mouth of the house," which elects him.

May's History of Parliament, 195.

His duties are all associated with and inseparable from that house.

See them defined in Cushing, § 291.

The president of the senate holds his office by the warrant, not of the state government, but of the people who organized that government.

Says Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, p. 188: "There are certain matters which each house determines for itself, and in respect to which its decisions are conclusive. It chooses its own officers except where by the constitution or statute it is otherwise provided; it determines its own rules of proceeding, it decides upon the election and qualifications of its own members." Here it will be seen that the choice of officers is put upon the same plane with the unquestionable legislative powers possessed and used exclusively by the legislature of judging of the "title" of members and adopting "rules."

How, then, can it be said that such an office as this is an office the title to which may be inquired into as if it were one of the "civil offices" of the organized state government.

Another evidence that the presidency of the senate is a purely legislative office, and not an office under the organized government of the state, described in the constitution as a "civil office," is found in the fact that no commission from the governor is necessary to its full investiture, as is the case with "all officers elected or appointed pursuant to the provisions of the constitution."

This court cannot take jurisdiction over this matter by a writ of quo warranto because the question presented is a purely political one, and not in any sense judicial.

This cursory presentation of the principles which distinguish legislative from judicial action seems to me to indicate that within the field of legislation, law-making, in the exercise of all the functions of a legislator as a law giver, in the organization of a legislative body, in the selection of a legislative officer, in the action of the officer in his relation to the house whose servant he is, of which he is a member, for which he speaks and by which he is controlled, are all purely political and none in any sense judicial.

The following cases all show the recognition by the judiciary of the exclusiveness of legislative and executive control over purely political questions, whether affecting the intercourse between nations, the national boundaries, the laws which are to control the citizen, or the organization of legislative assemblies:

Jr. 871, 2 Ves. Jr. 56; Huster v. Neilson, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 306, 7 L. ed. 483; Kendall v. United States, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 524, 9 L. ed. 1181; Georgia v. Stanton, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721; Gelston v. Hoyt, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 246, 4 L. ed. 381; United States v. Palmer, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 610, 4 L. ed. 471; The Divina Pastora, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 52, 4 L. ed. 512; Garcia v. Lee, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 511, 9 L. ed. 1176; Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co. 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 415, 420, 10 L. ed. 220, 228; United States v. Yorba, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 412, 17 L. ed. 635; United States v. Lynde, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 632, 20 L. ed. 250; Re Cooper, 143 U. S. 472, 36 L. ed. 232.

Perhaps no clearer exposition of the rule of law now under consideration and of the reasons for its existence and recognition by the courts is to be found than that given by Judge Woodbury in the great case of Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581.

Assuming that the court desires to have the views of counsel upon the situation, deplorable as it is, which the facts present, our claim is that Mr. Rogers is the president of the senate lawfully elected by its duly qualified, elected, and returned members. The senate of New Jersey is one of the houses into which the legislature is divided. It is not a continuous perpetual entity but a body of limited vitality. Its constitution changes yearly, and oftentimes its political character; indeed, it is because of this latter feature that we find the raison d'être of the present condition of things.

The omission in the new constitution of any provisions for a continuous organization of the upper house or senate is to me conclusive that a new organization should be annually made, and that no power existed in the body, which was transmitted from one year to another, of any sort. There could be no power in the senate as a legislative house until it had, by its organization, become a house, as distinguished from a collection of "members" qualified to act in effecting an organization of themselves into a "house." Hence, until there was an organization there was no "house" which alone was empowered to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications," of its "members." (art. 5 § 4.) And, consequently as all stood upon a plane as to the source of their title as "members" all were equally qualified to act in accomplishing an organization.

The provision for the division of the original senate into three classes was designed to secure annually the election of one third of the whole body by the people. The title to the office must necessarily be drawn from the people, who, as the "legal voters of the counties respectively," elect the senator from that county. The evidence of that title is the election, and the evidence of that election is the return which the law requires to be made, and which is described as a "statement of the determination" of the "board of the county canvassers" (Rev. p. 34, chaps. 347, 348); and "on the organization of each house" certified copies of these "statements of determination" shall be deemed and taken to be prima facie evidence of the right of the persons therein mentioned to seats in the houses respectively to which they shall have been so determined to be elected.

Rev. 353, § 85.

So that we seem to have provided by the constitution a method of determining the fact of that election for the purpose of "the organization of each house" of the legislature, and thus it seems that we find in the constitution and law, as they now are, and for more than fifty years have been, a sufficient and clear explanation of the invariable rule heretofore pursued in organizing the senate.

The newly elected senators would have the right to participate in the organization of the senate upon the exhibition of "certified copies of statements of the determination" of their election.

The power to organize the senate is in all those who are elected to its membership and who present the statutory credentials.

The power "to judge of election returns and qualifications of its own members" is not conferred on individual senators, but upon the collective body. It is given by the constitution to "each house" and as already shown there is no "house" until an organization of that house, which is the act welding its elements, its members, into a homogeneous body, has been effected. Then only, and not before, there is given to the "house" the power to judge of the "election returns and qualifications of its members." Who are its members? Are they those only whose title is more than one year old? This cannot be if "certified copies of statements of determination" of election are valid, prima facie evidence of membership for purposes of organization. The "members" who participate in organizing are those who produce, or who have before produced, certificates of election. These are the "members" whose title after organization may be inquired into by the organized body, the "house." If they were not such "members" there would be nothing for the organized "house" to investigate. The power given is to "judge of the election returns and qualifications" of these very "members" who, with prima facie evidence of title only, are subject to have that title challenged by a claimant, and "judged" by the "house."

The character and value of certificates of election as prima facie evidence of the fact of election is universally recognized by legislative bodies and by courts.

Mr. Rogers, as the proofs show, was elected as president by the majority of all the members of the senate certified and sworn, and so is entitled to his office. This fact appearing incontrovertibly there is no occasion for the writ, for as the senators, in organizing themselves into a house, could not look beyond the "statement of the determination" of election to ascertain who were entitled, for purposes of "organization," to seats in the senate to which it had been "determined" they were elected, and as Mr. Rogers' title to his office rests upon his election by the members of a body composed of those whose prima facie right to vote is not challenged, the judgment of the court must necessarily be that looking at the evidence which those who elected Mr. Rogers were bound to consider and be controlled by, and which on this rule controls this action of this court, he was lawfully elected to the legislative office which he fills.

The action of the minority of the members of the senate here under inspection was to select a president pro tempore in the process of organization. This selection was made before a majority of the senators, old or new, had arrived. It was made by nine men, none of whom were members elect; all had been elected one or two years before, and who collectively were two less than a quorum of the whole body. They completed a temporary organization, if there can be such a thing as a temporary condition of a thing which is essentially permanent in its character, which I deny. Having thus sought to create themselves into a body, if they had succeeded they would not have organized "the house" to which the constitution gives the power to judge of election returns and qualifications of its members. It is impossible for a house to organize until it has enough members present to give it the character and potentiality of a house. It must have a "majority" to make a constitutional "quorum to do business," and certainly the creation of itself by organization into a house capable of doing business could not be effected by any number less than that which upon the completion of the organizing process, and the consequent creation of the house, were alone empowered to do business. Hence, as the action criticised was not that of a quorum it was absolutely ineffective to make the position of temporary president or to fill it if made.

A president, temporary or permanent, must have a body to preside over. If the body be one which is created by a law which defines its composition, its character, and its duties, as the constitution does, then the elements which are constitutionally necessary to give vitality to the body, i. e., a majority of its members who make a quorum, must be present participating, affirmatively or negatively, in the action of the body. Here there were none such, and therefore there was no body capable of even temporary organization. This being so, Mr. Adrain never occupied any official relation even to the minority of the members of the senate.

Mr. Allan L. McDermott, for respondent Adrain:

At midnight of the eighth day of January, 1894, the terms of eight members of the senate expired and there became eight vacancies in that body. The body did not go out of existence. At the first moment of the ninth of January there was a senate in New Jersey, composed of thirteen members. At that moment the governor of this state could have called that senate together and submitted to it nominations for the vacancies to be created two months later, by the expiration of the terms of two justices of this court, and the confirmatory action of that body of thirteen senators would have lacked nothing of entire validity. This proposition continued good during the entire day, until the senate met.

The legislative scheme of the constitution contemplates a continuous body, composed of three classes of senators, with their terms so arranged "that one class may be elected every year."

But the senate remains, that there may not be an interruption in the life of the senate—that there may always be two classes remaining, it is provided that the persons elected to fill vacancies shall be elected for the unexpired terms only. These two ever-existing classes form a senate. No one can become a member of the body except by its action.

The constitution provides that "each house" shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. The argument that the senate which is to judge of its own membership must be composed of one member from each county in the state is fallacious, because article 4, section 2, paragraph 1, provides that it shall be composed of such senators "elected by the legal voters of the counties" and it is the decision of this very question, of whether an applicant for membership was elected by the legal voters of the county he seeks to represent, that is committed to the senate. It may judge first, of the elections of its members. No man is entitled to a seat in the senate unless he is elected to that body. No one can finally say that a senator has been elected except the senate itself.

If the statute said that the presenter of a certificate shall be admitted to membership it would be clearly an unconstitutional substitution of the declaration of an election board for the judicial function reposed in the senate.

The certificate is prima facie evidence that the person named therein received the highest number of votes cast at the election. It is made legal evidence and as it is the law that the qualified person who legally received the highest number of votes shall hold the office, the senate may receive the certificate as evidence.

Section 25 of the Crimes Act provides that, a successful candidate being convicted of bribery, he "shall be disqualified to hold any office to which he was elected at any such election." The constitution provides that "no person shall be a member of the senate who shall not have attained the age of thirty years," etc. If the candidate receiving the certificate is convicted of bribery between the election and the assembly of the legislature or it is discovered within such time that he is under the age of thirty years, can he, in virtue of his certificate, become a senator, "for a little while?" A person applying for admission must have certain qualifications. If he has them not, the constitutional proposition is plain and unequivocal. It is not that he may be expelled but that without those qualifications "no person shall be a member of the senate." The attitude of Mr. Rogers is that, having obtained a certificate of election and taken an oath of office, he is a senator. If this is true, it would be equally so if he did not possess a single constitutional qualification.

The framers of our state constitution designed the state senate as a continuous body; its prototype, in this particular, being the United States senate.

The absence of the vice-president and the president pro tempore would not affect the senate of the United States. It is always an organized body, as is the senate of New Jersey. The organization of the state senate does not depend upon its having a president or a secretary. Its organic structure is found in its membership. The governor is authorized to call the senate together in special session. Would there not be a senate if its president had resigned his membership?

Not only was the provision of our constitution suggested by the Federal Constitution, but the mode of determining the classes adopted by the first United States senate was adopted by the senate of New Jersey. (See 1 Benton, pp. 14, 15; Senate Journal 1845, p. 169.)

The expression of the constitution is not that the terms of senators shall end agreeable to the division but that their seats shall be vacated. Vacated in what, pray, if not in a continuous body? This provision is in the Federal Constitution, "so that one third may be chosen every year." It is in the state constitution so that "one class may be elected every year." One class of what if not of a continuous senate?

Are not the two remaining classes the senate? To answer negatively is to say that the senate may die although two thirds of its members exist. This cannot be. Those whose seats are not vacated remain the senate; they are the organization; they are the judges of the elections, the returns and qualifications of their membership.

Robertson v. State, 109 Ind. 97.

The senators-elect claim that their certificates of election are prima facie evidence of their rights to seats. Evidence to whom? In what tribunal are they to present this evidence? Not in this court, because it cannot pass upon their titles. Where, indeed, but in the senate, which is the only judge of the weight of that evidence. And when this prima facie evidence is submitted, its probative force is neither more nor less than is accorded by the tribunal, which is to pass upon the evidence.

State v. Frambach, 47 N. J. L. 87.

Section 85 of the Election Law was enacted in 1839 (Harrison's Laws, 1834-43, p. 368), and was intended to apply to the conditions as they were found under the Constitution of 1776.

The act was induced by the fact that there was not any authority given to the council or assembly to pass upon the returns of their members.

The Constitution of 1846 added to the judicial power of the houses. It provides that they shall be the judges, not only of the elections and qualifications of their members, but of their returns—of the certificates of their election and I submit that the adoption of that constitution repealed this provision of the Act of 1839

Its re-enactment under the new constitution if it was intended to serve the purpose claimed, was unconstitutional.

If there was a senate in existence on the ninth of January, the orderly, only way to obtain admission was to apply for and receive its adjunction. It is a trifling answer to say that the admission would be refused because that answer cannot be considered in this court.

The court's jurisdiction is unassailable, because the question involved is not of or concerning the right of the senate to choose its own officers, but whether, in law, it has exercised that right to the extent of electing a president to act until another president is chosen. The question does not affect the election returns or qualifications of the members of the senate; it does not touch the right of the senate to elect its officers. Mr. Adrain is asked, "Why do you act as president?" He answers, "Because I was elected by the senate." Is this answer true?

I submit that it is, even if the four hold-over Republican senators had not entered the senate on the ninth of January. At the first moment of that day the membership of the senate was reduced to thirteen members. A majority of these constituted a "quorum to do business." Seven members constituted that majority.

Nine of these thirteen members met at, or within two or three minutes of, three o'clock, in the senate chamber, and elected a president. They were not bound to wait for the four other members. They were a majority of the then existing senate.

The membership of that senate could not be increased by the action of the gentlemen who were swearing themselves in at the Windsor Hotel. The oath of office should not be administered until the right to a seat has been decided. To give assent to the proposition that a senator-elect becomes a senator by taking the oath of office might result in grave complications. A candidate becomes a senator-elect by the declaration of a county board of canvassers; learning that his election will be contested he takes an oath before another senator-elect; the contest results in a revocation of the canvasser's certificate by a justice of this court; what efficacy remains in his oath of office? The taking of the oath can have no effect upon the powers of the senate to determine its membership.

From 1848 to 1894, the record shows that only inducted senators participated in the temporary organization of the senate.

Every body that is a judge of its own membership has the right to determine whom it will admit.

Those who attack the title of Mr. Adrain contend that the constitution requires the presence of eleven senators to organize the senate. But there is not such a constitutional requirement. Suppose that two senators-elect decline to take the oath of office, and nineteen are inducted. It becomes the duty of those nineteen to direct writs of election for supplying vacancies. By whom is this direction made? Surely by the senate, composed of nineteen members. How many votes would it require? The constitution says that "a majority of each house, shall constitute a quorum." Now if the nineteen members were a house capable of directing writs of election, a majority of that house would be a quorum, and five of ten senators could direct that the writs should issue; for the constitution expresses that "a majority of each house shall constitute a quorum to do business" and it is an accepted rule that a majority of a quorum may, in the absence of prohibition, do all that the quorum can do.

If it takes twenty-one members to constitute a senate, how can a senate issue writs to fill vacancies? The constitution desires a senate of twenty-one members, and the duty to fill vacancies is imperative. In vacation the governor may issue a writ of election to fill a vacancy; during its session the senate must issue such writs. But the senate does not go out of existence pending the return to such writs. In the case stated the senate would continue. The "house" of nineteen continues its existence and a majority of it constitutes "a quorum to do business." Put in this way: Two members have resigned; nineteen remain; these are the house commanded to issue writs of election; how many votes will it require to issue the writs if all the members are present when the matter is decided? Surely not more than ten. Why can ten issue the writ? Because they are a majority of the house. Now, if this is true here, it is true as to all other transactions of legislative business, with the possible exception of the passage of bills and joint resolutions.

If the four Republicans had remained with the nine Democrats to this day, would the thirteen have constituted a senate? And if so, what would be a quorum of that senate? Could not the thirteen hold-over members meet this day and legislate? And if they did, would they not be the senate? And if they are the senate, or were the senate on the ninth of January, are not nine a quorum of that senate.

State v. Farr, 47 N. J. L. 208; State v. Egg Harbor City, 55 N. J. L. 247.

The senate at three o'clock on the ninth of January being composed of thirteen members, a majority of that body was competent to elect a president.

There were thirteen inducted senators on the ninth of January; they constituted the senate; they were in office by adjudication upon their elections, returns, and qualifications. Why, then, could not nine—over two-thirds—of this body form a temporary organization. The absence or presence of the four Republican senators could not be a determining factor.

To what record shall we look for the induction of Mr. Rogers. What tribunal passed upon his election return and qualifications and those of his newly elected associates. He answers: "We approved ourselves. We said we were elected, we passed upon our returns and we adjudged that we were qualified."

The body which elects a president pro tempore, which receives, examines, and approves, or rejects applicants for membership, is the senate. It is the senate before a newly electd senator is inducted. The unbroken record shows that the oath having been administered the person thus qualifying "took his seat in the senate."

The argument that induction is a condition precedent to the exercise of the judicial powers of the senate is absurd. It amounts to saying that the senate can put the holder of a certificate of election out, but cannot prevent him from getting in. The time for judgment upon the qualifications of a senator-elect is when he presents his credentials, for the constitution expressly declares that "no person shall be a member of the senate" who has not certain qualifications.

The court having before it the undisputed fact that there existed in this state on the ninth of January, a senate of thirteen members, can say how the numbers of that senate may be increased; it can say whether the number was increased by the adjudication of a majority of a quorum of that senate; it can say whether the action of the two classes remaining upon the vacation of the seats of the third class is necessary to the admission of new members.

The court cannot say that A is entitled to membership in the senate; but it can say what will constitute an adjudication upon his claims to membership.

The legislature cannot pass any statute making a return evidence of anything whatever; each house has the absolute and unqualified right to receive or to reject a return; the right to judge the elections, returns, and qualifications of those who apply for admission to the senate cannot be controlled, interfered with, or legislated upon by any action of the house of assembly, whether that action is in the shape of a statute or a resolution.

In a legal sense prima facie evidence, in the absence of all controlling evidence, or discrediting circumstances, becomes conclusive; in other words, it should operate in the minds of the jury as decisive to found their verdict as to fact.

Rice, Evidence, § 61, and authorities cited.

If the legislature had the right to enact this law and the governor to approve it, why could they not have added "and the supreme court shall give legal effect to the prima facie evidence thus provided for?" If this statute is sound, the onus probandi is shifted, and the duty is imposed upon the senate of proving, before they can deny an applicant admission, that he was not elected. If it is prima facie evidence, it is conclusive until disproved.

I am asked, "Can the senate seat one who was not a candidate for the office?" May I not answer the question after the manner of the descendants of the Pilgrim fathers and ask, "Who can question it if they do?" May I not ask, "Cannot the court of errors and appeals in the last resort in all causes decide that not to be the law which that same court formerly adjudicated to be the law?" The senate has the right to oust a senator whom it knows to have been elected by thousands of majority, and to induct one whom not a member voting for the admission believes to have the slightest claim to a seat, and the 23 L. R. A.

next senate has the right to undo the wrong. What is the difference between inducting one who was not a candidate and inducting one whom you know has not the shadow of a title to the seat? And if a candidate receives one vote and his opponent receives ten thousand, and the senate inducts the candidate who received the single vote, is it within the province of this court to even comment upon the action of the senate?

There was a quorum present, however, even if it is held that eleven members were necessary to constitute that quorum. The senate journal shows this, and the question of whether they answered to their names or not is wholly immaterial.

Can the four hold-over Republicans present themselves at every meeting, and prevent business by refusing to answer to their names.

In Rushville Gas Co. v. Rushville, 6 L. R. A. 315, 121 Ind. 206, the common council of a town in Indiana consisted of six members, who were present, with the mayor who presided ex officio, with the power to give a casting vote in case of a tie, awarded a contract. The six councilmen were present; three voted for the resolution and three remained silent. The mayor declared the resolution carried, and his course was sustained by the court.

The thirteen members of the senate were present, and they continued present until the senate adjourned. There is not any better established rule of parliamentary law than that if a quorum is once shown to be present, a quorum is thereafter presumably present and parliamentary proceedings have a provision for those who desire to assail this presumption. The evidence in this case has not been read, but the court must read it to learn the situation as it existed. There is not a disputed question. It is shown that the four Republican senators went into one of the lobbies. The testimony of Mr. Voorhees shows this. They were, in law, present with the Democratic nine.

Cushing, § 369.

The thirteen hold-over senators remained in the senate chamber during all the proceedings taken after the four Republicans had gone into one of the lobbies. It does not matter how Mr. Adrain was elected president in the first instance. He was the president pro tempore.

State v. Farrier, 47 N. J. L. 383.

Mr. Frederic W. Stevens, also for relator:

Neither Mr. Adrain nor Mr. Rogers has been elected to the constitutional office of president of the senate.

Mr. Rogers has not: (1) because the senate of New Jersey is a continuous body and it is to that body that the senators elect must come and present their credentials. They cannot, with a minority of hold-over senators, leave the body and go off and organize by themselves; (2) because whether the senate is or is not a continuous body, the hold-over senators remain as an organized nucleus which receives and which alone is competent to receive, the new members who must come and attach themselves to it.

Mr. Adrain has not been so elected, be cause a minority of the whole number of members is without power to elect a president of the senate. The constitution provides that the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state (art. 4, § 2) and that a majority of the senate—i. e., a majority of the senate so composed—shall constitute a quorum to do business (art. 4, § 4). In the case in hand four hold-over senators left the lawful body then consisting of thirteen, before it was permanently organized. The part that remained was, therefore, without power to pass the resolution which declared that the president pro tempore should hold the office of president until the election of his successor. We are met at the outset with an objection to the jurisdiction of the court.

The quo warranto act which was in force long before the constitution was adopted provides "that in case any person or persons shall usurp, intrude into, or unlawfully hold or execute, any office or franchise within this state, it shall and may be lawful to and for the attorney-general, with the leave of the supreme court, to exhibit one or more information or informations in the nature of a quo warranto at the relation of any person or persons desiring to sue or to prosecute the same against such person or persons for usurping," etc., and the statute goes on to provide that if it shall appear to the court that the several rights of diverse persons to the same office may properly be determined on one information the court may give leave to exhibit one information against several persons in order to try their respective rights to such office. The language of the statute is general. It extends in terms to every office.

At common law says Blackstone a writ of quo warranto was "in the nature of a writ of right for the king against him who claims or usurps any office, franchise, or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supports his claim, in order to determine the right." The remedy was purely a civil one but it was attended with delays and fell into disuse perhaps as early as 10 Edw. III; an information in nature of a quo warranto had taken its place.

Shortt, Informations, 110.

Informations criminal in their nature (being exhibited for every species of common-law offense except treason and felony) were of great antiquity being coeval with the origin of the common law as was shown by the elaborate argument in Re v. Berchet, 1 Show. 106. They were filed by the attorney-general ex officio, or by the master of the crown office on the relation of some private individual. They were a substitute for an indictment by a grand jury. In the one case the grand jury informed the king that a crime had been committed, in the other his chief law officers. By analogy to this criminal information, when it was found that the proceedings under the old writ of quo warranto were too dilatory, the attorney-general as the attorney of the king, began to exhibit informations, in the nature of a quo warranto, with the object of enabling the king to seize the forfeited office or franchise into his own hands, or if from its nature it could not be seized, then to oust the incumbent. As soon as the proceeding had assumed this form it was deemed to partake of both a civil and a criminal nature: criminal because a proceeding by information was always deemed criminal; civil because the old writ afforded a civil remedy. Its principal character was that of a civil remedy for the king of the same nature as the more ancient writ.

14 Petersdorff's Abr. title, Quo Warranto, p. 97; 7 Comyn's Dig. 190.

Both the writ and its substitute lay for all kinds of offices.

It was long a matter of doubt whether an information lay against one who held an office constituted by act of parliament the objection being that such an office did not proceed from the crown, but in Darley v. Reg., 13 Clark & F. 529, it was resolved by the house of lords that it did.

When, in the year 1795, Judge Patterson drew our quo warranto act he probably had in mind the fact that it was at that time doubtful whether quo warranto would lie in the case of offices not proceeding from the crown. In 1791, in the case of Re v. Shepherd, 4 T. R. 381, where an information was moved for calling on defendants to show by what authority they claimed the office of church wardens, Lord Kenyon had said that had it not been for the case cited, he would not have been disposed to grant a rule even to show cause, for that this was not an usurpation on the rights or prerogatives of the crown, for which only writ of quo warranto lay, and that an information in the nature of a quo warranto could only be granted in such cases, and the rule was refused. The same point had been ruled before in Re v. Davobny, 2 Strange, 1196. See also Re v. Hanley, 8 Ad. & El. 462, note; Re v. Ramsden, Id. 456.

Darley v. Reg., supra, authoritatively established the contrary principle, was not decided until 1845.

While, therefore, our act is in most other respects a copy of the Statute of Anne it differs from it altogether in respect of the extent of its application. The Statute of Anne extends only to corporate offices. Our act extends to all offices. The course of decision is uniform on this point.

State v. Parkhurst, 9 N. J. L. 587; State v. Utter, 14 N. J. L. 84; State v. Crowell, 9 N. J. L. 490; State v. Paterson & H. Turnp. Co. 21 N. J. L. 10; State v. Gummereall, 24 N. J. L. 529; State v. Tolan, 33 N. J. L. 198; State v. Meehan, 45 N. J. L. 196.

There can then be no doubt that the statute in terms covers the case of all offices.

It certainly cannot be denied that the president of the senate is an officer.

Each of the defendants not only claims but has entered upon the performance of the duties of the office. Mr. Rogers has taken the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution, article 4, section 8, and such an oath without user is a sufficient foundation for the information.

Rees v. Tate, 4 East, 837; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 627.

Do the constitutional provisions, relating to the senate or the president of the senate, deprive the court of its jurisdiction to try the title to that office. As the president of the senate holds an office, and as the quo warranto act applies in terms to all offices, this court must have jurisdiction, unless some constitutional provision takes it away, or unless the court declines to take jurisdiction on some ground of political expediency.

The court is not asked, in this case, to interfere with the action of the senate of New Jersey.

If either of these bodies is found to be the senate their president is beyond all question the president of the senate mentioned in the constitution.

There is no express provision of the constitution which debars the court from considering the question.

We do not attack the title of any senator. There is not the slightest pretense of an effort to interfere with the seating of any senator in any body. All we assert is that one group of senators have attempted to elect Mr. Rogers to the presidency of the senate and another group of senators have attempted to elect Mr. Adrain to the same office, and that both groups have failed because neither is in fact the senate.

The same result is reached when we review the matter historically.

See 1 Anson, English Constitution, Parliament.

The provision that "each house shall choose its own officers" certainly does not, in terms, take from the courts the power to pass upon the title of president of the senate.

It is said that the dignity and independence of this co-ordinate branch of the government requires that it should be exempt from judicial control in the choice of all its officers.

If the president of the true senate had no duty to perform other than that of presiding over its deliberations, it might be urged with force that the court ought not to look into or interfere with its internal organization.

Bradlaugh v. Gossett, L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 283.

Nothing is better settled than that when the legislative body, or an officer of that body, goes beyond its own walls, the ordinary jurisdiction of the law courts attaches. Beyond those walls its adjudication of its powers or prerogatives binds no one.

Ashby v. White, 2 Ld. Raym. 938, Smith, Lead Cas. 281; Stockdale v. Hansard, 9 Ad. & El. 1; Bradlaugh v. Gossett, supra; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 108 U. S. 168, 26 L. ed. 377; United States v. Ballin, 144 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 321; State v. Young, 82 N. J. L. 29.

The privilege springs, not from any express provision of the constitution depriving the court of jurisdiction to interfere, but from the fact that it is attached to a co-ordinate branch of the government as one of its incidents. As soon as it is demonstrated 23 L. R. A.

that the body claiming the privilege is not such co-ordinate branch of course it is shown no such incident attaches.

I admit that the court cannot pass upon a class of political questions and if this were one of the classes then the court could not pass upon it; but it is not.

Questions involving the title conferred upon an officer by an election or appointment, questions concerning the legality of the acts of municipal boards or other public bodies or officers, questions concerning the constitutionality of laws, are political questions, because they are concerned, not so much with private right as with the constitution of the body politic, the binding force of laws and the acts or titles of its officers. The court deals with questions like these every day. On the other hand, the case of Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581, which involved the question of which was the true government in Rhode Island, during the time of the Dorr rebellion; the case of Georgia v. Stanton, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721, which involved the status of the state of Georgia under the reconstruction acts; and the case of Jones v. United States, 137 U. S. 212, 34 L. ed. 696, which involved the inquiry whether the jurisdiction of the United States extended over one of the Guano islands,—are illustrations of a class of political questions which the court will not undertake to decide in opposition to the decision of the president.

I freely concede that if the court were asked to do nothing but to make a declaration as to which senate was the true senate it would be obliged to decline. But it by no means follows that because the court cannot pass directly upon the status of the legislature, or either of its branches, it cannot do so at all. It is the duty of the court to expound and enforce legislative acts, and, in so doing, it must necessarily determine whether what purport to be laws are so in fact. If two bodies, sitting at the same time, both claim to be the legislature, and pass acts, the court must determine which of those bodies is the legislature, in order that it may ascertain whose acts it shall enforce. In doing so it necessarily reviews the claims of the contending bodies and decides between them, i. e. decides the question which is called political.

So if one of those bodies orders its speaker to assert a citizen and detain him within or without its walls, if it be not the true legislature, its order is void and on a habeas corpus proceeding the court must inquire into the validity of the arrest and the jurisdiction of the body which ordered it, and, if the arrest be invalid, discharge him from custody wherever he may be found.

So, too, if each legislature should, under our constitution, proceed to elect a comptroller and treasurer, the court would necessarily be compelled to decide which of the persons elected were really comptroller and treasurer.

Mr. Thomas N. McCarter, also for respondent Rogers:

This is not the case of a writ filed ex officio by the attorney-general without leave, but is a petition by a private relator for leave for the attorney-general to file such information. The cases are different, and the proceedings thereon differ.

Vanatta v. Delaware & B. B. R. Co. 38 N. J. L. 282; State v. Tolun, 33 N. J. L. 195; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 605.

That the relator styles himself governor, does not change the nature of the proceeding.

The writ is asked for against two persons, alleging that each claims to exercise the office of president of the senate of New Jersey, and it is under our statute quo warranto.

Rev. 905, § 1.

In one aspect of this case, to reach a complete determination of the questions affecting Mr. Rogers' claim of title, it would be incumbent on the court to decide whether the body which elected him as president was a lawful senate of the state of New Jersey; whether its members were duly elected and qualified; and whether being so elected and qualified, they were lawfully organized, and being organized lawfully elected Mr. Rogers their president.

This court has no power or jurisdiction to enter upon an inquiry which involves a determination of any of those questions.

Const. art. 3, § 2, par. 1; § 4, pars. 2, 3; § 3, pars. 1, 2; art. 5, par. 12; art. 10, par. 1; Revision, p. 853, § 85.

It is an undisputed fact that Mr. Rogers was elected to the office of president by a majority of the members of the senate, who met at the state house on the day fixed for the meeting of the legislature, whose certificates of election were in due form. That having been elected he took the constitutional oath and assumed and continues to preside over the body that elected him. This court is asked to institute a proceeding the result of which will be that if it decides against Mr. Rogers it must pass judgment of ouster and remove from his unlawful intrusion and subject him to the costs of the prosecution and possibility to a fine. It is respectfully contended that it is not within the power of this court to enter upon any such inquiry or pass any such judgment. The proceedings which resulted in his election were of a purely legislative character, with which this court cannot interfere.

State v. The Governor, 25 N. J. L. 381; Thompson v. German Valley R. Co. 22 N. J. Eq. 111; Kendell v. Camden, 47 N. J. L. 64; State v. Young, 32 N. J. L. 40; State v. Frambach, 47 N. J. Jarrett*, 17 Md. 809; Cooley, Const. Lim. 131; Moses, Mandamus, 80; People v. Mahaney, 18 Mich. 481.

The next question involved in the supposed proceeding would be the legality of the organization of the body and of the election by such body of Mr. Rogers. This, also, is subject to the same rule; it is a legislative question which has been decided by the legislature itself, and from which decision there is no appeal to the supreme court.

When we find a quorum of the senate meeting at the place and on the day required by the constitution and laws of the state, and perfecting an organization, and taking the oaths of office and electing their presiding officer and other officers, and the house has recognized it and acted with it, it becomes by those facts a complete legislature, requiring for its legality the recognition of no other person, and subject to review by no other department of the government. Such recognition was within the designation of legislative or political acts over which, by well-settled principles, the court can have no jurisdiction.

Luther v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581; Decatur v. Paulding, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 515, 10 L. ed. 568; Kendall v. United States, 37 U. S. 12 Pet. 524, 9 L. ed. 1181; Georgia v. Jarrett, supra; dissenting opinion of Judge Allen, in the late and well-known case, Re Gunn, 19 L. R. A. 519, 50 Kan. 155.

If Mr. Rogers is called upon to show by what warrant he claims to act as president of the senate, the result must be to establish either one of two propositions:

First. That he has been legally elected president of the senate of New Jersey, and now lawfully exercises the functions of his office; or Second. That he is at least president de facto of the senate acting with the house in the discharge of their ordinary legislative duties, with no other person in existence authorized or qualified to assume his place if he should be removed from it.

What is his warrant?

1. That he was duly elected senator from the county of Camden at the election held in last November.

2. That of his ten associates who elected him, seven were duly elected from their respective counties at the same election, and the remaining four were members of the senate last year, or what the attorney-general calls "the existing senate."

3. That as there can only be twenty-one senators, and as eleven is a majority of twenty-one, the body which elected him constitutes a lawful quorum to do business. That these eleven members met in Trenton on the ninth day of January, being the day fixed by the constitution and took the oaths of office prescribed by the constitution in the manner therein provided.

4. They repaired to the state house in compliance with section 85 of the Election Act, and produced the certificates of their election which are produced here and in evidence and are in due form.

5. They filed their credentials and oaths of office with the secretary of state and organized themselves into a body, and elected Mr. Rogers president by a unanimous vote.

6. That he took the oath of office prescribed by the constitution and thereupon the senate proceeded to do business with him as its presiding officer.

7. That the body over which he presides has been recognized by the house of assembly; that together they have passed many acts.

8. That the senators have met with the other house in joint meeting, and have elected important state officers, namely, comptroller and state treasurer, and that by virtue of all such proceedings he exercises the powers in question.

According to the opposite contention although the constitution says the senate shall be composed of one member from each county yet, every year when the senate meets it shall only be composed of one member from each county that has not elected a new one and whether it will ever be composed of more, or not, will depend, not on the constitution, but on the will of the members from the fourteen counties holding over. If such choose to admit the new ones, all well. If not, their judgment is final and conclusive.

The newly elected members may have been duly elected; may possess every constitutional qualification; may, as in this case, produce the certificates of election, which the law makes prima facie evidence of their right to seats in the house in the organization and yet a majority of the hold-overs, though less than a quorum of the whole number, may finally and conclusively determine, in spite of law and the constitution, that the newly elected men are not and cannot be members of the senate. Pursue this logic to its legitimate conclusion. The seven hold-over senators are disfranchised. The year goes on with the senate composed of fourteen members. At the end of the year seven more go out, and others may be elected in their places, but there are seven hold-overs composing the existing senate: four is a majority and these four may exclude the newly elected, as they did before, and then the existing senate, consisting of seven for another year, and then it goes out like the snuff of a candle.

If the senate was an existing body, the journal of the senate would be a continuous volume, having no interruptions or breaks occasioned by the adjournments. If it was a continuous body, why would not the business left unfinished at a previous session continue to be on the calendar and business of the new session in the same condition of progress which it had at the adjournment? Yet everybody knows that unfinished business, left so at the expiration of a session, dies with the session and cannot come up in the new session in the same stage of progress which it had when the senate adjourned. Will it be pretended that after the adjournment of the senate of 1893, any of its powers continued during the recess in the legislature? Had it imprisoned a man for contempt, would its existence and continued power operate to hold him in custody during the recess, when every one knows that the right to hold and punish for contempt ceases with the adjournment of the house in which the proceedings for contempt were taken?

Anderson v. Dunn, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 304, 5 L. ed. 242.

There can be no stronger assertion of the right of those newly elected members to participate in the organization of this senate than that found in McCrary on Elections, §§ 280, 282, 288; Cushing, §§ 228, 229, 240.

There is enough in this case to justify the court in denying this writ, and refusing to interfere with the title of Mr. Rogers without exercising the jurisdiction to try his title, or the election and qualifications of those who elected him, and that is, that Mr. Rogers is the president de facto.

People v. Hatch, 33 Ill. 164; State v. Farrier, 47 N. J. L. 383.

The court, in the exercise of its discretion, ought not to allow the fling of this information. This is a discretionary power and State v. Tolan, 58 N. J. L. 195, lays down rules regulating the exercise of such discretion.

The application is not made in good faith.

The governor and attorney-general are estopped from asking for this relief.

If Adrain was in a situation to be called on to answer as to his warrant for exercising the duties of the office of president what could he set up? Nothing but his recognition by the governor sustained by the attorney-general's opinion. The pretense that he was elected to anything by the senate, or a quorum of it, is completely overthrown by the evidence.

State v. Tolan, supra; Ree v. Dawes, and Ree v. Marten, 4 Burr. 2122; Ree v. Parry, 6 Ad. & El. 810; Cole, Criminal Information, 165; Grant, Corp. 253; Willcock, Mun. Corp. 476; State v. Utter, 14 N. J. L. 84.

The public interest will not be served by continuing this prosecution.

The court is asked to become a party to a most nefarious political conspiracy having for its object the reversal of the popular will, and to keep on the statute book laws for the legalizing and encouragement of racing and gambling, which the people have condemned.

Mr. John P. Stockton, Atty-Gen., also for relator:

The question is simply this: Which of these two senates is organized according to the constitution? Manifestly they cannot both be so organized, and that one only can be which has complied with the constitutional forms and requirements. To decide this question there must be determined, first, what the constitution requires, and second, which body, if either, has conformed to such requirements. What is there in these inquiries that is not judicial?

Political questions may be raised in a state, but they can only be raised by the supreme power, not by one of its creatures.

Luith v. Borden, 48 U. S. 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581.

The senate has the undoubted right to choose its own officers but it does not follow that it has the right to elect a person to the office of president of the senate who is constitutionally disqualified from holding that position.

There is really but one question in this case. It is simply a construction of those provisions of the constitution which created the senate of New Jersey.

Constitutions are made in periods of tranquillity and public order that they may guide and control in times of popular excitement and disorder. To construe them to suit popular clamor contrary to their plain and settled import, is to destroy the constitution by construction, and is as great a crime and almost as bad in its results as to destroy it by open rebellion.

There is no doubt of the jurisdiction of the supreme court in a case where there are two conflicting senates each claiming a right to exercise legislative functions, to determine by which body legislative authority can be lawfully exercised.

Prince v. Skillin, 71 Me. 367, 86 Am. Rep. 325; McCrary, Elections, p. 896; Atty-Gen. v. Barstow, 4 Wis. 567; Re Gunn, 19 L. R. A. 519, 50 Kan. 155.

In case of a division of a legislative body that ought to be a unit, that is the legal organization which has maintained the regular forms of organization according to the laws and usages of the body; or in the absence of these, according to the laws, customs, and usages of similar bodies in like cases, or in analogy to them. The new members though they be in the majority, must meet with the old at the time and place fixed by law, and proceed regularly with the organization of the body. They must join themselves to the existing body, for the members holding over, though they may be in the minority, and not sufficiently numerous to constitute a quorum, are yet the body, for the purpose of receiving the new members and acting as the organs of reorganizing the body.

McCrary, Elections, §§ 592, 593.

The senate of New Jersey is a continuous body with hold-over members, as is clearly demonstrated by reference to the constitution.

Art. 4, § 1, par. 3, §§ 2, 4, 6; art. 5, cl. 12.

The provisions of the Constitution of 1844, so far as they concern the creation, organization, and powers of the senate, are manifestly copied from the Constitution of the United States.

This creates a continuous body, and there always exists a senate capable of doing business, because there is always two thirds of the entire senate in existence, and, moreover, there is always more than the constitutional number required to pass a bill.

There can be no doubt of the constitutional duty of the senate to assemble, at the time named by the constitution and to proceed to do all those acts which the number of members present make it competent for it to perform.

Cushing, Law & Practice, § 273.

The continuity of both the senate of the United States and the senate of New Jersey is created by the mode of election and term of the members and not by the manner of providing for a temporary presiding officer.

The New Jersey law and practice has been to provide for a presiding officer of the senate during the entire existence of the senate not as in the case of the United States senate, in advance, but contemporaneously and with ample power to meet any contingency as it may arise.

While the Constitution of 1845 did not say so, the legislature of 1845 took care to supply the omission by providing that "the powers, privileges, duties, and remunerations granted to or imposed upon the vice-president by law, at and immediately before the time when the present constitution of the state took effect, shall hereafter be exercised, enjoyed, and performed by the president of the senate, so far as the same are not inconsistent with the present constitution; and all such powers or duties heretofore exercised or performed by the president of the senate are hereby ratified and confirmed and shall have the same force and effect as if exercised and performed after the passage of this act.

This provision of a permanent officer, with great general and continuing power, seems to be as ample a provision for the proper and timely organization of the senate as does that of the Federal Constitution and custom.

This provision has been further fortified by a custom of fifty years' existence.

It is a question that does not admit of dispute that the senate of the United States is a continuous body with organized hold-over members, and that there was a construction of the constitutional clause creating the senate before the constitution of New Jersey was framed; that this was well known to the learned lawyers who were engaged in framing that constitution and that the arguments used in the state convention were the same as used in the national convention.

The rule is well settled that where a statute or a constitutional provision of doubtful import has been adopted in one state from the statutes or constitution of another state, after a practical construction has been given to the language by judicial decision, it will be presumed that the interpretation adopted in the state from which it is taken has been accepted as well as the words.

State v. Kuhl, 51 N. J. L. 191; Gray v. Askew, 8 Ohio, 466; Langdon v. Applegate, 5 Ind. 827; Rigg v. Wilton, 13 Ill. 15; Adams v. Field, 21 Vt. 256; Rutland v. Mendon, 1 Pick. 154.

It is not provided that a member shall be entitled to take his seat on the presentation of the certified copy of the statement of determination of his election. The act could not do this because the constitution provided that each body should be the judge of the returns of the members; so the act simply confines itself to making this certificate prima facie evidence; evidence to be submitted to the tribunal which by the constitution could alone make the determination: evidence, which if uncontradicted, is sufficient to establish the right to the seat.

The provision of statutes the ruling of the courts and the custom of the body all recognize the power of each body to render judgment on the presentation of the evidence.

It is manifest that the provision permitting the members-elect to take the oath before one another was a necessity in the first organization of the senate.

In reference to the house, which was not made a continuous body, whose speaker is spoken of in the constitution as speaker for the time being, it is always a convenient method of organizing. In the senate it was only necessary for the purposes of the first organization, and, therefore, it appears that from the time the senate was organized as a continuous body to the present time the members-elect have been sworn in by the president pro tempore of the senate in the presence of the senate.

Under the clauses which provided that "members of the legislature shall, before they enter upon the duties of their respective offices, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation:" and "members-elect of the senate or general assembly are hereby empowered to administer to each other the said oath or affirmation,"—senators-elect could take an oath or affirmation in private, then appear with an attested certificate and insist upon taking their seats without permitting the existing senate, even if they were all present, to pass upon their returns. Such a proposition can find no support either from principle or authority, and is inconsistent with the free exercise by the senate of its power as judges of the returns of its members.

If such a course could be pursued the senate could be destroyed by usurpers, and on their presentation a majority might immediately exist in the senate, which would have power to decide on their own elections and control legislation; and the testimony shows that this was the purpose of the insistence that the senate should bind itself to seat the members-elect, as a condition precedent to their presentation.

When it is determined to admit a senator to his seat because his credentials are regular he is then admitted to take the oath of office, but he does not become a member of the body by virtue of the oath of office, but by virtue of the judgment of the senators upon his credentials, and their determination that he is entitled to admission. While the official oath may be a necessary part of his induction into office, it does not make him a member of the body until his credentials have been approved by the body, who are the constitutional judges.

The power of a legislative body to judge of the election of its own members is an absolute power, controlled by no other tribunal. In this country it was adopted from the English system and it was embodied in the unwritten constitution of Great Britain as the result of one of the earliest of the conflicts of the house of commons on the one hand, and the sovereign or the lords, or both, on the other, and has ever since been admitted to belong exclusively to the house itself as "its ancient natural and undoubted privilege."

The record of the forty-eight senates between 1845 and 1894, show that no senator-elect was ever admitted to his seat as a senator, save after judgment upon, and approval of his credentials by the senate, and the taking of the official oath by the senator-elect. In two instances wherein a statement was made that the credentials had been forgotten, a resolution of the senate was required to waive the presentation of the credentials at that time and to accept them as if they had been presented and judged.

No instance can be found in the history of this state or of the federal government in which a senator-elect ever voted on the approval of his own certificate of election.

It is a notable fact that of all the senators-elect who are recorded as "appearing in their seats," before they were admitted to their seats not one was ever selected for president pro tempore nor ever nominated a senator for the temporary presidency; nor ever presented the credentials of a senator-elect, nor ever performed any recordable act in the organization. The grouping of the senators-elect with the existing senators was evidently a blunder by the secretary, committed through the then seeming unimportance of the form of the record, which he has since endeavored to fortify by vague recollections, and which is exposed by the fact that in 1849, when Mr. Dodd had ceased to be the secretary of the senate, and his place had been taken by Phillip J. Grey of Camden, the journal ceased showing that the senators-elect "appeared in their seats," and were subsequently "admitted to their seats," after the important intermediary processes of the presentation of their credentials, the judgment and approval of the senate upon them, and the taking of their official oath.

The precedent set by Mr. Grey in 1849, in recording the participation in the formation of the senate of only those who did in fact participate, has been followed to the present day.

It is urged that the rule which requires the judgment of the existing body on the returns of its members is unreasonable; that members elect may be deprived of their seats and of taking proper part in the organization by the unjust action of those whom the constitution has made the judges. This is an argument from inconvenience, which goes a very little distance in the consideration of a constitutional question.

There is an argument from inconvenience against almost every provision of the constitution.

In this case the constitution has adopted the provision which was considered the least objectionable. Suppose they had selected some other plan. Suppose they had provided that the action of the election officers in taking the votes, in estimating them hastily late at night; the action of the county canvassers (often men without the slightest responsibility for the proper performance of their duties, and yet the men who make up these credentials which these members bear to the senate), should be final; suppose the senate of New Jersey and the house of assembly were bound conclusively by this action, which would constitute the greater inconvenience? Were not the framers of our constitution wise, when recognizing the possibility of these errors by minor officials; when realizing that neither the election officers nor the canvasser officers had the slightest power or right to inquire into the qualification of the members or the conduct of the elections,—they said that when that member, with the certificate of the county canvassers, came to the senate, the senate should have the power then or at any other time, at their convenience, and in their own way, to examine fully, not only into the returns which has been brought, to them, but into the qualifications of the man who had brought them, and the election by which he had been sent there, and should be unrestricted in that power? has not the history of this state shown that the aid of our highest judicial officers has been summoned to revise and perfect these returns and credentials, because they were found to be so defective as to be unworthy of presentation to the house itself? Is this not the reason why the certificates of election, which, after all, are but the returns of the boards of county canvassers, were not made conclusive, but by subsequent legislative action were declared to be only prima facie evidence, before the body, which was wisely empowered to render judgment upon them?

If the constitution had provided that without the examination of any certificates or the judgment of the body, one claiming to have been elected a member of the body could take his seat and act with the body, the legislature, with all its great inherent powers, would be destroyed by intruders.

The inconvenience that would then follow would be that the scenes that have occurred this year would occur after each succeeding election.

It is not a matter of any importance whatever, so far as the question of organization is concerned, how many members joined the Rogers senate. Unless organized according to law and constitutional provisions if every member of both bodies were assembled, they, would be nothing but a mob, and incapable of making laws or electing United States senators or state officers.

It is impossible to overestimate the importance of observing the distinction between the members of the body individually and the body itself as an organized political body.

Mr. Gilbert Collins, also for respondent Rogers:

By the Constitution, art. 4, § 4, pl. 2, a majority of the senate is necessary to "constitute a quorum and do business." Nine senators attempted to elect Mr. Adrain president pro tempore, but it is only by the false assertion that four others afterwards entered the senate chamber and answered to their names while he was in the chair, thus (as claimed) participating in the proceedings and recognizing him as president, that it can even be argued that he became president pro tempore. The slightest consideration is convincing that this argument is a non sequitur. It is the uniform usage that the secretary of the last senate shall call the roll, and a senator may well answer to his name for the express purpose of being heard in the matter of a temporary organization. The fact that Mr. Adrain happened to be seated in the president's chair gave him no greater right than if he had occupied another place in the senate chamber. It is impossible that the mere coming to the proper place at the proper time to organize the senate, and then and there answering to one's name, can bind a senator to a previous unlawful and unconstitutional temporary organization, effected in his absence.

Where the thing in issue is the fact of organization, that fact must be independently proved before any journal or minutes of the organization can possibly be evidence.

State v. Young, 32 N. J. L. 29.

It is unfortunate that the learned attorney-general in his opinion to the governor which seems to be the foundation of the present conflict between the executive and legislative branches of the government, should have wandered into such a circuitous course of logic as that in which he argues that a body of men constitutes the senate because their journal proves it to be such, and that that journal is competent to prove it because it is the journal of the senate. Was there ever a plainer illustration of "reasoning in a circle?"

Mr. Adrain cannot claim that he continues to be "president of the senate" by virtue of his election and qualification in 1893. There cannot be two kinds of "president of the senate" one with the right to hold over and the other not, according to the chance of the continuance or noncontinuance of senatorial term of office.

Either there is no "president of the senate" or Mr. Rogers holds that office.

As to Maurice A. Rogers leave to file an information should be denied because the proofs establish his absolute title to the office of "president of the senate."

It may be argued that the senate is a continuous body, and that the hold-over members form a nucleus to which the new members must be added. Granted that it is a continuous body; so is the assembly. The attorney-general quoted Henry Clay to the governor; but Mr. Clay said that the senate, and house too, were continuous bodies. On the instant when the term of office of members of one assembly expires, the term of those of the next begins. There is always a house of assembly ready to respond to a summons to meet. The senate is continuous in the same sense and in no other. Certain senators hold over without the election, but a new organization must be made each year under the constitution. The title of a senator chosen in 1893 consists in his election, proven by his certificate and in his official oath which any senator elect can administer (Const. art. 4, § 8 pl. 1). The title of a senator chosen in 1891 is precisely the same, and no sound reason appears why the election in one year should confer any greater power than the election in another.

Doubtless good order and decorum naturally suggest that on a new organization of a deliberative body where there are members holding over, they should convene and receive the incoming members but they are bound to receive them if they hold regular credentials. Suppose the hold-over members arbitrarily refuse to receive the credentials or admit the new members, is there no remedy, even though with a minority of the hold-over members willing to admit them they constitute a quorum of the entire body? It is preposterous to so contend, and the remedy must be for such quorum itself to effect an organization.

The election laws of the state declare that in the organization of each house a certificate of the nation shall be deemed and taken to be prima facie evidence of the right of the persons therein mentioned to seats in the house respectively to which they shall have been so determined to be elected (Rev. 353, § 85), and neither the statutes nor the constitution of the state require any "admission" by members holding over. The contention is that the hold-over members are the senate. The constitution says the "senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state" (Const. art. 4, § 2, pl. 1).

The principle of organization contended for by the attorney-general is precisely that of a close corporation, where vacancies are filled by those who hold over. It is repugnant to the theory of representation, through a popular election. The vote of the people gives the title, the regular certificate of election is the conclusive evidence of it for the purpose of organization, and the oath, which any senator elect may administer, is the qualification. The attorney-general prescribes a second election by a majority of the old members, less than a quorum, of the senate. He holds a doctrine of apostolic succession whereby legislative power is not conferred by the people, but has been transmitted ever since 1848, by the laying on of the consecrated hands of the senators holding over.

Neither the statutes nor the constitution of the state warrant any such doctrine.

The majority of the senators holding over, upon whom the attorney-general would confer the whole judicial power of the senate over the elections of its members, is a body unknown to the constitution and laws of the state.

It is urged that it is necessary that the senators holding over should examine the certificates as a protection against forgery and fraud, to which the answer seems fair that no such necessity has been observed in the organization of the assembly; that the protection is found in the statutes providing for certificates and that more imminent risk is encountered by the placing of power contended for in the hands of a partisan minority, smarting under the lash of popular disapproval.

If the hold-over senators must pass on the credentials of new senators, and if new senators cannot become such until they are "admitted" by the hold-over senate, see where we are led. There is no power whatever to coerce the acceptance of credentials, and the "admission" of new senators, and seven men can at any time completely block legislation.

A body of eleven senators is a quorum. Public policy will incline the court to recognize as valid the organization which possesses a quorum and is able to perform the urgent public duties of the senate; respect for the constitutional rights of the electors will lead to the recognition of the body which represents the majority; self respect will lead to the repudiation of a scheme of trickery and fraud.

Mr. Richard Wayne Parker, also for respondent Rogers:

1. Upon the evidence it is clear that no writ of quo warranto can issue against Robert Adrain. He certainly never is, nor ever pretended to be, president of the senate. Upon the papers and upon the facts, he holds merely the place of temporary chairman of a minority of senators. There is no controversy, no place for litigation on this subject.

2. It is equally clear that no writ can issue against Maurice A. Rogers. He is president of the senate, elected by a majority of that body, duly assembled according to the constitution. No court will challenge his right as such, or interfere with the legislative department of the government. But outside of that his right is clear. There is no reason to file any information against him.

Beasley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case has been placed before the court on a rule to show cause why an information in the nature of a quo warranto should not be issued against these respondents, each of whom claims, and to some extent has exercised, the office of president of the senate of New Jersey. Under this procedure, evidence has been taken, and it thus appears that the twenty-one senators of the state have divided themselves into two bodies; that is to say, nine of the old members, who were styled in the argument "hold-over members," constitute one of such bodies, and four hold-over members, with seven newly chosen senators, constitute the other body. Subsequently, a newly chosen senator joined himself to the body made up of hold-over senators, making that body to consist of ten senators; the other consists, as just shown, of eleven. The former of these bodies will be referred to, in order to avoid periphrase, as the "Adrain Senate," the latter as the "Rogers Senate." The Adrain (so called) senate, has been recognized officially by the governor, and remains in session. The Rogers (so called) senate, is recognized officially by the house assembly, but has been refused official recognition by the executive. It has passed various laws, and, with the co-operation of the lower house, has appointed a treasurer and comptroller of this state. The above is a description of the general aspect of the case, and it will be sufficient for immediate purposes.

The object of the present course of law is to establish by a judicial judgment which of these contestants is the genuine, and which the spurious, state senate, for they cannot both be genuine. But, before proceeding to dispose of that important question, the counsel of Mr. Rogers' senate have interposed a preliminary one; that is, whether this court can take cognizance of such a litigation. It is inferred that the argument on this subject, denying the existence of the judicial power in this position, has not been impressive. In my judgment, it is founded in all its parts on a sheer petitio principii, as on a denial of a legal principle so entirely established as not to be debatable; for it proceeds on the assumption that the senate it advocates is a constitutional senate, in that the judgment of a majority of the senators elected with respect to this position, whether or not they have organized in conformity to, or in violation of, the constitution of the state, is conclusive and final. It will be observed that the contention of the applicants for this writ is that the Rogers' senate has no legal existence, inasmuch as it was organized in a manner contrary to this fundamental law; and the proposition, therefore, would seem very evident that, as no power is vested by the constitution in this majority of senators to construe such law in this respect, the power to expound and enforce it is lodged in the ordinary legal tribunals. Referring to this judicial prerogative, Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (page 46), says: "This right and power of the court to do this are so plain, and the duty is so generally, we may almost say universally, conceded, that we should not be justified in wearying the patience of the reader in quoting from the very numerous authorities on this subject." It was certainly, therefore, the unexpected that happened when learned counsel, in reply to the contention that the senatorial organization in question was inconsistent with constitutional prescriptions, assumed the position that this court could not entertain jurisdiction in the case, as the interpretation of the constitution was a matter, in the language of the brief before us, of a purely legislative character. It is believed that no decision has been made for a century past that does not antagonize such a proposition.

It will be understood that, in the vindication of what is esteemed to be the undeniable prerogative of this court, there is not the slightest suggestion of the existence of a judicial capacity to control the legislative authority when exercised within its appropriate sphere. If the question here prescribed had been whether this senatorial body had been organized in the accustomed mode, or in open violation of its own practice and rules, a totally different subject of inquiry would have been sub judice; and it may well be that the decision of such senatorial body itself would have been received as conclusive, and entirely beyond the power of this tribunal to review. This court does not claim the slightest legal faculty to supervise or interfere with such transaction. All that is asserted is that when the inquiry is whether the legislature, or any state body or officer, has violated the regulations of the constitution, it is entirely plain that the decision of that subject must rest exclusively with the judicial department of the government. Nor can we for a moment forget that, in entering upon the inquiry that is now imposed upon us as a duty, we have to do with a subject of great importance and delicacy, and that, before the respective powers of this court can be exerted to interfere with the action of a co-ordinate branch of the state government, we must be as certain as care and diligence can make us that the foundation on which we place ourselves is sure and stable. That this court has the legal right to entertain jurisdiction in this case, displayed by this record, we have no doubt; and we are further of opinion that it is scarcely possible to conceive of any crisis in public affairs that would more imperatively than the present one call for the intervention of such judicial authority.

With respect to the further contention that the presidency of the senate does not belong to that class of officers whose legality can be put to the test by force of a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto, our conclusion is that such contention cannot prevail. The language of the statute of this state, being broader than its English prototype, describes, in terms of the utmost generality, the scope of this remedy; for it declares that it shall be applicable to every case in which "any person or persons shall usurp, intrude into, or unlawfully hold or execute, any office or franchise within this state." Consequently, it does not seem deniable that all offices, as well those derived from the legislature as those derived from other sources, are comprehended by this definition; and the consequence must be, therefore, that the statutory provision just cited justifies the present proceeding unless it can be shown that such action would be inconsistent with the constitution or privileges of the senate, as an independent department of the government. And, indeed, this was one of the positions of counsel on the argument before us; but we think it is obvious that whatever seeming force an argument has is derived from the petitio principii before alluded to, for it assumes as its basis that the court is taking proceedings against the officer of a genuine senate. But this assumption is unfounded, as the process that we are now asked to order is to be directed against the appointee of a senate that, it is alleged, is spurious. It seems to be plain that such action cannot be an infringement of the prerogatives of the real senate of this state; and, in disposing of this part of the case, no stress is laid on the fact that each of the respondents, if legally in power, is entitled to hold ex officio certain high offices, by virtue of the constitution and the laws of this state, for it seems to be well to place the right of the court to authorize the use of the present procedure on the distinct ground that it is the appropriate and legal remedy whenever it shall be made to appear that any person is holding himself out as a public officer by senatorial appointment, when, in point of fact, such appointing body has no existence, in view of constitutional provisions and regulations. As at present advised, I do not perceive how in any case there can be any judicial interference with the actions, appointments, or proceedings of a true senate of the state, unless the same shall be shown to be out of harmony with the constitution itself. We wish to be understood that we do not intend to, and do not decide anything further than the case now before us. When, by judicial action, it becomes necessary to demark the constitutional lines which separate the jurisdiction and powers of the several independent departments of government, each from the others, we are deeply conscious that in such momentous matters we should be always on our guard, and that our judgment with respect to them should be invariably in the concrete; for experience has demonstrated that theorizing and speculation on such occasions are dangerous in the extreme, and are inventions that have severally returned "to plague the inventor."

Having thus briefly disposed of the preliminary question in favor of the jurisdiction of this court, it becomes necessary to proceed to an examination of the legal aspect of the case, as presented in the issue upon the record. That issue has been framed in this wise: In order to expedite the determination of the case, counsel of these litigants agreed that, if cognizance should be taken by the court of their controversy, it should be assumed that an information had been filed, and that each of the contending parties had interposed his answer, stating the facts which appear in the evidence and which are not in dispute, by force of which he seeks to vindicate his title, and that reciprocal demurrers should then be put in, thus exhibiting to the court the litigated points to be determined. The facts contained in the answers alluded to are somewhat voluminous, and will be found contained in the statement which prefaces this opinion. Upon looking into the presentation of the facts thus indicated, it will be at once apparent that the central ground of controversy between these rival organizations is with respect to the right of the Adrain senate, or what is called the "Hold-Over Senate," to dominate on the occasion of the introduction of newly elected members into the senate. In the very able and carefully considered briefs of the attorney-general and his associates, this dominance is claimed to exist on the ground that, by the proper construction of the constitution of the state, the state senate is a continuous body,—that is, that it has perpetual life,—and that, consequently, a member elected to one of its seats cannot enter it until his title has been passed upon by the ever-existing body. It has not and cannot be pretended that this doctrine has its root in the actual expressions of the constitution, and it, therefore, is admittedly the creature of construction. The only provisions of the constitution pertinent to this subject are the following: Article 4, § 1, provides that the legislative power shall be vested in a senate and general assembly; and in paragraph 3 of the same section it is provided that "members of the senate and general assembly shall be elected yearly and every year, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November; and the two houses shall meet separately on the second Tuesday of January next after the said day of election, at which time of meeting the legislative year shall commence," etc. Section 2 provides that the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state, elected by the legal voters of the counties, respectively, for three years. By the second paragraph of section 3 of article 4 it is provided "that as soon as the senate shall meet after the first election to be held in pursuance of this constitution, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the first year; of the second class at the expiration of the second year; and of the third class at the expiration of the third year, so that one class may be elected every year," etc. It is apparent that these recitals fully justify the remark first made,—that the constitution does not attempt to define the life of the senate; yet, notwithstanding such silence, the attorney-general and the counsel of President Adrain raise the contention that the state senate, like the senate of the United States, has a continuous existence; that there can be no such things as an old senate and a new senate; and that there has been an unbroken continuity of existence of this body from its birth to this hour. And, as a corollary of this doctrine, it is further insisted that this self-sustaining body is the sole judge of the right of newly elected senators, when they apply for admission to its seats, and that it can, on such occasions, receive or reject them at its will. In the application of this theory to this case, it was claimed that the body presided over by Mr. Adrain had the right to require that the credentials of senators-elect should be placed before it to be retained, and to be adjudicated upon at such time and in such mode as itself might deem proper. If the state senate has the inherent vitality thus asserted, it seems to be undeniable that it had the power to act as it did on the occasion that has given rise to this litigation; for, by the plain language of the constitution itself, it is declared that "each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." It will be perceived, therefore, that the question now to be considered and decided by this court is, Has the senate of the state the perpetuity thus claimed?

The first and most elaborate argument, pressed with such force and earnestness upon the attention of the court by the learned attorney-general and his able associate, Mr. McDermott, was grounded almost entirely upon the fact that the clause in the constitution of this state that gives to the membership of the senate a continuity of life by a succession of members, in such a way that provides for the continual presence of a quorum of the body, was a transcript of a similar provision in the Federal Constitution; and it was thereupon further insisted that the language of the regulation, so adopted, had, before its adoption, a settled meaning, denoting the permanent existence of the body regulated by it. If we were to assume the truth of the foregoing statement, in all its parts, no one could doubt that the reasoning founded upon it would be entitled to great weight. It cannot be denied that the section is, in substance, a copy of a clause of the same import in the Constitution of the United States; and if the clause, so imported, had antecedently received an authoritative interpretation, it would be but reasonable to infer that the framers of our organic laws, many of whom were justly of great learning and experience, understood the provision in the sense thus impressed upon it. Under such circumstances, no other conclusion would be at all rational. The rule is well settled, says this court in the case of State v. Kuhl, 51 N. J. L. 191, "that where a statute or constitutional provision of doubtful import has been adopted in one state from the statutes or constitution of another state, after a practical construction has been given to the language by judicial decision, it will be presumed that the interpretation adopted in the state from which it is taken has been adopted, as well as its words." If, therefore, counsel, on this occasion, are justified in predicating that the clause under criticism had acquired, in the manner indicated, a settled signification at the time in question, it must be admitted that this would be the sense in which it should be now read and understood. But, upon careful examination of the subject, I am satisfied that the assumption in question is wholly without basis. So far as I have ascertained, no person, whether text-writer, jurist, or statesman, has ever asserted that the clause under discussion bears the force and meaning now for the first time imputed to it; and it would have been singular, indeed, if any critic had ventured to express such an opinion, for the constitutional provision obviously would refuse to bear such treatment. The expressions employed do not, in any degree, import the continuance of the senate itself, but simply provide for the succession and length of the terms of the members of that body. It is true that, by providing an always-existent membership, the clause imparts to the body the potentiality of a permanent existence, but it does not impart to the body such continuous vitality. I think it is safe to say that never, on any occasion, has it been suggested that the clause has any further reach than this. The senate of the United States has been declared to be a permanent body, and, when the subject was under discussion, it was on all sides assumed that the section in the Federal Constitution (from which, as has been stated, our own has been copied) gave to the senate an aptitude for a continuous existence, but it was never alleged that it was possessed of any further effect. The vivifying force that was infused into the body thus made capable of receiving it was looked for and discovered in other constitutional adjustments, and especially in the provision that gave to the senate an always existent presiding officer. This is a factor mentioned and relied on by every one who has written upon the subject, and similarly it has been the principal argument in all debates relating to the longevity of the senate. It was deemed that the permanency of the presiding officer constituted the permanency of the body itself, as, by such a constitution, there was no necessity for periodical reorganization. It is obvious, therefore, that the construction put upon the national constitution can have but little effect in an effort to construe our own. The problems are differently conditioned, so that the solution of one of them will afford but slender assistance in the solution of the other.

We must construe our own constitution exclusively by its own lights. Adopting this method, I will now turn to the several provisions of the constitution of this state that appear to me in any degree to elucidate the question under consideration.

Upon opening this instrument, the first feature of it that, in connection with the subject in hand, strikes our attention, is the declaration that "the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state, elected by the legal voters of the counties," etc. In looking at this constitutional mandate, the inquiry at once arises, Does it mean that at all times, within the range of human possibility, such shall be the composition of the body in question, or that it shall have such composition only sometimes? Does it mean that on some occasions the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county, and on other occasions, in the orderly working of the system established, it shall be composed of only two thirds of such members? It is difficult to see how it can be plausibly argued that the clause cited is not designed to establish, as far as possible, a permanent composition of the senate; and this view, it must be admitted, is much strengthened when we look at the purpose of this provision. That purpose obviously is to provide that each county shall be perpetually represented and have a voice in this body on every measure that comes before it, whatever its nature may be. To deprive a county of such a prerogative is plainly unjust and therefore it is clear that any construction that tends to the production of such wrong should be viewed with distrust, and should not be sanctioned, unless upon considerations that amount to a demonstration of its correctness. And, adopting this as the sound principle, it becomes at once manifest that it is scarcely possible to maintain successfully the proposition that it is not the entire body of senators, but only a class of them, who are to take part in the organization of the senatorial body. The importance of that function strongly repels such a theory.

Organization involves the composition of the body organized, and consequently it involves the right of the counties to participate in the decision of the all-important question which of them shall be represented in the body, and which of them shall be unrepresented. It seems to me that the mandate of the constitution that the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county cannot be reasonably enforced except by the adoption of the hypothesis that each senator shall have a voice in all the proceedings that result in the composition of the body itself. When, therefore, on the occasion that gave rise to the present controversy, it was asserted that one third of all the counties of the state should be excluded from all participation in a transaction so vital to their rights, and affecting so intimately the interests of the entire commonwealth, a doctrine was asserted that must be considered as devoid of all reasonable foundation, unless it can be made plainly manifest from the provisions of the primary law of our state. The principle that two thirds or even a lesser number of the senators chosen by the counties shall have absolute ascendancy in the organization of the senate is, it should be noticed in passing, not only antagonistic to the language and spirit of the constitutional clause just cited, but is likewise in conspicuous violation of that great and fundamental law underlying all our institutions,—that it is the will of the majority of the people that is supreme. He who asserts that this axiom, which may be called “national” in its character, does not prevail on any occasion, must prove his proposition, and must prove it conclusively, for every legal intendment will, a priori, be against its truth. It is not too much to say that with regard to the transaction before us this cannot be done, except by putting a finger on the very section or sections of the constitution in which the alleged heterodoxy is to be found unambiguously written. That this was not done by the counsel arguing before us in favor of the doctrine that in the all-important affair of organizing the state senate it is the minority, and not the majority, that shall rule, is conspicuously manifest from the fact that the only constitutional clause that was relied upon was the one that distributes senators into classes; but, as it has appeared that such clause is just as applicable to the supposition of an annual senate as it is to that of a perpetual senate, it is manifest that a reference to that section is altogether futile. But, while this was the only citation relied on for the purpose of proving the existence in this state of an ever-living senate, my examination has led me to the discovery that others exist that cannot in my opinion, be reconciled with the doctrine contended for. The first provisions of the class indicated are those clauses of the constitution which, to all appearance, provide for a yearly organization of both the senate and the house of assembly. In this respect the two bodies are placed upon the same footing, and subjected to the same regulations. No express power to organize is conferred upon either of them, but by necessary implication, it belongs similarly to both. The assemblymen and senators are required to meet yearly, at an appointed day. With respect to the former class, each of the class has the undisputed right to take part in the organization, and it would certainly seem to follow that each senator is vested with a similar prerogative. When the power to organize is merely a legal intendment, the power consists in a right to organize in the customary manner, and it therefore excludes the notion of a minority ruling in the transaction. In the case of the assembly, it is admitted that the organization must be effected in accordance with usual modes. In that affair it is not pretended that there can be any dominance of a minority. It does not appear, therefore, how it can be reasonably maintained that the senate, in exercising this important function, shall be subjected to an abnormal condition, and that, in its use, there shall be a dominance of the minority. The organizing power of the senate being derived in its totality by legal implication, it appears to be plain that the law will not imply a regulation that would be both unusual and unjust.

The next provision to which reference will be made appears to be of paramount importance. It is to be found in paragraph 3 of section 1, in article 4. It is thus expressed: “Members of the senate and general assembly shall be elected yearly and every year on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, and the two houses shall meet separately on the second Tuesday in January next after the said day of election, at which time of meeting the legislative year shall commence.” This clause is significant with respect to the subject we are considering in all its parts, its first observable feature being that it appoints a day for the organization of both legislative houses. The purpose for the meeting on the day specified cannot be doubted. Indeed, it never has been doubted. It has always been so understood and acted upon. It, therefore, is plain that it is a direction for the senate to organize; for the expression is, “The two houses shall meet separately.” Both houses here are placed upon the same basis for the same purpose, and most assuredly they are thus similarly treated as though an organization were equally essential to the legal existence of each body. The assembly is, of course, a body that needs a yearly resurrection; and the senate is here required, to all appearance, to do precisely what the assembly is directed to do. Beyond all question, we here find that a duty is imposed on both the assembly and the senate to confer at an appointed time, and to effect a yearly organization. Such a regulation is appropriate to a body that expires yearly, but it is inappropriate and unprecedented in its application to a body that is possessed of a permanent life. In the practice of the United States senate, which, we have stated, is an ever-living body, there is no fixed day for the admission of new members-elect. The certificates of incoming senators are presented from time to time, or at convenient occasions, and are thus severally passed upon. From the regulation in question it appears to be, if not the necessary, at least the reasonable, inference, that the senate of this state is no more a continuous body than is the assembly. The two remaining regulations of this section cited lead strongly, as it is deemed, to the same result. The first of these is the direction, in the language of the statute, “that the two houses shall meet separately on,” etc. Now, it is obvious that the expression “houses” must, of necessity, be construed to denote the members of such houses. It can mean nothing else, for it is obvious that, at the time specified, there is no house of assembly in existence. Ascribing, then, this necessary signification to this expression, we have a constitutional direction that the members of the senate shall assemble at the time specified, in order to organize. It does not seem that it can be denied that such a regulation, in a very perspicuous form, repudiates the notion of a continuous senate. Also, in the next place, the designation of a legislative year—that is, when such year shall begin, and when it shall end—tends in the same direction. What has a perpetual body to do with prescribed periods of time? The legislative year, thus established, obviously accords with the official life of the assembly, and it appears reasonable to suppose that it was meant to accord with a senatorial life of equal extent. In fine, after a very careful study of the constitution of the state, my conclusion is that its intimations are all to this effect: that the claim, advanced for the first time on this occasion, that the senate is a permanent, continuous body, is without any valid foundation.

Nor has there been found any more substantial basis for the doctrine just discarded in the past practice of the senate in respect to its yearly organization. The practice may be thus generally described: In the first instance, the senate, under the new constitution, was organized as the house of assembly now is,—by the action of all its members. Then for some years afterwards, upon the senators convening, a roll containing the names of all the senators was called; but in subsequent years the practice was to call the names only of the senators holding over. This was not an unnatural course, as those senators had before taken the oath of office, and their credentials had already been inspected. In this condition of things, the custom obtained for the incoming members to present their credentials to the body of senators holding over, and upon their approval they were sworn in. The office thus performed by the old senators was, in the substance, purely formal, as much so as though they had been a committee appointed by the body of senators to inspect and to report upon the credentials of the new senators. On no occasion did they exercise any other power, nor did they ever pretend to be possessed of any other power. There is not an instance in which they undertook to adjudicate on the right of a senator-elect to his seat, nor did they ever hold such right in subordination. If this body has the absolute power now asserted for the first time, and after a lapse of half a century, it certainly would be a most strange circumstance that during this long period the existence of such power was never manifested by a single word or a single act. The claim of such an imperial authority, made at this late day, is an entire novelty, and, like most novelties in legal matters, is not well founded. It is likewise in this connection important to note that during that long time the senatorial action was regulated by the eighty-fifth section of the act relating to elections (Revision, p. 358), which is in the following terms: "That the senate and assembly shall convene and hold their sessions in the state house in Trenton; and in the organization of such houses, the certified copies of the statements of determination made under the direction of the sixty-ninth section of this act shall be deemed and taken to be prima facie evidence of the right of persons therein mentioned to the seats in the houses, respectively, to which they shall have been so determined to be elected." No one can look at this act and fail to perceive that it is absolutely irreconcilable with the theory of an over-existent senate. This is so entirely the case that the very astute counsel of President Adrain insisted that it was void, as it attempted to prescribe to an existing senate a rule controlling its action in a matter committed to its exclusive jurisdiction by the constitution. On the premises postulated by counsel that the senate is ever-living, his argument was invincible; but the existence of the statute, and a submission to it, for such "a cycle of years," exhibited in a very impressive form the fact that the contemporaneous construction of the constitution in the particulars in question was adverse to the present claim, which I have designated as a "novelty." This statute is not to be misunderstood in this respect that it provides for the introduction of senators by the process of organization; and it rejects altogether the idea of an admission of senators into a body already formed as continually existing. When we add to the fact that the ancient and continued practice has been in pursuance of, and in obedience to, this law, the further circumstance that the senate, as a matter of fact, has been, and must of necessity be, yearly organized, and that, in the performance of this ultimate act in such process,—that is, in the choice of its permanent president,—all the senators elected have invariably co-operated, the pretense of a continuous senate must be declared to be an utter fallacy. The construction that would convert this customary method of senatorial procedure into a practice to admit members into a body always existing, and therefore always organized, seems to me an afterthought; and the fact that such a theory is a novelty, undreamed of for half a century, is of itself enough to explode it. In legal affairs, it is the practical and common-sense view that, in general, is the true view, as neither the affairs of men nor of state can be regulated by logical refinement. Where subtlety begins the law ends. When I accept, therefore, the understanding that plainly appears to have prevailed for so long a time, I feel great confidence that I have not fallen into error. The doctrine in question stands, as I think, condemned, both by the intimations of the constitution itself, as well as by a long continued and practical exposition.

The result of the inquiry before us is that we have concluded that the senate of New Jersey is not a continuous body, but that it expires annually, in the same sense that the assembly does. Therefore, our conclusion is that Mr. Adrain has no title to the office that he ostensibly holds, and that the appropriate judgment must be entered against him. With respect to the title of the opposite claimant, Mr. Rogers, we hold that his title must be regarded as constitutional and valid. Our resolution in this regard is founded entirely on the power that, touching the act of reorganizing its own body, the majority of senators are the absolute masters of the occasion. Such action is taken by a body co-ordinate with ourselves, and whose proceedings, when not violative of the constitution of the state, we have no capacity to supervise or control. In our opinion, when a majority of the senators organized the senate, and elected Mr. Rogers as president, such action was and is conclusive upon this court, as well as upon all departments of the government. Let a judgment be entered accordingly.

I am authorized by the following of my associates to say that they concur in these views: Justices DePue, Van Syckel, Dixon, Reed, Garrison, and Lippincott.

Abbott, J., dissenting:

The senate of New Jersey came into existence under the Constitution of 1844. It was created to take the place of the legislative council provided by the Constitution of 1776. The council was an annual body, its members being all elected for one year only. The senate at its first meeting in 1845 consisted of nineteen members, one from each of the then counties of the state. It was divided as equally as possible into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class were vacated at the expiration of the first year, of the second class at the expiration of the second year, and of the third class at the expiration of the third year, so that in accordance with the constitution one class may be elected every year; and if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, the persons elected to supply such vacancies shall be elected for the unexpired terms only. The term of office of senators is three years. Two new counties have been created since 1844, and the full senate now consists of twenty-one senators, of whom eleven are a quorum to do business.

At the election held in November, 1893, eight senators were elected to take the places of the senators whose terms of office would expire January 8, 1894. On January 9 there were existent thirteen hold-over senators, and eight senators-elect. Nine of the hold-over senators met in the senate chamber and elected one of their number, Robert Adrain, their presiding officer, and thereafter claimed to have elected him "president of the senate," upon the insistence that the four other hold-over senators were actually or constructively present at the time of his election. The four, however, insisted upon certain assurances from the nine as to their future action, and these being refused, they withdrew and associated themselves with seven of the senators-elect, and these eleven organized themselves into a second body, which they insist is the true senate of New Jersey, because, as they contend, the quorum of the senate provided for by the constitution was present at this organization. This body elected Maurice A. Rogers as "president of the senate." The thirteen hold-over senators constituting the two classes of the senate whose terms of office had not expired, did not voluntarily act together as one body, but divided themselves as I have stated. Under the constitution, the senate elects its own president. If either of the bodies described was the true senate of New Jersey at the time it acted, then the person chosen by that body is president of the senate.

The questions in this case are: First, whether the court has jurisdiction to try the issues raised by the record; second, jurisdiction being found, is either of the respondents president of the senate of New Jersey? It is clear that to elect a president of the senate, the body exercising such power must be the senate. There can be only one senate in existence, and the decision of the rights of the respondent therefore depends upon the answer to the question, Was either of these bodies the senate of New Jersey?

I have reached the conclusions for the reasons hereinafter stated, that neither of said bodies at the time it acted was the true senate of New Jersey; that the senate is a continuous body, and at that time consisted of the thirteen senators composing the two classes whose terms of office had not then expired.

The jurisdiction of the court to try this controversy is in my judgment clear. The object of the litigation is not to interfere with the functions of the legislative department of the state, or either of the houses, which, together, constitute that department; it is to ascertain whether either of the two bodies claiming to be the senate is really the senate of New Jersey. That such an inquiry is a judicial one seems to be established on principle and authority. McCrary, Elections, 896; Prince v. Skillin, 71 Me. 367, 86 Am. Rep. 325; Re Gunn, 50 Kan. 155, 19 L. R. A. 519. This jurisdiction has also been upheld where it relates to the executive department, and the question was, Which of two contestants was lieutenant governor of a state? Atty. Gen. v. Barstow, 4 Wis. 567. The reasons for upholding the jurisdiction of this court, stated in the opinion of the learned chief justice, are conclusive. It is true that our constitution declares that "the legislative power shall be vested in a senate and general assembly," but when two bodies each claim to be the senate, a judicial question is presented.

This court in State v. Young, 83 N. J. L. 29, 32, says that "a legislative bill, which wanted the approval of either the assembly or the senate, or that of the governor, would be so plainly defective on constitutional grounds that this court would not hesitate in the exercise of its clearly legitimate power in declaring it absolutely void." In the same case it treats the certificate signed by the president of the senate and the speaker of the house as "conclusive evidence" of the passage of a bill through the two houses. The court may, therefore, inquire into the question of title when two persons claim to be president of the senate, and to do so in this case, it is necessary to decide which body, if either, is the constitutional senate.

This court having jurisdiction, the duty is imposed upon it, of deciding which of the claimants, if either, has shown title to the office. The question of title involves the inquiry, whether our senate expires annually in the same sense that the assembly does, or is like the senate of the United States, a continuous, "ever living body." There is no such body as a "new senate" known to the Constitution of the United States. There is biennially a new house of representatives, because the entire membership of that body expires at the end of every second year, but not so the senate. The constitution replenishes that body every two years by the election of a class of senators, and thereby gives continuity to that body. The debates in the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and those in the senate, and the procedure of that body, show that the senate of the United States is continuous, and in the case of Robertson v. Smith, 109 Ind. 79, the supreme court of Indiana, while holding that the senate of Indiana is not a continuous body, states the reason why it is not such, and recognizes the feature which establishes the continuity of the United States senate. Judge Niblack in delivering the opinion of the court says: "I feel quite assured that the senate of this state is not, like the senate of the United States, a continuous body. In the senate of the United States a majority constitutes a quorum, and as there is always more than a quorum of qualified senators holding seats in that body, its organic existence is necessarily continuous. But in the senate of this state two thirds of its members are necessary to make a quorum. As one half of its members go out of office at the end of each legislative term of two years, that is to say, on the day after each general and biennial election it becomes at the end of each such legislative term, a disorganized body."

The reasons given by this learned judge, for stating that the United States senate is necessarily continuous, apply equally to both the United States senate and to the senate of New Jersey. A majority constitutes a quorum in both bodies, and in both there is always more than a quorum of qualified senators holding seats in the body. If it is necessarily continuous in one case, it must, for the same reasons, be necessarily continuous in the other.

If the rule applicable to the United States senate is to be applied to the senate of this state, the thirteen so-called hold-over senators were the senate of New Jersey on January 9, and as such had the exclusive and absolute power to determine "the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Such has ever been the practice and usage in the senate of the United States. Every senator-elect must there present his credentials to the senate composed of the hold-over senators, and must be inducted into office with the assent of that senate, so composed. Upon the question of the admission of a senator into the senate of the United States, no senator-elect has ever been treated as a member of that body. In every instance induction has been by the action of a majority of a quorum of the senate composed of senators theretofore inducted into office. This practice is necessarily based upon the assumption that the senate is always in existence, always composed of inducted senators, and that it has existed, as an "ever-living senate," from the time of its organization to the present hour.

I feel the more confidence in stating this view thus broadly, because in the opinion of the court in this case, read by the learned chief justice, it is stated as an incontrovertible proposition that the United States senate "is an ever-living body."

It is insisted, however, that although it is true that the senate of the United States is a continuous body, yet the New Jersey senate is different from its great prototype. This contention is founded upon alleged differences between the Constitution of the United States, and the constitution of the state of New Jersey, and an alleged difference of practice prevailing in this state.

An examination of the two instruments, and the practice thereunder, will not support this contention. The language of our constitution is substantially identical with that part of the Constitution of the United States, whose provisions have been held to create a continuous senate. Let us compare the two instruments.

The Constitution of the United States provides: "Article 1, section 3. 1. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the legislature thereof for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

"2. Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any state, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

"Section 5. 1. Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may provide.

"2. Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member.

"4. Neither house, during the session of congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting."

The Constitution of New Jersey provides:

"Article 4, section 2. 1. The senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state, elected by the legal voters of the counties respectively for three years.

"2. As soon as the senate shall meet after the first election to be held in pursuance of this constitution, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the first year, of the second class at the expiration of the second year, and of the third class at the expiration of the third year, so that one class may be elected every year; and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, the persons elected to supply such vacancies shall be elected for the unexpired terms only.

"Section 4. Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may provide.

"3. Each house shall choose its own officers, determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two thirds may expel a member.

"5. Neither house, during the session of the legislature, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting."

A comparison of these provisions in the two constitutions shows that they are exactly parallel, and it is apparent that the language of the New Jersey Constitution of 1844 is a copy of provisions in the Constitution of the United States, with only such changes as were rendered necessary by reason of the difference in the terms of office of senators in the two bodies and the constituencies they represent. The only real difference is that our senators are chosen for three years instead of six, and represent counties instead of states. But that one constitution was modeled upon the other seems to me beyond question. The reasons given by Judge Niblack for the continuity of the United States senate exist with reference to our senate under language similar to that used in the Constitution of the United States to create a continuous senate. Not only does this clearly appear from the language itself, but the history of the adoption of the provisions of our constitution, and the arguments and debate in our constitutional convention, and the procedure thereunder, confirm this conclusion.

When the convention met in 1844, two different views were represented by the members of that body: One party was in favor of continuing the policy laid down in the Constitution of 1776 and making the terms of office of the members of both houses annual, while the majority were in favor of modeling our senate upon that of the United States. The convention, after a most interesting debate upon the report of the committee on this point favored the latter proposition and settled the question, by a vote of thirty to twenty-two.

The reasons influencing the majority were clearly stated by Mr. Vroom in his speech to the convention, June 7, 1844: The composition of the senate being under consideration, he said "the reason,—the great object of fixing the terms of senators at three years, is not only because they are connected with the executive, but by this means the senate will be a more permanent body than the house of assembly. . . . If the senate is elected annually, you will have a changing legislature as we always have had." On motion made to amend the term of senators from three years to two Mr. Ogden, although advocating it, said: "The reasons given in favor of permanency of the senate are strong."

That the statesmen in the convention of 1844 meant to make the state senate an ever-living body when they used in our constitution the language of the Federal Constitution that made the United States senate continuous cannot be more forcibly presented than by quoting the language of the learned judge who wrote the opinion in State v. Kuhl, 51 N. J. L. 199. He says: "That in a convention in which these distinguished men exercised a controlling influence a clause should have been incorporated in our state constitution, with the intention that it should receive an interpretation different from that which we may reasonably assume they knew had been applied to it in the unvarying practice of the federal government for nearly half a century is scarcely conceivable."

After the Constitutional Convention of 1844 had thus for the purpose expressed, incorporated in our fundamental law the provisions of the Constitution of the United States which makes the United States senate "an ever living body," we find that the state senate at its first session, in 1845, proceeded to follow the exact mode of procedure, under the Constitution of 1844, that the United States senate at its first session adopted under similar provisions in the United States Constitution.

The action of the senate at its first session under the Constitution of 1844 was in strict conformity with the action taken by the senate of the United States when it first met in 1789. In both bodies a special committee was appointed and reported a mode of classifying the senators, which divided them into three classes, and the term of each class was decided by lot, and the senate decided "that the classes shall vacate their seats in the senate according to the order of numbers drawn for them, beginning with number one."

Not only was the provision of our constitution in reference to classification of senators suggested by the provision of the Federal Constitution, but the exact mode of dividing the classes used by the United States senate was adopted by the New Jersey senate. (See Benton's Abridgment, vol. 1, pp. 14, 15, and Senate Journal 1845, p. 169).

The procedure of the first two sessions of the senate undoubtedly reflected the views of the framers of the Constitution of 1844. Alexander Wurts, president of the Constitutional Convention of 1844, was a member of the senate of 1845. He was also president pro tempore of the senate of 1846.

It is important and instructive to note the difference between the steps taken to induct into office the senators-elect in 1845 and those taken to induct the senators-elect at the next legislative session in 1846.

The senate journal of January 14th, 1845, shows that "John C. Smallwood, Esq., of the county of Gloucester, produced a certificate of election as a member of the senate for the county of Gloucester, which certificate was read and approved. Thereupon he took and subscribed the affirmation prescribed by the constitution and laws of New Jersey before the Hon. Alexander Wurts, one of the members of the senate-elect, and took his seat in the senate." And thereafter each senator elect produced and presented his own certificate of election, and the same was read and the same action taken thereon, as in the case of Mr. Smallwood, and each thereafter took and subscribed the same affirmation before Mr. Smallwood, and thereafter took his seat in the senate, and then the record proceeds: "The members of the senate present having all been sworn or affirmed, proceeded to the election of a president of the senate."

In 1846, however, the senate did not proceed in this matter. It changed its mode of procedure because there was then an existing senate composed of two hold-over classes. (Class two and class three drawn and named by the senate in 1845). In 1846 the record shows that Senator Wurts, being then a hold-over senator, was appointed president pro tem., and the journal of January 13, 1846, states: "The president pro tempore having taken the chair, Mr. Hulme presented the credentials of the Hon. Stephen R. Grover, elected a senator from the county of Essex, which were read and approved; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. Grover he took his seat in the senate."

The same procedure was had with reference to all the other senators-elect who had been chosen by the counties to succeed the senators in class one, whose term of office had expired at the close of the legislative year of 1845. These credentials, according to the journal, were in every instance presented, read, and approved and the oath of office administered to the senators-elect, before they took their seats in the senate. It will be noted that at the first session of the senate, each senator-elect presented the certificate of his own election; the next year the credentials of each senator-elect were presented by a senator of one of the hold-over classes. The credentials thus presented were "read and approved." Can there be any doubt of the significance of this procedure? To whom were the credentials presented if not to the senate? And if there was no difference between the first and second session, if each was a "new senate," why was it considered necessary after the senate was organized in 1845 that an inducted senator should in every instance present the credentials of a senator-elect. The procedure shows that Senator Wurts and his hold-over associates (composed of the second and third classes of the senate of 1845) entertained the belief that they were the senate, and that the bearers of credentials, the senators-elect, could not participate in the proceedings of the senate, even to the extent of presenting credentials, until they have been admitted to membership by the affirmative action of an existing and continuing senate. If there was not a senate in existence, to whom did Mr. Hulme present the credentials of Mr. Grover, as stated in the journal.

The organization of the senate in 1845 was necessarily done in the manner stated by the journal. It was necessary, because there was no senate then in existence, which could judge of the credentials of senators-elect. The New Jersey senate in this respect followed the procedure of the organization of the senate of the United States. Each took the same action because of the necessity of organizing at the beginning of their existence by the consent of those claiming to be senators. The procedure of induction into the state senate thus instituted in 1846 has never been changed. No senator, with but a single exception, has ever been admitted to membership, except by the presentation of his credentials by an inducted member and by the approval of those credentials by a vote of the senate, presided over by a president pro tempore or permanent. The single exception is found in the journal of July 12, 1875, which states that "Mr. Taylor moved that in consequence of the Hon. J. Howard Willetts not having his credentials present as senator-elect from the county of Cumberland he be permitted to take the oath of office and to file his credentials with the secretary at his earliest convenience," which was agreed to. The oath prescribed by law having been duly administered to Mr. Willetts by the president pro tempore he took his seat in the senate.

This exception shows that the senate composed of the hold-over senators (which according to the journal on that day were fourteen in number), exercised the power of admitting a senator without the presentation of his credentials. They determined his election, returns, and qualifications without the presence of any certificate of the result of the election.

Continuing the history of the senate from 1847 to 1893, inclusive, the unbroken custom has been for the president of the senate, permanent or pro tempore, to administer the oath to those admitted to the body and the record of each of these years shows that these oaths were administered in open session, whether there was or was not a contest as to a seat. An examination of the cases, where the right of the member-elect to take a seat in the senate has been impeached, shows that no senator-elect has ever been permitted to take his seat in the senate as a matter of right, upon the mere presentation of his credentials. In every instance the senate has acted as an organized, existing senate, and the senate when thus acting has, in every instance, been composed exclusively of inducted senators, acting as an organized body. No senator-elect, since 1845, has ever been inducted into office as a senator except by permission or affirmative action of the senate.

The cases of contest shown in the record are as follows: John Torrey, Jr., senator-elect from Ocean county (S. J. Jan. 12, 1869); John Hopper, senator-elect from Passaic county (S. J. Jan. 13, 1874); Edward F. McDonald, senator-elect from Hudson county (S. J. Jan. 14, 1890); Wm. J. Keys, senator-elect from Somerset county (S. J. Jan. 13, 1891); Robert S. Hudspeth, senator-elect from Hudson county (S. J. Jan. 12, 1892). In each of these years the journal shows that the roll of senators was called by the secretary chosen at the preceding session of the senate, and that only the names of the hold-over senators were called as members of the then existing senate. In every instance a president pro tempore was chosen by the hold-over senators, acting as the senate, and was in the chair as presiding officer of that body, before any credentials of senators-elect were presented to the senate. These credentials were always presented by a hold-over senator, and the returns and protests were read and referred to a committee, or otherwise disposed of by the senate, acting as a tribunal having absolute power over the subject-matter. In Mr. Torrey's case in 1869, fourteen hold-over senators acted as the senate and as such elected a president pro tempore. The credentials of this senator-elect were presented to this senate by a member thereof, one of the hold-over senators, and on motion were referred to the committee on elections, with the petition accompanying them. Then, upon motion of a hold-over senator, the record states that he "was allowed" to take the oath prescribed by law. The oath was administered to him by the president pro tempore of the senate. After all this action of the senate, and not before, the record shows, that he "took his seat in the senate." The only difference in Mr. Hopper's case in 1874, was that the protest against his election was read and laid on the table, this senate being composed of fifteen hold-over senators, and his credentials were "read and approved by the senate," and thereafter on taking an oath in like manner "he took his seat in the senate." In the contests in 1890, 1891, and 1892, similar action was taken by the senate, the protests in each case being read and referred to the committee on elections, the oath administered in open senate by its presiding officer and then, and not until then, the senator-elect taking his seat as a senator. The existence of the power to thus receive protests and act thereon, to waive the production of credentials (as in 1875) to adopt special motions for admission without adjudication upon returns, to choose a president pro tempore by the hold-over senators who presided and administered the oath to the incoming senators, can be supported only upon the theory that the senate is an ever-living body, the vitality of which is not interrupted by the expiration annually of the terms of a class of senators, composing one third of its membership.

At the commencement of the legislative year of 1887, there were fourteen hold-over senators, and they alone acted as the senate; they repeatedly by motion and by a majority vote postponed the organization of the senate from January 11 to February 1st, and on this last date the hold-over senators, still acting as the senate, elected a president pro tempore and proceeded, as a senate, to induct the senators-elect into office in the same way as heretofore stated. This precedent and the record of votes taken, clearly show that it was then considered unquestioned, that the hold-over senators constituted the senate, and that senators-elect had no right to participate in the action of the senate, until they were inducted into office by the senate composed of hold-over senators in the mode that had been recognized as proper for nearly half a century.

From 1846, when Senator Wurta was chosen president pro tempore of the senate to the present time, no one has ever been admitted to the senate until after the election by the hold-over senators of a president pro tempore; nor has the holder of credentials from any county ever been admitted to the senate (except in the case of Senator Willetta, in 1875, hereinbefore referred to), except upon the presentation to that body of his credentials, and its acceptance or approval of the same. No senator-elect has ever been admitted except upon the approval of his credentials or the waiver thereof by a senate, presided over by a president; nor is there a single instance, since 1845, where a senator has been inducted, except by taking the oath of office in open senate administered to him by the president of that body. The senate journals from 1849 to 1893, inclusive, show in every instance, that the hold-over senators only were called to order, as the senate, by the secretary of the preceding session. The journal of the sessions of 1846, 1847, and 1848 do not show any participation, by vote or action in the senate, of any senators-elect, although it is stated by the secretary in those years that both senators and senators-elect appeared in their seats. The journals of those years do, however, show that no senator-elect was ever president or nominated any officer, or ever made any motion, voted upon any question, or participated in any way in the proceedings of the senate until after his credentials had been presented by an inducted senator and been received and approved by the senate. Only after this was done were these senators-elect sworn in by the president of the senate. After all this action by the senate, and not before, do the journals of these years state as to each senator-elect, "he took his seat in the senate." The Journal of 1849, and every journal since, expressly shows that the senate called to order consisted only of the hold-over senators. No others are stated to have appeared in their seats or to have been called. This was so in years when there were contests and in years when there was no contest.

The question in this case is not what the hold-over senators should do in the performance of their constitutional duty, but whether they had the power and authority to act as a senate under the constitution. If they had this power this court cannot review their action for any reason whatever. "The question of power alone can be considered by this court." (State v. Kuhl, 51 N. J. L. 206). This court has no right to instruct the senate as to matters which involve its duty only, and not its power. (Id. p. 208).

This history of the senate of New Jersey, showing a claim of continuous existence on the part of hold-over senators for nearly fifty years, without protest, seems to me to be a complete answer to the insistent, that the contention that the senate is an ever-living body is a novel one.

The unbroken usage and construction of our constitution for nearly fifty years by the sen-at itself should, under the authority of State v. Kuhl, settle the question of the continuity of the senate and the right of the hold-over senators to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of senators-elect, unless the constitution of the state contains some clear and express provision which is incompatible with this result. That case cites with approval the following language of Mr. Cooley which is especially applicable to the question now before us: "When there has been a practical construction which has been acquiesced in for a considerable period, considerations in favor of adhering to this construction present themselves to the courts with a plausibility and force, which it is not easy to resist."

It is insisted, however, that our state constitution did not create a continuous senate, because it does not, in terms, provide for an always-existing presiding officer, as does the Constitution of the United States when it makes the vice-president the president of the senate, or as did our first state constitution, which made the governor, the "constant president" of the legislative council. It is argued that the permanency of the presiding officer creates the permanency of the body itself, as under such a provision there is no necessity for periodical re-organization. It is also argued that the provision of our constitution that the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state elected by the legal voters from each county, is obviously to provide that each county shall be represented at all times by a senator, and have a voice in the senate, through him, on every measure or question that comes before it. It is further insisted that the continuity of the state senate is negatived by the constitutional provision requiring the two houses composing the legislature to meet separately the second Tuesday in January, after each election.

I cannot find in these provisions, or in any other clause in the constitution, anything which will annually disorganize the senate as the house of assembly is disorganized every year by the expiration of the terms of all its members. How is the existence of a permanent officer necessary for a continuous senate? The senate has express power under the constitution to choose its own officers, and whether it exists as a senate expiring every year, or as a continuous senate, that power can be exercised at any session. The death or resignation of the president of the senate would have no influence upon the continuity of that body. Whenever the senate meets and has no presiding officer, it can elect one and proceed with its business. Under the Constitution of 1776 all the members of the legislative council were elected annually for one year. So careful were the framers of that instrument to provide for the yearly disorganization of that body, that they required the members of the council to take a constitutional oath that they would never by any act, word, or proceeding, do anything which would change their term of office beyond the annual elections. The same constitution provided that the governor of the state should be chosen annually by the joint meeting of the legislative council and the house of assembly, and each governor when thus chosen, became "the constant" presiding officer of the council. The council was not, however, a continuous body because a "constant" presiding officer was provided for it, and the senate does not fail to be a continuous body, because it has no constant president, while it has the power at all times to elect its own president. Its continuing existence gives it the continuing power to always have a president, by its own action as a senate.

The claim that the senate of the United States is a continuous body does not rest upon the fact that the Federal Constitution provides an always-existing presiding officer. The provisions of that instrument upon this point are these:

"The vice-president of the United States shall be president of the senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

"The senate shall choose their other officers, and also a president pro tempore, in the absence of the vice-president, or when he shall exercise the office of president of the United States."

It would be difficult in these provisions to find any support for the continuity of the United States senate. The absence of a presiding officer does not work the dissolution of a legislative body. What shall be done, in the absence of the vice-president, is provided for by the Federal Constitution; what is to be done in the absence of the president of our state senate is provided, in the absence of rules adopted by that body by ordinary parliamentary procedure. Our senate has the power to elect its presiding officer and thus provision is made, which is equally efficacious with that contained in the Constitution of the United States, to always have a president of the senate. Would any one contend that if the vice-president of the United States and the president pro tempore were both absent or dead, or unable to act, that the United States senate would cease to be a continuous body. It could and would under such circumstances exercise the inherent power of every legislative body under universal parliamentary law, and choose a presiding officer, and proceed with its business, just the same as if nothing had happened to affect its existence or its powers.

An examination of the provisions of our constitution, as to what constitutes the senate, and a consideration of similar provisions in the Federal Constitution, will also fail to disclose any substantial difference, affecting the question of the continuity of the two bodies.

The Constitution of the United States provides that the senate shall be composed of two senators from each state, yet no one has ever contended that the fact that certain states were not represented in the senate, deprived that body of its continued existence or affected the power of the other senators to act, so long as a quorum remained to do business. This court has also said in State v. Egg Harbor City, 55 N. J. L. 247, that "it has never been supposed that the death of a member of a state legislature suspended its power to enact laws until the vacancy was filled." This is true because the quorum remains to do business. I have failed to find any text-writer, authority, or precedent to uphold the proposition, that the expiration of the terms of office of less than a quorum of a legislative body suspends its existence, or any of the powers given to it by the constitution. If the United States senate continues to exercise its powers as such, when certain states are unrepresented therein, it is difficult to perceive how the fact that all the counties of our state are not actually represented in the state senate at the commencement of the legislative session, can deprive that body of its continued existence, and right to act as the senate, so long as a quorum is present. If all of the counties in the state having senators whose terms expired failed to elect senators, or elected those whom the constitution declared should not be members of the senate, would any one doubt that the hold-over senators would still be a senate, if the quorum provided for in the constitution remained. If they would be the senate in such a case, it is difficult to conceive of any case in which they would not constitute a constitutional senate.

The case of State v. Egg Harbor City, 55 N. J. L. 245, would seem to recognize the principle that a legislative body is not rendered incompetent to act by reason of a vacancy in its membership, by death, resignation or otherwise, if a quorum remains. That was a case in Egg Harbor city. There were at the time of the passage of an ordinance, two vacancies in the common council, caused by resignation, which the mayor had power to fill. He had not exercised this power, and only six of the ten members of the council convened and voted for the ordinance. The charter required the concurrence of a majority to pass ordinances. The court says: "In this instance six members convened and voted for the ordinance. A quorum was, therefore, present, and a majority of the whole number of members voted in the affirmative. A legislative body thus constituted is not rendered incompetent to act by the death or resignation of one or more of its members, so long as there continues to be the quorum required by the statute. It has never been supposed that the death of a member of a state legislature suspended its power to enact laws, until the vacancy was filled."

Accepting its decision as a correct statement of the law, and applying the principle upon which it is based, to the present case, I am unable to perceive what force there is in the insistent, that the senate must at all times be composed of one member from each of the twenty-one counties of the state. If neither death nor resignation disorganizes the senate, so long as a "quorum" remains to do business, it is because its continued existence does not depend upon every county having at all times a member in the senate. If this "quorum" is a senate for any purpose under the constitution, it is a senate for all purposes mentioned therein, and its existence is not interrupted or affected, because there are senators-elect claiming seats in that body.

The presence of these persons, and their presentation of credentials, has no effect whatever except to call upon this tribunal, the senate, to exercise its constitutional power as to these claimants, by judging of their elections, returns, and qualifications. Our constitution and that of the United States are practically alike so far as their provisions affect this question. The Constitution of the United States says: "The senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state." Our constitution provides that "the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state." The fact that at times the United States senate has not been thus composed, either by reason of civil war, failure of the state legislature to act, or any other reason whatever, has never affected its continuity, either in the estimation of the senate itself, or of any text-writer or judicial authority. Unless we are to adopt a different rule in this state, and to do so without precedent or authority, our senate, so long as it has a "quorum," will like the senate of the United States continue to be an ever-existing body unaffected by the fact that certain counties are temporarily, for any reason, unrepresented.

It is also contended that the New Jersey senate is not continuous because our constitution provides that the "houses shall meet separately on the second Tuesday in January next after the said day of election." It is argued that this provision negatives the idea of a continuous senate. So far from this being a supportable inference, this section may, without violence to its obvious intent, be held to be wholly irrelevant to the question before us. The direction to meet on a certain day or days could be as well given to a continuous body as to a novel one. Section 4, art. 1, of the Federal Constitution provides that "the congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

The congress consists of the senate and house of representatives. In that constitution each of these bodies is designated as a "house." The direction that congress shall assemble annually has never been construed to affect the continuity of the senate of the United States, nor have I found any writer who alludes to this direction for annual meetings as in any way affecting this question of continuity. The federal senate, and the state senate may be called upon to meet, at any time, by invitation of the executive. For legislative purposes the houses constituting the congress, and the houses constituting our legislature are directed to meet at certain times, but it is difficult to perceive why a continuous senate could not, as well as a novel body, be the subject of this constitutional mandate to meet on a certain day. Nor is it perceived why the words requiring "each house" to meet annually should be construed to disorganize the state senate, when a like requirement in the Federal Constitution does not affect the continuity of the federal senate. The vitality of the body depends upon the existence of a "quorum."

capable of doing business. That quorum constitutes a senate. Its action is the expression of the will of the senate, and no authority can be found which states any other conclusion. All difficulty and confusion in constitutional construction is avoided by applying the rule laid down by Judge Niblack—that the continuity of the body depends upon the fact that in the senate a majority constitutes a quorum, and as there is always more than a quorum of qualified senators holding seats in that body, its organic existence is necessarily continuous.

Every other element, power, or condition of the senate can be absent, except that stated by Judge Niblack, and yet it will still be a continuous body. The senate of the United States remains a continuous body because two thirds of its members are always, in contemplation of the constitution, in existence. That body is an ever-existing senate, although the vice-president may be acting as president, and the president pro tempore be absent or dead. An examination will, I am confident, fail to find any provision in the Federal Constitution which can be successfully invoked, upon principle, to sustain the proposition that the senate is an ever-living, continuous body, except that one which provides for the division of the senate into three classes, two of which always hold over, and the further provision, that makes a majority of the whole number of possible senators, a "quorum" to do business, and act as the senate for all purposes. These provisions were, by the Convention of 1844, incorporated into our state constitution, and, under the case of State v. Kuhl, should have the same force and effect as were theretofore given to them, in the construction of the Federal Constitution.

In the argument of counsel for Mr. Rogers, great stress has been placed upon section 85 of the Election Act, which makes the certificate of election prima facie evidence in the organization of the two houses.

The origin of this section is found in section 94 of an Act "To Regulate Elections," passed March 12, 1839 (Laws 1839, p. 229), which provides "that the legislative council and general assembly shall convene and hold their sessions in the state house at Trenton, and shall commence their session on the fourth Tuesday of October next after they shall have been elected: and in the organization of each house the certified copies of the statements of determination made under the direction of the 78th section of this Act, shall be deemed and taken to be prima facie evidence of the right of the persons therein mentioned to seats in the house respectively," to which they shall have been elected.

In 1839 both houses, the legislative council and the general assembly, were yearly bodies, expiring annually as to their entire membership.

The Constitution of 1776, then operative, vested the government "in a governor, legislative council and general assembly." Under it the counties severally, chose annually, at the same election, one person to be a member of the legislative council and three members of assembly, with the right of a majority of the representatives in council and general assembly convened, to add to or diminish the number or proportion of the members of the assembly for any county. Under this instrument, the assembly and council "when met," were severally made the judges of the qualifications and election of their own members. The constitution was silent with reference to "returns." It appears that the Act of 1839 was passed in view of this omission in the constitution, and the legislature had undoubtedly a right, in the absence of constitutional provision in reference thereto, to declare that certified copies of the statements of determination of election made by the board of county canvassers should be prima facie evidence of the result of the election.

When the convention framed the Constitution of 1844 it provided therein, not only that the senate should be the judge of the election and qualifications of its members, as provided in the Constitution of 1776, but it went further, and gave the senate like power as to the "returns." The power as to all these matters affecting senators-elect was thereafter vested in the senate itself. The Act of the Legislature of 1846, passed after the adoption of the constitution, and after the second meeting of the senate elected under that instrument, cannot, therefore, affect or in any way abridge these powers of the senate, given to it by the Constitution of 1844. This view is recognized as "invincible" in the opinion of the court, read by the chief justice, if the proposition is established, that "the senate is ever-living." If, therefore, it has been demonstrated that the state senate, like the federal senate, is a continuous body, the Act of 1846 is void in so far as it purports to establish a rule controlling its action in a matter committed to the exclusive jurisdiction of the senate by the constitution.

The supreme court has clearly stated the limitation of the power of the legislature in this matter, in reference to the house of assembly, and the same rule applies to the senate under the same constitutional provision. The court says: "The legislature have the power to determine the source from which the certificate of election shall issue, but the house of assembly, being by the constitution the judge of the election of its own members, can go behind the certificate whether issued by a board of canvassers, or by order of a justice of the supreme court, and finally decide who is entitled to the seat." State v. Frankbach, 47 N. J. L. 85, 88.

If it was ever the intention of the legislature to attempt to give any force or validity to the certificates of the county boards of canvassers, except to make them evidence, in the first instance, of the right of the holders thereof to claim as members-elect, an examination of the record and history of the senate will show that the act has remained a dead letter since its passage. The record shows that the senate has never given to the certificates of election any force or vitality not entirely subject to the will of the senate. In the unbroken history of the senate, since the act was passed in 1846, no member has ever been admitted upon his credentials, as a matter of right. The senate, in every instance, according to its record, has passed upon these credentials; sometimes it has waived their presentation; at other times it has admitted the senator-elect, and referred the credentials to the committee on elections for trial thereafter, but always, the record shows, without a single exception, the senate has asserted its right to decide upon the admission of the members-elect. No senator-elect has ever been inducted, except with the consent of the senate as an existing body. In every instance these credentials have been presented by a hold-over senator, or, if presented after the first meeting in January, then by a member of the senate, theretofore inducted into office by the action of the senate.

With this unbroken line of precedents, it may be stated with confidence that a certificate of election entitles the holder to no right whatever, as against the constitutional power of the ever-existing senate to take such action thereon as it may decide to be proper.

The considerations stated having led me irresistibly to the conclusion that the senate, at the commencement of the legislative session of 1894, was a continuous body, composed of the two classes of hold-over members, it necessarily follows, that, on the 9th of January, 1894, the thirteen hold-over senators, who composed the two classes of senators whose terms had not expired at that time, were the senate of New Jersey, and as such had the exclusive right to decide upon the qualifications, elections, and returns of the eight senators-elect. If this be established, then the body composed of seven senators-elect, and four hold-over senators, was not at that time the true senate of New Jersey, authorized to determine the elections, returns, and qualifications of these senators-elect, and had no power to elect a president of the senate.

The question still remains, Was the body which elected Mr. Adrain, its presiding officer, the senate of New Jersey?

The constitution provides in reference to the senate and assembly, that "a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business." (Art. 4, § 4, par. 2). This paragraph should be construed in connection with article 4, section 2, which provides that "the senate shall be composed of one senator from each county in the state." These taken together would require in this state eleven senators to constitute a "quorum" to do business. There was, at that time, no rule of the senate in existence, enabling the nine senators present to compel the attendance of absent members. The rules adopted in 1893 had been expressly limited in their application to that session of the senate, and the power to make rules necessarily carried with it the power to fix the time during which they would be operative, subject always to the power of the senate to create or change rules at any time, in its discretion.

Mr. Adrain was not on the ninth of January, 1894, president of the senate by reason of his election as such at the session of 1893, because the senate in 1893, in the exercise of its powers to choose its presiding officer, had limited his term of office to that session. It is further contended on his behalf that the four hold-over senators ratified the proceedings of the nine by acquiescence, and that if that contention cannot be sustained he is nevertheless the president of the senate, because nine senators were two more than a majority of the thirteen senators then holding office, and that, consequently, their action was the action of the senate.

To support this contention the court has been referred by counsel to the standing rule of the United States senate, which provides that "a quorum shall consist of a majority of the senators duly chosen and sworn." (Barclay's Dig. 1868, p. 283).

That this is the present rule of the United States senate is unquestioned, and its application to legislation in that body is such that the most important measures may be enacted without the assent of a number equal to a majority of all the senators, to which all the states are entitled under the constitution. Within a few weeks a most important measure affecting the coinage of silver was passed in the United States senate by forty-four affirmative votes, there being then two or three vacancies existing in the representation of the forty-four states.

The Constitution of the United States provides that "a majority of each (house) shall constitute a quorum to do business," and this provision was copied into our state constitution of 1844. If the above rule, now in force in the federal senate, had been in force at the time of the adoption of our constitution, in 1844, the contention based thereon would be controlling. The present rule, however, was not in force in 1844, and consequently its definition of a "quorum" was unknown to the able statesmen who composed the constitutional convention of that year. On the contrary, the opposite rule then prevailed. Prior to 1864 it was held by the senate of the United States that a "quorum" could be formed only by the presence of a majority of all the senators possible from all the states. June 30, 1863, Senator Sherman introduced the following resolution: "That a majority of the senators duly elected and entitled to seats in this body is a constitutional quorum," which met with such opposition that it was not until the first day of May, 1864, that it was finally adopted in the following form: "Resolved, That a quorum of the senate consists of a majority of the senators duly chosen." The rule adopted was modified in 1868 by adding the words "and sworn." This rule changing the basis of the "quorum" had its origin in the fear that the senate of the United States, by reason of secession and other events, was in danger of being frequently without a quorum, if the rule requiring a majority of all the senators possible under the constitution was adhered to. The necessity for the adoption of Mr. Sherman's resolution has passed away, but the rule has been continued in its present shape since 1868. The interesting debate upon this resolution during the two years that it was pending shows conclusively that at the time of the adoption of our constitution, in 1844, the unchallenged practice of the United States senate required the presence of a majority of all possible senators to constitute a quorum. (Cong. Globe, 1861-2, 1863-4, Index title Quorum). This being the view held in the United States senate when our convention met in 1844, it is safe to assume that when its members adopted the language of the United States Constitution as to a "quorum," they meant to use it in the sense then accepted by the senate of the United States. I therefore assume that on the 9th of last January the presence and participation of at least eleven senators were necessary to constitute a quorum of the senate of New Jersey. At the usual hour for commencing the annual session of the legislature there were but nine senators in the chamber, and it was not within the power of these nine to choose a president of the senate or do any other business as a senate. They had, however, the right common to everybody, to choose one of their number to preside over their deliberations. The constitution confers upon a number less than a quorum the right to adjourn from day to day, and that this might be done in an orderly manner it was proper that one of such minority should be called upon to preside. The person thus chosen to provide form for the doings of this minority would not, however, be the president of the senate, because the senate was not present at his election. It is further contended that after Mr. Adrain had, upon motion adopted by nine senators, taken the chair, the four other hold-over senators appeared, and thus supplied the number necessary to constitute a quorum. If the four had, as a matter of fact, joined the nine in acting upon the resolution which is depended upon to secure Mr. Adrain's title, there would be good ground for the contention in this case that he was elected by their votes. The meeting of the thirteen hold-over members would then have constituted the senate of New Jersey, and they could have proceeded to the enactment of laws and have done all other acts that a senate of twenty-one members may do. The four, however, insist that they did not join the nine; that they did not act with them, and that they were present only for the purpose of demanding the induction of certain senators-elect upon the presentation of their credentials. They further insist that their demands meeting with refusal, they withdrew from the company of the nine. The evidence in this case clearly supports this claim, and the mere presence of the four in the senate chamber in the attitude of protestants, and distinctly refusing to act with the nine, except upon certain conditions, which were denied, cannot be held to have supplied the "quorum" necessary to do business. Mr. Adrain was, therefore, only presiding officer of a body consisting of nine senators, and was not elected president of the senate by a "quorum" of that body.

In view of these conclusions I am of the opinion that judgment of ouster should be entered against both respondents.

LEEVE DISTRICT, NO. 9, Appt.,
v.

L. P. FARMER et al., Respts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. An order to vacate a highway is not subject to collateral attack on the ground that the petition asked for two disconnected objects, being the vacation of one road and the opening of another,—especially where it does not appear that the new road is in fact an alteration of the old one.
2. The discontinuance of a road is not a taking or damaging of the property of an abutting owner within the constitutional provision as to compensation for property taken or damaged for public use.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. M. C. Barney and W. T. Phipps for appellant.

Messrs. A. C. McLaughlin, Dist. Atty., W. H. Carlin and M. E. Sanborn, for respondents:

The orders of the board of supervisors cannot be collaterally attacked.

Waugh v. Chauncey, 13 Cal. 11; Fall v. Paine, 23 Cal. 302; Birler v. Sacramento County Supra, 59 Cal. 698; Los Angeles County v. San José Land & Water Co. 96 Cal. 93; Humboldt County v. Dinsmore, 75 Cal. 604.

The first proceeding before the board was simply the alteration of a road, which is provided for by our statute.

Pol. Code 2681, 2682, 2683, 2684 et seq.; Shue v. Richmond Twp. Highway Comr. 41 Mich. 688.

An alteration by competent authority of an existing road or way is a discontinuance of those portions of the way which do not come within the newly assigned limits, and no special order of discontinuance is necessary.

For an exception recognized in all the states as to vacation of a remote portion of a street for which no damages can be recovered, see the case next following as well as cases collected in the note above referred to.

Brook v. Horton, 68 Cal. 558; Hobart v. Plymouth County, 100 Mass. 189.

This is a suit for an injunction, and in cases of supposed obstructions to highways this extraordinary writ is not favored.

Irwin v. Dixon, 50 U. S. 9 How. 10, 18 L. ed. 25; Leach v. Day, 27 Cal. 648.

The board may exercise this power by "an ordinary order;" and it is doubtful if even a petition is required; certainly nothing more than a petition is necessary.

Keena v. Placer County Suprs. 89 Cal. 11.

The ultimate decision of the question, whether a given road will subserve the public need or convenience must rest somewhere, and it is wisely left for the legislature to determine in such manner as they may provide.

Sherman v. Buick, 82 Cal. 241, 91 Am. Dec. 577.

A public road belongs to nobody but the state and when the government sees proper to vacate it, the consequential loss, if there be any, must be borne by those who suffer it, just as they would bear what might result from a refusal to make it in the first place.

An act should not be declared unconstitutional and void, unless there is a clear repugnance between the act and the constitution; and where there is a reasonable doubt whether the act is repugnant to the constitution, its constitutionality should be affirmed.

The state has no proprietary interest in the streets of a city, dedicated to public use.

San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Works, 48 Cal. 493.

Then by what specious sophistry does appellant convince itself that it has acquired rights distinct from the public at large and which it can retain after the public use has ceased?

Wezl v. Sonoma Valley R. Co. 69 Cal. 202.

There can be no private property in a street except the fee of the owner, which is held subject to the easement so long as the public continue to use the street as a highway.

Pacific R. Co. v. Wade, 18 L. R. A. 754, 91 Cal. 449-453.

Haynes, C., filed the following opinion: Appellant brought this action against the individuals composing the board of supervisors of Sutter county, two persons who were overseers of road districts, and others who were owners of lands through which a certain road ran, to enjoin them from closing up or vacating said road. Appellant is a corporation organized to maintain a levee along a portion of Feather river to prevent overflows, and the part of said road in question is contiguous, for the greater part of its distance, at least, to the levee; and the complaint alleges that it is the only inlet or outlet to the levee for the purpose of protecting or repairing the same, and charges that the defendants are preparing and threatening to, and will, unless restrained by the court, fence, plow up, and destroy the same, without any legal right or authority so to do, to plaintiff's great and irreparable damage. The prayer is for a temporary restraining order and a perpetual injunction. The answer of defendants, in addition to denials, alleged that on January 6, 1892, the board of supervisors ordered the road abandoned and discontinued, such order to take effect May 1, 1892. Upon the trial, defendants had findings and judgment in their favor, from which judgment the plaintiff appeals. The facts appear in a bill of exceptions. At the commencement of the trial, counsel for defendants suggested that, if the orders of the board of supervisors alleged in the answers were valid, that would dispose of the case, and proposed that the first proofs be directed to that issue, to which counsel for plaintiff assented. The proceedings of the board were thereupon put in evidence by defendants, and plaintiff put in no evidence whatever. The principal question, therefore, is as to the validity of the order vacating the road.

Appellant attacks the validity of the order mainly upon two grounds: (1) That the petition upon which the proceedings were based was for laying out and establishing a new road, and vacating an old one, and (2) that it did not appear from the proceedings that there was any connection or relation between the two, as that the construction of the new road rendered the old unnecessary. It requires neither discussion nor authority to sustain the proposition that two wholly disconnected objects cannot properly be joined in the same proceeding and order; and while these proceedings do not expressly, or in direct language, show that the new road is but an alteration of the old, making a portion of the old road unnecessary, the surveys and descriptions of the new road and the old, which were put in evidence, sufficiently show that fact. The portion of the old road vacated is about two miles in length, and the points where the new diverges from it at one end, and unites with it at the other, are given, while the courses of the surveys show that the divergence is at no place considerable,—perhaps not exceeding forty rods. The petition was signed by the required number of qualified persons; the descriptions of the road sought to be established and the one to be vacated were definite, and did not show that they were disconnected matters which ought not, or could not, be joined in the same proceeding; and as to all facts tending to show whether the power of the board ought, or ought not, to be exercised, either by granting or denying the petition in whole or in part, the board exercises judicial functions (Damrell v. San Joaquin County

Supra. 40 Cal. 158; Re Grove Street, 61 Cal. 458; Waugh v. Chauncey, 18 Cal. 11; and its judgments are final, and cannot be attacked collaterally, but may be reviewed upon certiorari where the jurisdiction of the board has been exceeded. Fall v. Paine, 28 Cal. 808; Murray v. Mariposa County Supra. 23 Cal. 495; Damrell v. San Joaquin County Supra. 40 Cal. 154; Bizler v. Sacramento County Supra. 59 Cal. 701.

This disposes of all the objections to the introduction of the records, except the one now to be noticed, and upon which appellant principally relies, viz.: That the provisions of the political code which purport to confer the power upon the board of supervisors to vacate public roads are unconstitutional, because they do not authorize the board to assess the damages caused thereby to abutting owners, nor in any manner provide for compensation to them, and that the rights of such abutting owners are property which under the constitution cannot be taken away or damaged without compensation. We are not cited to any case in this state where the question thus made has been called to the attention of the court or decided. Appellant cites Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 114; but this citation has no material bearing upon the question. The author is there discussing the rights of abutting owners arising from the dedication of streets by the owner of the soil, and improvements made on the faith of such dedication, as is clearly shown by the cases cited in the footnote. One of these cases (Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 123, 48 Am. Rep. 146) was where the city owned certain lands, and surveyed and platted them into lots and streets, and sold them, the deeds therefor containing a covenant on the part of the grantor to make the streets, which "shall forever thereafter continue and be for the free and common passage, and as public streets and ways, for the inhabitants and all others," etc.; and it was held that the covenantees could not be deprived of the street without compensation. Another case cited is Le Clercq v. Gallipolis Trustees, 7 Ohio, pt. 218, 28 Am. Dec. 641. There the corporation owned the lands, and platted them, and designated a certain portion as a public square, and placed a value on the lots at which they were sold, the value of those on the public square being higher "because it was forever inalienable and to be kept open;" and it was held "that where land is dedicated to the use of the inhabitants of a town, one or more, especially one whose property is affected in value, may enforce the execution of the trust." In the first of these cases the right of the abutter rested upon a covenant in his deed from the city, and in the second upon a trust created for his benefit, which the trustee could not disregard. Here, however, there was no dedication, nor any covenant on the part of the public, nor any trust in the public of the land upon which the road was laid for the use of the appellant or of the public. Whatever trust existed in the state was of an easement, not for the use or benefit of appellant, but for the use of the public, to continue for such time only as the use thereof by the public should be necessary. But it does not appear probable that the levee was built because the road was there, or on the faith that it would never be vacated, but because the river was there and likely to overflow; and therefore appellant is not within the authority he cites. Appellant, however, cites us to the statement of the same author at page 662, where the broad proposition is asserted that "the right which an abutter enjoys as one of the public, and in common with other citizens, is not property in such sense as to entitle him to compensation on the discontinuance of the road or street, but, with respect to the right which he has in the highway as a means of enjoying the free and convenient use of his abutting property, it is radically different, for this right is a special one. If this special right is of value,—and it is of value if it increases the worth of his abutting premises,—then it is property, no matter whether it be of great or small value. . . . For this reason we think the discontinuance or vacation of a street in such manner as to prevent access to the property of an adjoining owner is a 'taking' of property within the constitutional inhibition, and cannot be lawful without compensation to such owner." The cases cited by the author do not sustain the proposition. Cincinnati v. White, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452, was where lands were dedicated and set apart "forever" as a common. Concord's Petition, 50 N. H. 530, was under a statute which provided: "On petitions for discontinuance of highways referred to the county commissioners, if they report for the discontinuance, they shall assess the damages occasioned to any person thereby." Indianapolis v. Croas, 7 Ind. 9, related to an alley in the city, and it was held that real estate dedicated for a street or alley could not be reclaimed by the donor without the consent of the owners of the property adjoining such street or alley. The court, in its opinion, called attention to the distinction between the modes of establishing streets in a town and of common roads,—that the former is a dedication by the owner, and the latter by appropriating private property to a public use by the state by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 88, was also a case involving the dedication of land for a public street, and in no way bears upon the question now under consideration. The case cited from 50 Ind. 537 (Butterworth v. Bartlett) arose under a statute which provided that, upon the vacation of a highway, one through whose land the highway passed, who should be injured by the vacation of it, should be entitled to damages for such injury. Two other cases cited by the author related to the right of an owner, whose lot abutted on a street, to damages resulting from the use of the street by railroads, such use being an additional servitude. The only case cited by the author in which the question at bar was discussed is Pearsall v. Eaton County Supra., 74 Mich. 558, 4 L. R. A. 193; and the opinion in that case concludes as follows: "The statute of 1887, at page 185, recognizes the right of Mrs. Pearsall to her damages in this case, and has undertaken to provide a mode for obtaining them, but it is not the one authorized by the constitution." The reporter adds, in a footnote, that the act provided for a jury of six freeholders instead of twelve.

Schanfelle v. Doyle, 86 Cal. 107, and Brown v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 85, 18 L. R. A. 161, cited by appellant, were each cases of injury to abutting property resulting from a change of grade of an existing street in a city, whereby a change in the surface of the lot was made necessary to its convenient use and enjoyment, as by grading or filling, or changing approaches. In these cases, as in multitudes of others of like character, much is said about the rights and property of the abutting owner in the street; but what is said must be read in the light of the facts of each particular case. No one questions that an abutter upon a country highway has an interest in the easement created for public use; but it does not follow that such abutter is entitled to damages upon the vacation of such highway, nor that the vacation of it is a taking or damaging of private property for public use. The interest of each abutting owner is the same. Though it may be of greater use or benefit to one than to others, it is a common right, created in the same way, for the same purpose, of the same duration, and subject to be discontinued when the interests of the public, for whose benefit it was created, requires it,—that is, when it ceases to be necessary for public use. The easement is created for the public, not for an individual, though an individual may have a private way even by condemnation. Nor does the fact that a way may be necessary for a single abutter affect the conclusion that it is no longer necessary as a public road. If it were otherwise, no public road could be vacated so long as it could be shown that it was necessary for a single abutter, and thus the public could be required to maintain what is in fact a private way. That an abutter may be injured by the discontinuance or vacation of the road is conceded; but "there is no contract with surrounding property owners that a public improvement shall always exist as at present, and no damages will be allowed for its discontinuance, notwithstanding improvements have been made on the supposition that they will remain, and notwithstanding property has been thereby enhanced in value." Mills, Em. Dom. § 317. In Iowa the supreme court says: "We have held that the vacation of a highway does not take from an individual residing thereon his property, either for public or private use, and that he cannot recover damages therefor, although he may suffer inconvenience and loss therefrom." Barr v. Okaloosa, 45 Iowa, 275. The supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "But by the vacation of Washington street no private property was taken or applied to public use;" and the court further held that the power of the legislature was not restrained in that regard by the provision in the constitution requiring municipal corporations to make compensation for private property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements, and which also provided that private property should not be taken or applied to public use without just compensation. McGee's Appeal, 114 Pa. 471. The supreme court of Illinois said: "It is not true, in fact or in law, that defendant has either taken or damaged plaintiff's property for public use. It has taken no property for public or any other use. That of which complaint is made is the vacating of certain streets. In no sense can that act be construed as either taking or damaging private property for public use, as those terms are used in the constitution." East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 119 Ill. 200, 59 Am. Rep. 795.

Whatever of apparent hardship there may be in particular cases where roads have been created by use when the country was new, as in this state, and for the temporary convenience of a sparsely settled country, a greater hardship would be entailed upon the public if those roads could not now be vacated or changed to meet the present changed situation without compensating those whose premises may abut thereon for the loss or inconvenience they may sustain, as, if that were the rule, none would consent to the change, and the added burden would be an embargo upon the creation of new and more desirable roads. The creation of highways by use, or under the statute, creates an easement for the benefit of the public for such time only as the public necessities and convenience may require, and creates no covenant or obligation in favor of an abutter that it shall always exist; but, on the contrary, the statutes, while providing for the establishment and maintenance of highways, also provide for vacating the same, and abutters must be held to have acquired and improved their property in view of that fact; and hence no one can acquire a legal interest in it other than that which is common to all, and this common interest the authority relied upon by appellant concedes does not entitle an abutter to damages upon the vacation of the road. The public use ceases upon such vacation, and an injury to the appellant consequent upon such ending of the use cannot be held to be a taking or damaging for a public use. The first order of the board of supervisors was valid, and the second order, passed to meet an objection made by appellant, was unnecessary, and did not affect the validity of the first. The plaintiff having introduced no evidence, the findings were proper. If the fact or extent or amount of the injury sustained by appellant had been found by the court, it would not avail to sustain a bill for an injunction, since it was damnum absque injuria.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Christian H. BUHL, Pff. in Err.,
v.

FORT STREET UNION DEPOT CO.

(.....Mich.....)

The inconvenience caused to an abutting owner on a street by discontinuing another portion of the street, making travel to and from his premises less direct, is damnum absque injuria being the same in kind that all the public suffers, and cannot be regarded as damages within the provision of a statute providing for the payment of all damages consequent on the closing of streets.

(February 6, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover compensation for alleged injuries to plaintiff's property by reason of the closing of a street by defendant. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. C. A. Kent, for plaintiff in error:

It may be admitted, that under our general constitutional provisions the legislature may authorize municipalities, or even corporations, only quasi public, like railroad companies, to condemn private property, without giving compensation for land injured but not taken.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 666 et seq.; Pontiac v. Carter, 82 Mich. 164; Hatch v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 25 Vt. 49.

And it may also be admitted that, as a general rule, where the legislature authorizes the taking of property on payment of compensation, and makes no provision for the payment of damages to property not taken, the owners of the latter cannot recover for such damages.

Schneider v. Detroit, 2 L. R. A. 54, 72 Mich. 246.

The Statute of 1891 provides for the recovery of damages such as plaintiff has suffered.

Under the charter of 1886, the power of the council to abolish or vacate streets is retained. Charter of 1886, p. 69.

But the method in which streets can be vacated seems to have been carelessly or intentionally dropped from the charter. Perhaps this leaves the method of such vacation to be regulated by the general law.

James v. Darlington, 71 Wis. 178.

And such vacating of a street can only be made when it is a public improvement.

Detroit v. Ft. Wayne & E. R. Co. 90 Mich. 646; Clinton v. Cedar Rapids & M. R. R. Co. 24 Iowa, 455; Ligare v. Chicago, 139 Ill. 46.

It is not necessary under the Statute of 1891 that the closing of the street should be a public benefit, and the closing can be made before the damages are paid, and the persons damaged are left to the uncertainties of a suit against the company, contrary to the usual and just rule.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. pp. 693, 694.

The words of the statute in their common meaning cover plaintiff's case, and if they do not they cover no case, and the provision for the recovery of damages is absolutely nugatory.

If possible some rational meaning must be found in every clause and word in our statute, and no part can be rejected. It would be an insult to a co-ordinate branch of the government for this court to say that the legislature meant nothing, when they provided in the Act of 1891 for the recovery of damages.

Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 27, 265, 295; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. pp. 226, 233; Nichols v. Halliday, 27 Wis. 408; Simmons v. California Powder Works, 7 Colo. 285; Manis v. Duncan, 23 Mich. 130; Potter v. Safford, 50 Mich. 46.

If the statute were capable of any interpretation which would not cover plaintiff's case, still, according to the weight of authority and reason, it should be interpreted to cover it.

The constitutions of several states provide "that property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation."

In Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, this provision was considered, and it was held that the owner of a lot, the rent of which was reduced by an obstruction 220 feet from the lot, by which access to an important thoroughfare was made difficult, could recover therefor.

In Nebraska, where the constitution in the taking of property for public use is like that of Illinois, the Rigney case has been approved.

In Parker v. Boston & M. Railroad, 3 Cush. 107, 50 Am. Dec. 709, under a statute which provided that every railroad corporation shall be liable to pay all damages that shall be occasioned by laying out and making and maintaining their road, or by taking any lands or materials, it was held, "that a party who sustains an actual and real damage, capable of being pointed out, described, and appreciated, may recover."

Messrs. James F. Joy and F. A. Baker for appellee.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The common council of the city of Detroit vacated that portion of Fourth street in said city extending from Congress street to Fort street. The defendant thereupon occupied the vacated portion of the street for depot purposes, which of course resulted in closing the street to public travel. The action was had under authority of Act No. 94 of the Laws of 1891, amendatory to the "Union Depot Act," so called. The amendatory section of 1891 provides that "any corporation organized under this act shall have power, with the consent of the common council of any city, or the village board of any village, in which the station and depot grounds of such company are located, to occupy and close any highway, street, or alley within the limits of its station and depot grounds, but such company shall pay to the parties entitled to the same, any and all damages that may accrue to them in consequence of the closing of any such highway, street, or alley; and such damages may be recovered in an action on the case in any court of competent jurisdiction." The plaintiff is the owner of a brick block fronting Fourth street and extending from Larned street to Congress. He brings this suit to recover damages resulting to his property from the closing up of Fourth street between Congress and Fort. The portion of the street beyond Congress is made less accessible from plaintiff's property, it being made necessary to make a detour of Third street instead of passing directly through what was formerly a part of Fourth. It cannot be doubted that there has been some resulting disadvantage occasioned by the closing of that portion of the street. The question presented is, Is the resulting inconvenience damnum absque injuria, or should the damages actually resulting to the property be held recoverable? It is contended, on the one hand, that such inconvenience as the plaintiff suffers is of like character to that which any member of the community submits to, differing only in degree. On the other hand, it is broadly claimed that under the statute in question any person who is actually damaged by the closing of the street is entitled to recover his damages, and the fact that it is difficult to draw the line showing when depreciation of property will end does not militate against the right, or present any greater obstacle than is often presented in other classes of cases, and that the question can safely be left to the good sense of the court and the jury.

1. Under the right of eminent domain where there is no other limitation of the power than such as is contained in our constitution, which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, it is conceded that it is competent for the legislature to provide for a public improvement which may work an incidental damage to property without providing compensation for property not actually taken. See Pontiac v. Carter, 83 Mich. 164; Hinchman v. Detroit, 9 Mich. 108; People v. Ingham County Supra, 20 Mich. 95. And the distinct question of whether the discontinuance of a public street, or its appropriation to other purposes than that of a highway, constitutes a taking of the property of the users generally (other than abutting owners) has been distinctly ruled in the negative by many of the American courts. See McGee's App. 114 Pa. 477; Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254; Paul v. Carver, 24 Pa. 207, 64 Am. Dec. 649; Flaring v. Irwin, 55 N. Y. 486; Hatch v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. 25 Vt. 49; Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 666.

But it is contended that the statute in question is more nearly analogous to those constitutional provisions, which exist in some of the states, that property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, and it is urged that where these provisions exist, in some of the states at least, a doctrine has been held which sustains the plaintiff's contention here. Plaintiff's counsel also relies upon decisions of the English courts as sustaining his contention. The English statute provides for compensation to the owner of lands injuriously affected, and it has been held that this entitles one to compensation whose land was permanently diminished in value by an authorized obstruction to a street, although his lot was at a distance from the obstruction. McCarthy v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 7 C. P. 508, L. R. 87 H. L. 248; Caledonian R. Co. v. Walker, 7 App. Cas. 299. Mr. Sedgwick, in the eighth edition of his work on Damages (sec. 1093), comments upon these decisions as follows: "The disposition made by the English courts of the question of redress for interference with access from private property to streets and highways is particularly deserving of attention. Under the rule already stated, if the owner had suffered no injury to his right of ownership he would have no right of action in respect of his interest in lands, if there had been no statutory powers; consequently he cannot maintain a claim to compensation under the statute. The claim, therefore, seems to be limited and defined by the right of access. If the access is taken away, or rendered less convenient, and the value of the lands depreciated, even though they do not immediately abut on the public highway or river, the plaintiff can recover; but if the obstruction is only temporary, or an inconvenience, diverting the public and causing a loss in custom or trade, the damage, as it would not have given the owner any right of action if there had not been any statutory powers, is not recoverable."

The plaintiff also cites cases in which the construction of a constitutional provision entitling the party to compensation where property is taken or damaged is claimed to be sufficiently broad to include the present case. The cases cited are: Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638; Gottschalk v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 14 Neb. 550, 561; Chicago, K. & N. R. Co. v. Hazels, 26 Neb. 384; Omaha & N. P. R. Co. v. Janeczek, 30 Neb. 276; Harvey v. Georgia, S. & F. R. Co. 90 Ga. 66; Omaha v. Kramer, 25 Neb. 489; Montgomery v. Townsend, 80 Ala. 489; Hot Springs R. Co. v. Williamson, 45 Ark. 429; Moore v. Atlanta, 70 Ga. 611; Longmont v. Parker, 14 Colo. 386. In the case of Longmont v. Parker it was held that, under a constitution providing compensation for lands taken or damaged, a landowner whose means of ingress and egress are interfered with by the construction of a ditch on the highway abutting his land is entitled to recover as damages depreciation of the property because of such ditch.—Richmond, O., dissenting. In Moore v. Atlanta it was held that, under a similar constitution, damages resulting to the abutting owner from a change in the grade of a street could be recovered. The same thing was held in Montgomery v. Townsend. In Hot Springs R. Co. v. Williamson it was held that the owner of premises abutting upon a street may recover from a railroad company damages resulting to his premises from the construction of a roadbed in its right of way along the street in such a manner as to obstruct access to the premises, though the owner has no interest in the fee. In the case of Omaha v. Kramer it was held that the construction of a viaduct on a street upon which the plaintiff's land abutted was such damage as could be recovered for, the court stating that, under the constitutional provision providing that property taken or damaged shall be paid for, the words "or damage" include all actual damage resulting from the exercise of the right of eminent domain which diminishes the market value of private property. The court repudiates the English rule and the rule adopted in Pennsylvania that, under such a provision, no damage can be recovered except such as the plaintiff could be entitled to sue for and recover at the common law if the act had not been authorized by statute. See, as to the English rule, 3 Sedgw. Damages, § 1124; the Pennsylvania rule, Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant, 119 Pa. 541. In Rigney v. Chicago the city constructed a viaduct or bridge along Halsted and across Kinsey streets at their intersection, which was twenty feet west of plaintiff's premises, fronting on Kinsey street. The viaduct in question cut off all communication with Halsted street by way of Kinsey street, except by means of a pair of stairs at the intersection of the streets. Halsted street is one of the main thoroughfares of Chicago, on which is operated a line of horse railway. The evidence showed that the value of plaintiff's lot was largely depreciated. The question is considered at great length, and the majority of the court reach the conclusion that the plaintiff, under the facts stated, is entitled to recover compensation for the injury to his property; the constitution providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. Three members of the court dissented from this opinion.—Justices Scott, Craig, and Sheldon. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Chicago v. Taylor, followed the decision of the state court, and affirmed a recovery by a plaintiff whose property was damaged by the construction of a viaduct on the street abutting the plaintiff's premises. Limitations have been placed upon the rule by the supreme court of Illinois. In Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn., 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598, the plaintiff sought to enjoin the closing of a street three and one half blocks from his premises, which act he claimed worked a peculiar injury to him. The court says: "It has been supposed in argument that our constitution, in providing that 'property shall not be damaged for public use without due compensation,' necessarily modifies the doctrine of these cases [referring to Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Iowa, and other cases cited] to some extent. As far as affects the present question, we are of opinion this supposition is not well founded." See also the case of East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, 119 Ill. 200, 59 Am. Rep. 795. The counsel for the plaintiff argues that these cases were wrongly decided, as the court attempts to determine as a matter of law in each case whether damages have resulted. This only illustrates the difficulty in drawing any precise line, if it be admitted that one other than the abutting owner is entitled to recover damages for the obstruction or discontinuance of a public street. Indeed, it is not altogether clear that the line intended to be drawn by the supreme court of Illinois is not the one indicated, namely, between an abutting owner affected by the closing of a street adjacent to his premises and one whose property is incidentally affected by the closing of a street in another block. In East St. Louis v. O'Flynn, supra, it is said: "The only question that can be considered in this court is purely a question of law. It is, Can defendant as a matter of law be held liable to the plaintiff for damages resulting from the vacation of streets and alleys between Front and Fourth streets, the vacation being in another block in the city than that in which plaintiff's property is situated?" The court then considered the force and effect both of the constitutional provision and the statute of the state as bearing upon the subject; the constitutional provision being that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation, and the statute providing that when property is damaged by the vacation or closing of any street or alley the same shall be ascertained and paid as provided by law. The court says: "Here plaintiff's lot is not adjacent to the streets or alleys vacated. It is in another block. The access to and egress from his lot are not affected by the vacating ordinance passed by the city. The street in front and the alley in the rear of his property remain open as before, affording the same access to and egress from it. The inconvenience that would be occasioned to plaintiff in going from the street in front of his house to a particupart of the city, on account of vacating and closing up certain streets and alleys in another block, is the 'same kind' of damage that would be sustained by all other persons in the city that might have occasion to go that way; and, although the inconvenience he may suffer may be greater in degree than to any other person that fact would not give him a right of action." The court held that he had no right of action. In Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn., it was held that the fact that property owners upon a street have been specially assessed as benefited by the opening of a street some blocks off and have paid assessments does not give them any special property in said street, any more than any other taxpayer, and gives them no equitable ground to enjoin the vacation of such part of the street. The same view was taken in State v. Elizabeth, 54 N. J. L. 463. It was said: "It is assumed by counsel for prosecutrix that, because the prosecutrix was assessed for a benefit resulting from the opening of this street peculiar to herself, she got a vested right in the continued existence of the street, of which she could not be stripped without compensation. But this, I think, is more plausible than substantial. While the right she got may have been of peculiar benefit to her property, yet it was a right which she shared with the public. The privilege of using the street was shared by each member of the community. It may not have been of the same value to each member of the community, but the right to use the street was in each citizen the same. It was exclusively a public right, put under the control of the representatives of the public. It was subject to alteration or abolition when, in the judgment of those to whom the public interests were confided, those interests demanded such action." It was held in that case that a person owning lands upon a part of a street not vacated is not deprived of any vested rights in property for which he is entitled to compensation by reason of such vacation.

A distinction may well be held to exist between the injury which results to an abutting owner, or another so situated that the means of ingress and egress to and from his premises are cut off by a discontinuance of a street, and one owning land upon another street or on the same street at a distance from the part of the highway discontinued. The subject has been considered by the supreme court of Massachusetts many times. In Stanwood v. Malden, 187 Mass. 17, 16 L. R. A. 591, damages were sought for a discontinuance of a part of Sumner street in Malden, which runs into Florence street obliquely just opposite the petitioner's land. It was said it is possible, if not probable, that the money value of plaintiff's property is diminished by diverting the stream of travel which formerly flowed towards it over Sumner street; and it was contended, on the authority of the English cases, and for the further reason that the laying out of the discontinued piece of street would have been a benefit for which the petitioner might have been assessed, that it would follow logically that a recovery should be had for its discontinuance. But the supreme court, following Smith v. Boston, 7 Cush. 254, denied the right. In Smith v. Boston it appeared that the plaintiff owned several lots in the city on or near Market street, and offered to prove that the value of each had been lessened and that rent of one or more of them diminished, but it appeared that no one of the lots bounded on that part of the street which had been discontinued. Chief Justice Shaw, in conveying the opinion of the court, said: "There is obviously a difficulty in laying down a general rule applicable to all cases. One limit, however, must be observed, which is that the damage for which a recompense is sought must be the direct and immediate consequence of the act complained of, and that remote and contingent damages are not recoverable. The inconvenience of the petitioner is experienced by him in common with all the rest of the members of the community. He may feel it more, in consequence of the proximity of his lots and buildings. Still it is a damage of like kind, and not in its nature peculiar or specific. . . . We do not mean to be understood as laying down a universal rule that in no case can a man have damages for the discontinuance of a highway unless his land bounds upon it, although, as applicable to city streets, intersecting each other at short distances, it is an equitable rule. A man may have a farm, store, mill, or wharf, not bounding on a street, but communicating with it by a private way, so situated that he has no access to his property but by the public way. If this is discontinued, he must lose the benefit of his estate or open a way at his own expense, which might be a direct and tangible damage consequent upon the discontinuance of the public way, and we are not prepared to say that he would not have a claim for damages under the statute." In McGee's App., 114 Pa. 477, the court considers the effect of a constitutional provision which reads as follows: "Municipal and other corporations and individuals, invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, shall make just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works," etc. The court held that this gave no right of action to the owner of a lot whose property was incidentally injured by the vacation of a public street. In the case of Coster v. Albany, 48 N. Y. 899, the city was authorized by act of the legislature to cause the removal of a bridge which was a portion of a street leading to plaintiff's lot, which act provides that the city should pay all damages to property caused by the improvement, and should enter into a contract and give a bond to the state to do so. The language of the act was substantially the same as that under consideration here. The court says: "'Damage' and 'claim' are words having a well-defined meaning in statutes and legal instruments. And for so much as they rightfully convey, for so much is the city bound 'What is a claim? It is, in just judicial sense, a demand of some matter, as of right, made by one person of another, to do or forbear some act or thing as a matter of duty.' The plaintiffs may claim no more of the city than the law will give them as a matter of right. The city need pay as much as the state should pay as matter of duty." Considering the question of whether the plaintiffs had such a right which had been encroached upon, the court says: "The plaintiffs further claim that the best approach to their property having been by the Hamilton street bridge, and that having been entirely removed by the agents of the state, a damage has resulted to their property for which the city is liable. No part of the bridge was on the property of the plaintiffs. They had no interest or right in it as property. There is left to the plaintiffs an approach to their property by the State street bridge, though less near, less easy, less commodious. The damage to the plaintiffs' property from this cause is entirely indirect and remote. It is not claimed to the contrary, and we shall assume that the state had right, by virtue of this act or from other source, to do this work, and in doing it to remove this bridge. The bridge, so far as the plaintiffs were interested in it, was but a part of a public street or highway. Over streets and highway the legislature has control, and may, when no private interests are involved or invaded, close them and altogether relinquish their use by the public. And if in the exercise of this right a street be discontinued, and the value of lands abutting on other parts of the street, and on neighboring streets, is lessened, it is not such an injury to the owner as to entitle him to damages." In Glasgow v. St. Louis, 107 Mo. 204, the plaintiff sought to enjoin the vacation of Twelfth street, one block south of property owned by plaintiff, lying between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets. The situation of the property was not materially different from the property of plaintiff in the present case. The court says: "There is no doubt but a property owner has an easement in a street upon which his property abuts which is special to him and should be protected, but here the plaintiffs own no property fronting or abutting on the part of the street which was vacated. Their property is surrounded by streets not touched or affected by the vacating ordinance. They will be obliged to go a little further to reach Twelfth street, but that is an inconvenience different in degree only from that suffered by all other persons, and it furnishes no ground whatever for injunctive relief. Nor are the plaintiffs entitled to any relief by reason of the clause in the present constitution which declares 'that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation.' To entitle them to relief because their property will be damaged, though not taken, they must show a special injury. Here there is no physical interference with their property, nor is any right or easement connected therewith or annexed thereto affected. They will, therefore, suffer no injury which is special or peculiar to them. The inconvenience, if any in reality there is, is the same as that cast upon other persons. For these reasons the constitutional amendment furnishes them no ground for complaint."

We think the weight of authority in this country fully sustains the contention of defendant that such an injury as that resulting to the plaintiff here is one which he suffers in common with the general public, and damnum absque injuria. But it is contended by the plaintiff that, unless the amendatory act is so construed as to give the plaintiff a right of action in the present case, the provision that damages may be recovered is rendered wholly nugatory, as it is urged that only such streets as are within the depot grounds are permitted to be vacated, and that there is no abutting owner who could be injuriously affected by the closing of such streets. And, as applied to the present case, such is possibly the result of this construction. But the act is general, and applies to all depot companies. The street which passes through depot grounds may be a cul de sac, and in such case the closing of a street might leave the owner of the property without any means of egress whatever. In such case, undoubtedly, his right to damage would be as clear for the interruption of his means of ingress and egress as would be that of the abutting owner for a similar interference with a like right. See opinion of Shaw, Ch. J., in Smith v. Boston, supra; Pearse v. Eaton County Supra, 71 Mich. 438; Goss v. Westphalia Twp. Highway Comrs. 63 Mich. 608; People v. China Twp. Highway Comrs. 35 Mich. 15.

The circuit judge directed a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover any damage for the closing of the street in question. We think his conclusion was right, and the judgment will be affirmed, with costs.

Doctrine against liability upon the covenant.

A deed poll is that which is plain without indenting, so called because it is cut even or polled. Every deed that is pleaded shall be intended to be a deed poll, unless it be alleged to be indented. Co. Litt. § 370.

In Platton Covenants, 18, it is stated that the action of covenants, unless founded on the custom in London, or on a contract with the king and a subject, can never be supported against a person who neither by himself, nor by some other person acting on his behalf, has executed a deed under seal.

An action of covenant is of a technical nature and cannot be maintained, except against a person who, by himself or some other person acting in his behalf, has executed a deed under seal, or who, (under some very peculiar circumstances, such as those mentioned in Coke upon Littleton, 231a) has agreed by deed to do a certain thing. Burnett v. Lynch, 5 Barn. & C. 589, 8 Dowl. & R. 368.

Covenant does not lie without a deed; so held in an action brought upon a covenant contained in a deed of composition with creditors, which was signed by one partner only in a partnership firm, the court holding that the partner not joining in the deed could not be made a party to the action. Metcalfe v. Rycroft, 6 Maule & S. 75. Wilson v. Woolfryes, Id. 341, to the same effect.

In Year Book, 88 Edw. III., 8, the form of action as said to be debt.

The signing of a deed is the material part of the execution, the seal being a mere form, and a written or ink seal is good. McDill v. McDill, 1 Dall. 63.

In Lock v. Wright, 1 Strange, 571, it was held that mutual covenants could not arise out of a deed poll, because it was not the act of both parties, and that the grantee on it is liable in an action of debt.

In Moore v. Jones, 2 Ld. Raym. 1536, it is held that an action of covenant could not be maintained except upon a deed, and that an allegation that a party concessit per quoddam scriptum factum, did not imply that the writing was a deed, neither did the allegation that the party covenanted per quoddam scriptum factum.

In Chancellor v. Poole, 3 Dougl. 764, the action was in covenant for rent, the declaration stating the demise by indenture under seal from the lessor to the lessee, and a subsequent deed poll between the lessee, the lessor, and the defendant whereby the lessee with the consent of the lessor, the plaintiff in the action, bargained and sold the premises to the defendant. The court held that the assignee of the term declared as such, was not liable for the rent accruing after he had signed over, though it 23 L. R. A.

Statement by Dickman, J.:

The Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Company, the defendant in error, commenced the original action against James Hickey, the plaintiff in error, in the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county. The original petition filed by the company reads as follows:

"The plaintiff says it is a corporation duly organized under the laws of Ohio, and, as such, owns and operates a line of railroad from Cleveland, Ohio, to Toledo, Ohio; that prior to December 30, 1874, it owned in fee simple three hundred eighty-two and 20-100 acres of land, situate in the township of Olmstead, Cuyahoga county, Ohio, through and along parts of which is and was located its line of railroad and right of way; that said lands were fully described in a certain deed by it executed and delivered to the defendant, James Hickey, on or about December was stated that the lessor was a party executing the assignment and agreeing thereby that the term which was determinable at his option should be absolute.

Such an action cannot be maintained in the name of an assign of the promisee. Standen v. Christmas, 10 Q. B. 185, 18 L. J. Q. B. 295, 11 Jur. 694; Blockford v. Parson, 5 C. B. 230, 17 L. J. C. P. 193, 12 Jur. 377.

Connecticut.

Again in Hinsdale v. Humphrey, 15 Conn. 431, it was held that an action on the covenant would not lie against a lessee, under a lease by deed poll signed by the plaintiff alone, and that assumption or case was the proper remedy for the recovery of the rent, and that the acceptance of the lease by the lessee was not sufficient to bind him by way of covenant.

Massachusetts.

The principle is well settled, that where one, by deed poll, grants land and conveys any right, title, or interest in real estate to another, and where there is any money to be paid by the grantee to the grantor, or for his use and benefit, and the grantee accepts the deed and enters on the estate, the grantee becomes bound to make such payment or perform such duty, and not having sealed the instrument he is not bound by it as a deed, but it being a duty the law implies a promise to perform it, upon which promise, in case of failure, assumption will lie. Pike v. Brown, 7 Cush. 183.

The above principles were applied to a case, where by deed poll, an estate was conveyed subject to a mortgage containing the clause, "which said sum (meaning the mortgage money) is part of the consideration before named, and this deed is on the condition" that the grantee assume and pay the same, it appearing that the grantee entered upon and took possession of the estate conveyed, but neglected and refused to pay. Ibid.

Again in Goodwin v. Gilbert, 9 Mass. 510, where certain duties were reserved to be performed by the grantee, under a lease created by deed poll.

In that case, the court held that the fact of there being no memorandum signed by the party did not bring the case within the statute of frauds, the law raising the promise in such a case. Goodwin v. Gilbert, supra.

So in Nugent v. Riley, 1 Met. 117, 35 Am. Dec. 355, where the instrument purported to be an indenture, but was executed by the lessor only and recited that the lessee had paid the full rent for the term, and covenanted, promised, and agreed "to reconvey the said premises to the lessor upon the payment of the aforesaid sum, and interest there-

80, 1874, and recorded in book 288, pages 445 and 446, of Cuyahoga county records, to which reference is here had; that said defendant went into possession of said lands under said deed, and they have ever since been occupied by him or his vendees; that said deed so delivered to and accepted by said defendant contained the following condition and agreement:

"This conveyance is made subject to the condition that the said James Hickey, his heirs and assigns, shall make and maintain good and sufficient fences on each side of the right of way of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway as now located and built through said first-named lot or tract herein conveyed and on the south line of said right of way, which is the north line of the second lot herein conveyed west of the two acres reserved and conveyed to Michael McCormick, which condition and obligation shall be perpetually binding on the owners of the land."

"The plaintiff says that afterwards, and before October 10, 1884, the defendant sold off sundry parcels of said land to sundry individuals or parties, to wit, to John Beana, Michael Standen, Edward Standen, Theodore Shearing, John Gannon, Andrew Broadwell, Thomas Costello, Michael Beana, George Bash, Martin Standen, Gust Gable and Mrs. Patrick McKenna each holding under the defendant a separate parcel of said land; that prior to said October 10, 1884, the fences along the line of its road and in front of the several parcels of said land sold by said defendant to the parties above named, became and were out of repair; were not good and sufficient, and were not in condition to turn stock and animals as required by law, portions requiring entirely new fences, and other portions repairing only; that plaintiffs gave notice to each of said vendees or occupiers under said defendant Hickey, and requested them and each of them to repair and rebuild said fences and put them in the condition required by said contract and the laws of the state; that said occupiers wholly refused and failed to repair and reconstruct said fences; on" it was held there was no covenant technically on the part of the lessor to reconvey upon condition, because he had not executed the instrument, it being inserted in the same conveyance which raised the term and leased the estate; it inured by way of condition, and the lessee by accepting the deed in the form of an indenture, but in fact a deed poll, became bound by the condition.

In the above case the court held the parties related to each other as mortgagor and mortgagee, and further, that although there was no stipulation on the part of the lessee to account for surplus rents after the debt was paid, but only to reconvey upon payment, yet an action of assumpsit would lie to recover the rents after the debt was paid, a promise to repay the same being implied by law. Nugent v. Riley, supra.

Where land was conveyed by deed poll for valuable consideration, the deed containing a stipulation that the grantee, his heirs, and assigns should build and maintain a fence the whole extent of the line bounding the grantor's land, it was held to be a valid and binding contract, although the deed was not signed by the grantee. Newell v. Hill, 2 Met. 180.

In Parish v. Whitney, 8 Gray, 516, a stipulation in a deed poll, for the erection and maintenance of a fence between the premises conveyed and those adjoining, was not an incumbrance so as to enable a subsequent grantee to sue the original grantee for a breach of covenant against incumbrances, it being merely a personal agreement of the grantee made as part of the consideration and evidenced by his acceptance of the deed, and was binding upon him and his legal representatives, but did not affect the estate. To the same effect, Plymouth v. Carver, 16 Pick. 183.

A devise upon condition that the devisee perform an obligation renders the devisee liable to assumpsit if he accepts the devise, the law raising an implied promise in such a case. So held in Felch v. Taylor, 18 Pick. 183, where the obligor of a bond devised the estate with a condition that the devisee perform the condition attached to the bond.

The general doctrine was applied in Maine v. Cumston, 98 Mass. 817, in an action for the cost of half the sum expended in the erection of a partition wall, made use of by the defendant in constructing a house.

The decision in Parish v. Whitney, supra, was supported as falling within the rules, that no easement in or on conveying real property can be created.

by contract of the party except by deed, and that an agreement under seal by the party who is to perform it cannot create a covenant or run with the land.

If a grantee accepts such a deed, a promise binding himself and his representatives personally is doubtless implied. Bronson v. Coffin, 108 Mass. 175, 186, 11 Am. Rep. 536.

So an agreement to repair buildings upon land contained in a deed poll, not being under seal, is not a covenant, but is in the nature of assumpsit on the promise implied from the acceptance of the deed. Martin v. Drinan, 128 Mass. 516.

New Jersey.

In Ludlum v. Wood, 2 N. J. L. 52, it is said that an action of covenant cannot be brought except on a sealed instrument. In that case the action was brought on a covenant on a surety bond, given for the appearance of a defendant.

If the action is one of covenant the demand must show that the instrument on which the action was brought was under seal. Bilderback v. Pouner, 7 N. J. L. 77.

But see infra.

New York.

The same doctrine was held in Gale v. Nixon, 8 Cow. 445, assumpsit being held to be the proper form of action, and that covenant would only lie where the instrument was actually signed and sealed by the party, or by his authority, a mere recognition of the contract, though in writing and under seal, not being sufficient to create a covenant. In the above case the action was brought to recover purchase money.

In Van Santwood v. Sanford, 12 Johns. 197, it was held in an action of covenant, that there must be an averment that the writing or contract was sealed by the defendant, and that a statement that the defendant made the writing, etc., setting forth the same with the name and scroll with an L. S., was not sufficient.

In Rogers v. Eagle Fire Co. of New York, 9 Wend. 611, it was stated that the conveyance of the land in that state, in common, if not by universal use, were by poll deed, and that assumpsit would lie to recover the consideration money expressed in them, and that it made no difference whether such consideration was a sum in gross or an annual rent.

In the above case the court approved of the doc-that it waited a reasonable time, to wit, one month, and the occupiers refusing and failing so to do, the plaintiff caused said fences to be repaired and rebuilt, as follows, and at the following costs, paid by the plaintiff:

trine of the court as expressed in Goodwin v. Gilbert, 9 Mass. 510.

In Bowen v. Bell, 20 Johns. 338, 11 Am. Dec. 286, the action was brought in assumpsit to recover the consideration money of property of which the defendant was in position and had accepted the title, and the court held the plaintiff entitled to recover, although the defendant had not signed the instrument.

Pennsylvania.

An action on the covenant will not lie in the case of a grantee accepting a deed and entering into possession thereunder, if the deed is not signed and sealed by him. Maule v. Weaver, 7 Pa. 329.

In the above case, Chief Justice Gibson expresses himself against the doctrine of liability upon such a covenant in the following words: "How it came to be thought by the profession at an early day, and to be handed down to the present, that an action of covenant might be maintained against the grantee in a deed poll under any circumstances, or against any one else who had not sealed it, I cannot imagine." Ibid.

The question, however, is now provided for by the Pennsylvania Act of April 25, 1850, § 8 (Purdon's Dig. p. 361), which provides that in all cases now pending or hereafter to be brought in any court of record in this commonwealth, to enforce the payment of ground rent due and owing upon lands or tenements, held by virtue of any lease for life or a term of years, or in fee, the lessor, his heirs, and assigns shall have a full and complete remedy therefor, by action of covenant against the lessee or lessees, his heir, or their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, whether the said premises, out of which the rent issues, be held by deed poll or otherwise.

Vermont.

In Johnson v. Muzzy, 45 Vt. 319, the court followed the ruling of the Connecticut and Massachusetts cases, holding that an action of covenant would not lie against a lessee under a deed poll, even though he had accepted the lease and taken possession of the premises, if such deed were not signed by him, the court holding that such deed could not in legal contemplation be held to be that of the defendant.

In the above case, the court cited and relied upon House v. Foster, decided in that court in the year 1852, but not officially reported, wherein it was held 23 L. R. A.

that such a deed was not legally that of the defendant, and that covenant could not lie. Johnson v. Muzzy, supra.

Contrary doctrine.

A covenant is an agreement between two or more persons by an instrument under seal, to do or not to do some particular thing. It can only be created by deed, but may be by a deed poll (the party named in the deed), as well as by indenture; but where lands are conveyed by indenture to a person who does not seal the deed, yet if he enters upon the land and accepts the deed in other matters, he will be bound by the covenant contained in it. Taylor, Land. & T. § 245.

In 1 Esp. N. P. pt. 2, 114, it is said the action of the covenant lies equally, whether it be by indenture or deed poll.

In Staines v. Morris, 1 Ves. & B. 9, the defendant was held bound by an express personal covenant, though he had not executed the instrument in which it was contained, that as he took the estate under the instrument, he took it subject to the accompanying covenant. To the same effect, Wilkins v. Fry, 1 Meriv. 265.

Georgia.

Where a deed conveyed the right of way through lands to a railroad company, its successors and assigns, and was signed by the grantor alone and contained the following clause, "It is hereby agreed and understood a depot and station is to be located and given to the said (lessor), on the land or strip above conveyed, to be permanently located for the benefit of said (lessor) and his assigns, and to be used for the general purposes of the said railroad,"—it was held that an action on the covenant would lie against the assignee of such company, the company having accepted the deed. Georgia Southern Railroad v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492.

In the above case it was held that such a covenant would run with the land. Ibid.

New Hampshire.

In an action of covenant contained in a deed poll entered into by a married woman for herself, her heirs, and assigns, to erect and maintain a fence, the deed being recorded, it was held that such deed created an incumbrance upon the estate so as to entitle a subsequent grantee to take advantage of a covenant against incumbrances in the conveyance to him. Burbank v. Pillsbury, 48 N. H. 476, 97 Am. Dec. 638.

2. That the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The demurrer was sustained, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted.

The plaintiff, not desiring to amend or further plead, it was considered and adjudged, that the defendant go hence without day and recover of the plaintiff his costs, to which judgment the plaintiff excepted.

On petition in error filed in the circuit court by the plaintiff, the judgment of the court of common pleas was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

This proceeding is instituted by James Hickey, the defendant below, to reverse the judgment of the circuit court.

Messrs. G. M. Barber and A. W. Barber, for plaintiff in error:

There is no provision in the contract that the plaintiff may rebuild and repair and charge the cost thereof to the defendant. Plaintiff's cause of action, if it have one under the alleged contract, is for whatever damages it may have suffered by reason of the alleged breach of the contract.

Huston v. Vincinnati & Z. R. Co. 21 Ohio St. 235.

The condition is in the following language: This conveyance is made subject to the condition that said James Hickey, his heirs and assignees shall make and maintain good and sufficient fence on each side of the right of way, etc. Which condition and obligation shall be perpetually binding on the owner of the land.

New Jersey.

In Finley v. Simpson, 22 N. J. L. 311, 53 Am. Dec. 252, the general principle is stated as being, that an action of covenant can only be sustained where the instrument upon which the action is brought, has been actually signed and sealed by the party, or by his authority.

It was held in that case, however, that where an indenture purporting to be inter partes conveyed an estate to the grantee who accepted the deed and the estate therein conveyed, he was bound by the indenture, though not sealed and delivered by him. Finley v. Simpson, supra.

In Harrison v. Vreeland, 38 N. J. L. 306, where the instrument was a deed poll, and not the deed of the party, it was held that a covenant by implication could not arise, the exceptions to the general rule not embracing mere personal contracts by which no estate in land passes.

Where land was conveyed subject to certain mortgages to secure payment of a given sum, which mortgages were assumed by the party of the second part, an action was brought for breach thereof. The court held that the grantee in a deed, by accepting the same, became liable on the covenants therein contained, purporting to be made by him. Sparkman v. Gove, 44 N. J. L. 252, following Finley v. Simpson, supra.

New York.

Where the deed was made in consideration of the "covenants and conditions" thereafter contained and was not signed by the grantee, the court held that the acceptance of the deed and the taking of possession under it by the grantee, bound him by the covenants contained as effectually as if he had signed it. Spaulding v. Hallenbeck, 35 N. Y. 204, 206.

So in Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 54 N. Y. 85, 13 Am. Rep. 553, the grantee in a deed poll was held 23 L. R. A.

The intent and meaning must be ascertained from the whole instrument interpreted and construed by just and proper rules.

The condition runs with the land and is binding on the owners of the abutting land perpetually.

Worthington v. Hewes, 19 Ohio St. 66; Taylor v. DeBus, 31 Ohio St. 468; Smith v. Harrison, 42 Ohio St. 180.

The whole intent of the parties was to create an easement in favor of the estate of the railroad company in the land occupied by it for its road and a servitude upon the abutting property.

Washb. Easem. 4th ed. p. 681.

Messrs. Estep, Dickey, Carr & Goff, for defendant in error:

This covenant in the deed was a personal covenant, binding upon Hickey, and it continues to be so binding. It is unquestionably also a covenant running with the land upon which the assigns of plaintiff are also liable.

Sutliff v. Atwood, 15 Ohio St. 186; Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 54 N. Y. 85, 13 Am. Rep. 558; Rogers v. Eagle Fire Co. 9 Wend. 618; Trotter v. Hughes, 12 N. Y. 74, 62 Am. Dec. 137; Belmont v. Coman, 22 N. Y. 433, 78 Am. Dec. 213; Spaulding v. Hallenbeck, 35 N. Y. 206; Burbank v. Pillsbury, 48 N. H. 475, 97 bound by the covenant in an action thereon, the court holding such grantee, having accepted the deed and enjoyed the estate, was estopped from denying the covenant. The court affirmed the judgment of the general term, 50 Barb. 135.

So where land was conveyed subject to a mortgage, it was held that the acceptance of the conveyance containing a statement that the grantee is to pay off an incumbrance binds him as effectually as though the deed had been inter partes, and had been executed by both grantor and grantee. Trotter v. Hughes, 12 N. Y. 74, 62 Am. Dec. 137.

In such a case the grantee is not personally bound to pay the debt charged upon the land. Belmont v. Coman, 22 N. Y. 433, 78 Am. Dec. 213.

The same principles are upheld in Bowen v. Beck 94 N. Y. 86, 46 Am. Rep. 124, where it was sought to hold the grantee in foreclosure proceedings.

In Countryman v. Deck, 13 Abb. N. C. 110, the action was brought for specific performance of an alleged covenant to maintain a fence against the subsequent purchaser, and the court held that the acceptance of the deed without signing was sufficient covenant to bind a grantee.

North Carolina.

A grantee accepting a deed poll containing covenants or conditions to be performed by him as the consideration of the grant, becomes bound for their performance, although he does not execute the deed as a party. Maynard v. Moore, 76 N. C. 153.

And an assignee of such grantee will also be bound thereby. Ibid.

It would be difficult, if not impossible, to maintain the action against an assign of the promisor. Martin v. Drinan, 128 Mass. 515; Parish v. Whitney, 3 Gray, 516; Bronson v. Coffin, 103 Mass. 175, 11 Am. Rep. 335.

Am. Dec. 653; Atlantic Dock Co. v. Leavitt, 50 Barb. 135; Pike v. Brown, 7 Cush. 183.

Dickman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In December, 1874, the railway company executed and delivered to James Hickey, the plaintiff in error, a deed, duly recorded thereafter, of three hundred and eighty-two acres of land, situate in Cuyahoga county, Ohio, and the grantee entered into possession of the granted premises. The deed contained the following condition and agreement:

"This conveyance is made subject to the condition that the said James Hickey, his heirs and assigns, shall make and maintain good and sufficient fences on each side of the right of way of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway as now located, . . . which condition and obligation shall be perpetually binding on the owners of the land."

Subsequently to the conveyance, Hickey sold to different parties sundry parcels of the same land. The fences along the line of the railway, and in front of the several parcels thus sold, becoming out of repair, the railway company requested each of the vendees and occupiers of the parcels of land purchased from Hickey, to repair and reconstruct the fences, in accordance with the condition and agreement in the deed from the railway company. Upon the vendees and occupiers refusing and failing so to do, the company caused the fences to be repaired and rebuilt, in a manner sufficient to turn stock and animals as required by law, and commenced the original action to recover the cost and expense of such repairing and rebuilding.

The question presented is, whether the cost and expense so incurred should be borne by the plaintiff in error, the first grantee, or by his respective vendees along the line of whose land the fences have been repaired or rebuilt.

It was resolved in Spencer's Case, that the law would not annex the covenant to a thing which had no being at the time of the demise, as in the case of a covenant by a lessee to build a wall upon part of the land demised and if the covenant should be entered into by the lessee for himself, his executors and administrators, without naming his assigns, the lessee, his executors or administrators would be bound and not his assignee. But, it was also resolved, that if the lessee had covenanted, for himself and his assigns, to make a new wall upon some part of the thing demised, forasmuch as it was to be done upon the land demised, it would bind the assignee; for although the covenant extended to a thing to be newly made, yet, as it was to be made upon the thing demised, and the assignee was to take the benefit of it, it should bind the assignee by express words. Spencer's Case, 5 Coke, 16, first and second resolutions; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 68. In other words, the covenants which are connected with the estate run with the land, and vest in point of benefit and liability in the assignee.

Nor is this principle to be restricted in its application to leases or deeds inter partes, executed by both lessor and lessee, or grantor and grantee. Where a grantee accepts a deed, and goes into possession of the premises under it, he is bound by the conditions contained in the deed as effectually as if he had signed and sealed the instrument. Although not executing the instrument, he should be deemed to have entered into an express undertaking to do what the deed says he is to do; and such undertaking or obligation imposed upon and assumed by the grantee, if not technically a covenant running with the land, is, nevertheless, an agreement of the grantee, evidenced by his acceptance of the deed, which might bind him and his personal representatives, and by express words, his heirs and assigns.

In Burbank v. Pillsbury, 48 N. H. 475, 97 Am. Dec. 638, it was held that a clause in a deed poll, to the effect that the grantee agrees for herself and for her heirs and assigns, that she and they would forever make and maintain a fence all around the granted premises, was of the same effect as an express covenant, signed and sealed by the grantee; that it would run with the land; that it created an incumbrance upon the land; and, by implication, it was recognized that a subsequent grantee would be liable to the original grantor in an action of assumpsit for nonperformance of the stipulation. A decision substantially similar was rendered in Kellogg v. Robinson, 6 Vt. 276, 27 Am. Dec. 550.

And, in Georgia Southern Railroad v. Reeves, 64 Ga. 492, the grantor in consideration of $25, and of the building of the railroad, conveyed to a company, its successors or assigns forever, in fee simple, the right of way through his land, and added in the deed the words: "It is hereby agreed and understood a depot and station is to be located and given to said Reeves, on the land or strip above conveyed, to be permanently located for the benefit of said Reeves and his assigns, and to be used for the general purposes of the railroad company." It was held that the grantee, by accepting such deed, entered into a covenant to comply with its terms, and this covenant ran with the land and became obligatory upon any second company which became the purchaser, under proper legal direction, of the rights, privileges, franchises, and property of the former. See also Countryman v. Deck, 18 Abb. N. C. 110.

If the conditions, stipulations, or covenants in a deed poll may thus run with the land, and bind the first grantee and subsequent purchasers from him, why, it is inquired, should not the plaintiff in error, as well as his grantees, be holden to perform the condition and obligation contained in the deed from the railway company? If the conveyance had been made subject only to the condition that, "James Hickey, his heirs and assigns" shall make and maintain good and sufficient fences on each side of the right of way of the railway, the railway company, we think, might, at its election, pursue either the original grantee or his vendee, or both, for payment. But the conveyance contains the further provision, that such "condition and obligation shall be perpetually binding on the owners of the land." This provision cannot be regarded as meaningless and without design. In the construction of deeds, the object of all rules is to ascertain the intent of the parties. And in construing the words of a grant, of covenant, of qualification, condition, restraint, exception or explanation, every word should be presumed to have been used for some purpose, and should be deemed to have some force and effect, if it can have. Devlin, Deeds, § 840; Salisbury v. Andrews, 19 Pick. 250, 252.

In the case before us, the railway company conveyed the land in fee, and as part consideration, imposed a condition for making and maintaining fences, which was to be "perpetually binding on the owners of the land." The meaning of the condition, we think, was to place upon Hickey an obligation to make and maintain the fences only during the time he was the owner of the land. At his death, his heirs, upon succeeding to the ownership, would be held to make and maintain the fences while their ownership lasted. If he or his heirs or devisees should sell the land, the assignees would likewise be held while they continued to be owners—the obligation thus running with the land. Manifestly, it was not Hickey's intention to assume an obligation in perpetuum, and after having sold and conveyed the premises in fee, to remain bound for life, and his heirs to be bound after his death, to build and keep up the fences between the right of way and the land sold. And in getting at the intention of the railway company, the obvious inference would be, that the company would naturally provide for a recourse to those who might own the land at the time the fences needed repairing or rebuilding, rather than to its grantee and his heirs, who might perhaps at the time be dead, or unable to be found. We cannot but conclude that the company intended when the land was conveyed, to trust to the land and its owners, for a performance of the condition contained in the deed, and not to its grantee after he ceased to be the owner. The fact that the company imposed the condition, that the grantee and "his assigns" should make and maintain the fences, and added thereto, that the condition or obligation should be perpetually binding on "the owners of the land," would indicate an intention to make ownership the test as to who should be bound to perform the condition in the deed.

In Worthington v. Hewes, 19 Ohio St. 66, there was a demise of certain real estate to the lessee and his assigns, for ninety-nine years, renewable forever. The lease provided that the rent was to be fixed by a re-appraisal of the premises every fifteen years. The stipulation in the lease as to the mode of appointing appraisers was held to be a covenant running with the land, and not a collateral covenant. For all substantial purposes, the estate was treated as a leasehold estate in name and in form only. The lessor, in effect, having parted at once with his entire estate, the lessee was deemed to have taken in form a chattel, but in fact an estate in fee. The liability of the lessee for rents was regarded as simply a question of intention; and it was held that, after an unconditional assignment by the lessee, he was not liable for future rents, and had no right to interfere in the appointment of appraisers, which was a matter to be adjusted, not by the original parties to the lease, but by their assignees. The decision, though not altogether decisive, is, in a measure, forcibly illustrative of principles involved in the case at bar.

The judgment of the Circuit Court, in our opinion, should be reversed, and that of the Court of Common Pleas affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

D. R. BEARD et al., Appls.,
v.
City of HOPKINSVILLE et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. No formal assignment of a city to the class to which it belongs is necessary

NOTE.—What constitutes an "indebtedness" within the meaning of constitutional and statutory restrictions of indebtedness of municipal corporations.

An indebtedness within restrictions upon municipal indebtedness is an agreement of some kind by the municipality to pay money, where no suitable provision has been made for the prompt discharge of the obligation imposed by the agreement. Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 473, 45 Am. Rep. 487.

The word "indebtedness" is to be given its fair and legitimate meaning and general acceptance. French v. Burlington, 43 Iowa, 614; Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396.

And a debt in its general sense is defined in State v. Hawes, 112 Ind. 323, which is a municipal indebtedness case, to be "a specified sum of money which is due or owing from one person to another, and to make operative a constitutional provision limiting the amount of indebtedness of the city according to its classification on population.

2. A contract by a city to pay an annual rental for the use of water hydrants and electric lights is a contracting of indebtedness within the meaning of a constitutional limitation when the city is already indebtedness denotes not only the obligation of the debtor to pay but also the right of the creditor to receive and enforce payment."

An indebtedness cannot arise unless there is either a legal, equitable, or moral obligation to pay a sum of money to another who occupies the position of creditor and who has a legal or moral right to call upon or constrain the debtor to pay. Quill v. Indianapolis, 7 L. R. A. 631, 124 Ind. 222; State v. Hawes, supra.

A restriction upon incurring indebtedness in any manner or for any purpose is usually held to include all debts incurred in any manner. Council Bluffs v. Stewart, 51 Iowa, 385; East St. Louis v. Flannigan, 26 Ill. App. 449; Norton v. East St. Louis, 36 Ill. App. 171; Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 632, 32 L. ed. 1090.

In French v. Burlington, 43 Iowa, 614, the restriction was held to apply to the necessary and condebted beyond the prescribed limit although the usual and legal income from taxation and otherwise would be sufficient to pay all the current expenses including such rental.

(January 23, 1894.)

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Christian County in favor of defendants in an action brought to set aside a contract for lighting the defendant city, on the ground that the expense would exceed the constitutional limit of indebtedness. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. I. Landes, Petree & Downer, C. H. Bush, Joe McCarroll, C. P. Campbell, and J. T. Hanbery, for appellants:

Sections 157 and 158 of the new Constitution, venient improvement of the streets as well as all other things deemed necessary and proper for the comfort and health of the people.

Bonds or other obligations to pay money generally fall within restrictions upon municipal indebtedness. Winamac v. Huddleston, 182 Ind. 217; State v. Babcock, 24 Neb. 640; McPherson v. Foster, 43 Iowa, 48, 22 Am. Rep. 215.

But bonds are invalid only when issued after the limit is reached. That a portion of an indebtedness is within the limit will not legalize that which is in excess of it. McPherson v. Foster, and State v. Babcock, supra; Sutro v. Pettit, 74 Cal. 332.

Nor is the portion within the limit invalidated by the fact that another portion of it is in excess of the limit and illegal. State v. Crete, 23 Neb. 568; McPherson v. Foster, supra.

It must appear that the particular indebtedness sued upon was incurred after the limit was passed. George D. Barnard & Co. v. Knox County, 37 Fed. Rep. 563.

The term "indebtedness" is not to be confined to debts by bond. Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396; Council Bluffs v. Stewart, 51 Iowa, 385.

Or by loan. People v. May, 9 Colo. 80; Rollins v. Lake County, 34 Fed. Rep. 845.

An implied as well as an express indebtedness or promise is included within a restriction upon municipal indebtedness, a claim for the return of moneys received in bonds issued in excess of the limit falling within it. Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190, 29 L. ed. 182.

Municipal restrictions apply not only to present indebtedness but also to such as is payable upon some future contingency or which depends upon some contingency for the creation of the liability. Burlington Water Co. v. Woodward, 49 Iowa, 53; Prince v. Quincy, 123 Ill. 443; Spilman v. Parkersburg, 35 W. Va. 605.

But the contingency must be sure to take place irrespective of any future action of the city. If it depends upon such action it will only become an indebtedness within such restrictions when such action is had. Burlington Water Co. v. Woodward, supra.

If the indebtedness is payable at all events it is within the restriction. Law v. People, 37 Ill. 385.

An issue of warrants in excess of the limits does not constitute incurring an indebtedness within a restriction thereon where the municipality has money in its treasury to meet them. Dively v. Cedar Falls, 27 Iowa, 227.

This principle is also indirectly involved in Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396, and Sackett v. New Albany, 38 Ind. 473, 45 Am. Rep. 467.

the former of which, among other things, prohibits any county, city, town, taxing district, or other municipality from creating a debt in any year, exceeding the income and revenue provided for such year, without the assent of two thirds of the voters thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose, were self-executing, and in force at the date of the contract, and the latter of which limit the per cent of indebtedness, which we claim has been extended by the contract in question.

A constitutional provision may be said to be self-executing if it supplies a sufficient rule by means of which the right given may be enjoyed and protected, or the duty imposed may be enforced.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 99; Law v. People, 37 Ill. 385; Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 626; East St. Louis v. People, 124 Ill. 655; Bass v. Nashville, Meigs, 421, 33 Am. Dec. 154; for which the fund only and not the municipality is liable are not within those restrictions. Quill v. Indianapolis, 7 L. R. A. 681, 124 Ind. 232; Strieb v. Cox, 111 Ind. 230; Baker v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 576.

And the same rule applies to agreements to accept certificates of assessment in full satisfaction. Davis v. Des Moines, 71 Iowa, 500.

As to warrants drawn on taxes which have been levied payable only out of the tax, see infra under heading Provisions for future payments.

But an acknowledgment of the indebtedness of the city and the promise to pay in the bond or other evidence of the obligation makes the city absolutely liable and brings the indebtedness within the restriction. Fowler v. Superior, 35 Wis. 411; Law v. People, 37 Ill. 385.

Where no provision is made for raising or appropriating revenue to be applied in payment the municipality is liable and an indebtedness within the restriction is created. Murphy v. East Portland, 42 Fed. Rep. 308; Salem Water Co. v. Salem, 5 Or. 30; Austin v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 667.

And the mere fact that provision for payment is made is not in itself sufficient. All power to resort to the municipality or its funds must be expressly taken away. State v. Fayette County Comrs, 37 Ohio St. 526; Kimball v. Grant County Comrs, 21 Fed. Rep. 45.

A restriction upon borrowing or incurring indebtedness for a general purpose does not apply to indebtedness for special purposes such as the construction of a sidewalk. Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341, 24 L. ed. 650; Galveston v. Heard, 54 Tex. 420; Galveston v. Loomis, Id. 517.

A restriction upon contracting funded debts is not applicable to ordinary debts growing out of transactions with single individuals and represented by a single instrument like a debt incurred in the purchase of market grounds. Kitchum v. Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 356.

Where an issue of bonds brings the indebtedness up to the limit interest coupons attached thereto for the payment of interest until the bonds fall due are not to be considered as raising the indebtedness above the limit. Gibbons v. Mobile & G. N. R. Co., 36 Ala. 410.

A municipality whose indebtedness is up to the limit may employ an agent or attorney to contest a part of its indebtedness and secure a reduction thereof, though his compensation would raise the original amount above the limit. Logansport v. Dykeman, 116 Ind. 15.

An indebtedness incurred in the exchange of an old fire engine for a new one is within a restriction upon new debts. Hudson v. Marietta, 64 Ga. 293.

Kine v. Defenbaugh, 64 Ill. 291; Mitchell v. Illinois & St. L. E. & Coal Co. 68 Ill. 286; Willis v. St. Paul Sanitation Co. 16 L. R. A. 281, 48 Minn. 140; People v. McRoberts, 62 Ill. 88; Johnson v. Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402, 87 Am. Rep. 779.

Under the contract for water and electric lights between John P. Martin and the city of Hopkinsville, the aggregate amount ($95,000) which the city agreed to pay during the period of twenty years for water and light, although it is to be paid in fixed annual (or quarter-annual) sums, is a debt for the aggregate sum from the date of the contract, of the character that is prohibited and declared void by the charter of March 5, 1870, and §§ 157, 158, of the Constitution.

An obligation or liability to pay money, arising upon or growing out of contract, is a debt, according to the common understanding, as well as the definitions in all of the lexicons.

The hypothecation of shares of railway stock owned by a municipality for the purpose of investing the money in another railroad creates an indebtedness within a restriction thereon. Baltimore v. Gill, 31 Md. 375.

The Maine constitutional limitation upon municipal indebtedness expressly provides that it shall not be construed as applying to any fund received in trust by a city or town. Ayer v. Bangor, 85 Me. 611.

An indebtedness in excess of the limit incurred pursuant to authority legally conferred before the adoption of the constitutional limit is not affected by it. Board of Education v. Bolton, 104 Ill. 220.

In Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385, it was held an indebtedness in excess of the limit is presumed to be illegal and the burden of proof to establish its validity rests with the party asserting it.

But in Atlantic City Water Works Co. v. Atlantic City, 48 N. J. L. 373, it was held that it does not follow that an obligation is necessarily in excess of a limit because it calls for payments in futuro indefinitely, and the court cannot assume it in the absence of an averment to that effect.

Must be voluntary.

In order to fall within municipal restrictions the indebtedness must be one created by the voluntary action of both the debtor and creditor. Thomas v. Burlington, 69 Iowa, 140.

The intent of such provisions is to limit or restrict the power of the municipality as to any indebtedness or liability which it has discretion to incur or not to incur. Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 591.

Thus an involuntary liability arising ex delicto is not within restrictions upon municipal indebtedness. Thomas v. Burlington, supra; Bloomington v. Perdue, 99 Ill. 329; McCracken v. San Francisco, supra.

And a municipality cannot set up that it is already indebted in excess of the limit as a defense in an action against it for injuries growing out of negligence. Bloomington v. Perdue, supra.

This rule was applied to a claim for damages resulting from a defective sidewalk, in Rice v. Des Moines, 40 Iowa, 638.

And to a similar claim for injuries caused by the negligent construction and maintenance of gutters in streets, in Bartie v. Des Moines, 38 Iowa, 414.

The responsibility imposed upon a municipality for the want of fidelity of those who act for it is not within restrictions and limitations upon municipal indebtedness. Chicago v. Sexton, 115 Ill. 230.

James Breathitt, City Atty., and Wood & Bell*, for appellees:

In Holtzhauer v. Davenport, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 188, the court says: "Section 157 of the present Constitution . . . is not self-operative, but is addressed to the legislature, indicating the limitations on the powers it shall give the several classes of towns and cities when it shall come to provide for their classification and government by general laws; and until this is done, which must be within four years from

Nor do they apply to cash transactions out of which indebtedness arises, not by virtue of the contract, but because of its breach. Congers v. Kirk, 73 Ga. 480.

Nor do they apply to liabilities arising from mistake. McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 591.

So, an enforced indebtedness, or an indebtedness which the law casts upon a municipality as distinguished from its own voluntary acts and contracts performed by the proper municipal officers, is not within such restrictions. McCracken v. San Francisco, supra; Thomas v. Burlington, 69 Iowa, 140; Grant County v. Lake County, 17 Or. 453; Potter v. Douglas County, 37 Mo. 230.

Thus a claim for the recovery of taxes paid under protest or under legal compulsion is not an indebtedness within such restrictions. Thomas v. Burlington, supra.

Nor is a claim for moneys paid to city officers by mistake. Hintrager v. Richter (Iowa) May 17, 1898.

Nor does the restriction apply to an indebtedness imposed upon a municipality by the legislature in the adjustment of the matters of indebtedness between different municipalities after a change of boundaries between them. Grant County v. Lake County, supra.

Nor is the indebtedness of a municipality increased by its union with another municipality, the body created by the union having both the debts and the property. True v. Davis, 6 L. R. A. 266, 133 Ill. 522.

A sheriff's claim for keeping, clothing, boarding, and transporting prisoners is a debt incurred by a municipality by compulsion of law, and is not therefore within municipal restrictions. Potter v. Douglas County, supra.

Neither is a claim for books, stationery, etc., which the officer incurring the indebtedness is required by law to purchase. George D. Barnard & Co. v. Knox County, 37 Fed. Rep. 553. To the contrary, Barnard v. Knox County, 105 Mo. 323, 13 L. R. A. 244, overruling Potter v. Douglas County, supra.

In Lake County v. Rollins, 130 U. S. 583, 32 L. ed. 1060, however, a case arising in the district of Colorado, it was held that the restriction is absolute applying to indebtedness for all purposes whatever including ordinary and compulsory indebtedness such as witnesses' and jurors' fees, election costs, charges for board of prisoners, county treasurer's commissions, etc.

See further infra, as to debts for current expenses.

It is held in California that a constitutional provision that no city shall incur any liability exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for

January 1, 1891, the existing charters of towns and cities continue in force, including their tax rates and methods of raising revenue."

Appellees deny that the Ohio Valley Railway bonds were a debt due by the city at the time the contract was made with Martin.

At the time this contract with Martin was made, June 18, 1892, the railway company had not complied with its contract, and the line was not completed, nor the conditions complied with until some time in August following. Then and only then did the subscription on the part of the city become due and a debt.

Cumberland & O. R. Co. v. Barren County 10 Bush, 604.

Sections 157, 158, of the Constitution limiting the indebtedness of municipalities, is substantially the same as that of the constitution of Iowa and Indiana, from which they were evidently taken.

Our constitution should receive the same construction given by the states from which they are borrowed.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 15th ed. § 64; Fall v. Hazelrigg, 45 Ind. 576, 15 Am. Rep. 278; Langdon v. Applegate, 5 Ind. 327; Clark v. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. 44 Ind. 248; Sidwell v. Evans, 1 Penn. & W. 383, 21 Am. Dec. 387; Bank of Illinois v. Stoo, 16 La. 539, 85 Am. Dec. 323.

Such a construction has been had both in Iowa and Indiana, and in cases not only similar but almost identical with this now before the court.

Grant v. Davenport, 26 Iowa, 896, involved the construction of a contract for water made with the city of Davenport.

The conclusion reached by the court is that where the contract made by the municipal corporation pertains to its ordinary expenses and is together with other like expenses within the limits of its current revenues and such special such year except on certain conditions, does not apply to claims for salary of municipal officers whose salaries are fixed and offices created by statute. The liability being deemed to have been established by the legislature cannot be said to have been incurred by the city. Lewis v. Widber, 99 Cal. 412.

The auditing and payment of demands for salaries of such officers is not affected by the one twelfth act of California prohibiting the incurring of any indebtedness in any manner or for any purpose exceeding in any year the income and revenue provided for it for such year, or in any month thereof which shall exceed one twelfth part of the amount permitted to be expended during the fiscal year. Welch v. Strother, 74 Cal. 413; Cashin v. Dunn, 58 Cal. 582.

In Illinois the salary of a health officer is held to be within the restriction. Norton v. East St. Louis, 98 Ill. App. 171.

Future indebtedness.

Many of the cases agree with the principal case that debts payable in the future or upon the happening of some future event as the rendition of service, or the delivery of property, are within such restrictions upon municipal indebtedness, as well as debts presently payable. Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 628; Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385; Prince v. Quincy, 28 Ill. App. 490; Prince v. Quincy, 105 Ill. 123, 44 Am. Rep. 785; Niles Waterworks v. Niles, 59 Mich. 311; Smith v. Newburgh, 77 N. Y. 130; State v. Atlantic City, 49 N. J. L. 558; Davenport v. Kleinschmidt, 6 Mont. 502; State v. Medbery, 7 Ohio St. 522; Erie's App. 91 Pa. 396; Coulson v. Portland, Deady, 431.

The restriction applies to contracts for years relating to ordinary current expenses payable out of current revenues. Prince v. Quincy, and Prince v. Quincy, and Springfield v. Edwards, supra.

In East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gas-Light & Coke Co., 98 Ill. 415, 38 Am. Rep. 97, a contract for lighting the streets for a term of years at an agreed price to be paid monthly was upheld upon the ground that it created no present indebtedness for the whole sum, but that the indebtedness accrued from month to month as the gas was furnished. But this ruling was explained in Prince v. Quincy, 105 Ill. 123, 44 Am. Rep. 785, upon the theory that it did not affirmatively appear therein that the city was indebted beyond its limit.

East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gas-Light & Coke Co., supra, was followed, however, and cited as authority in Carlyle Water, L. & P. Co. v. Carlyle, 21 Ill. App. 325, in which it was held that the rental of hydrants for a period of years does not create a present indebtedness rendering an appropriation necessary upon entering into the contract and it is also followed in East St. Louis v. Flannigan, 26 Ill. App. 449, also a case of a contract for furnishing gas in which a distinction is drawn between a contract for a gross sum, some or all of which is payable in the future, and a contract for future services from time to time to be paid for as rendered from time to time.

The contrary rule has been adopted by the courts of some of the other states that agreements for future or periodical payments do not become obligatory and are not an indebtedness until the service or other consideration for that particular period has been rendered, the indebtedness being deemed to be conditional upon performance and the restrictions applying only when an overdue payment will raise the indebtedness above the limit. Crowder v. Sullivan, 13 L. R. A. 647, 128 Ind. 456; Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, 49 Am. Rep. 417; State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 430; Rome v. McWilliams, 67 Ga. 106; New Orleans Gas Light Co. v. New Orleans, 49 La. Ann. 188; Smith v. Dedham, 144 Mass. 177.

In an early New York case it was held that a charter provision prohibiting expenditure beyond a certain limit during the current political year does not forbid the authorization of an expenditure in that year to be made, and for services to be performed in a subsequent year. Weston v. Syracuse, 17 N. Y. 110.

In Smith v. Newburgh, 77 N. Y. 130, holding that a lease of premises for a long term of years with rent payable semi-annually creates an indebtedness of the aggregate amount at the time of the execution of the lease, Weston v. Syracuse, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that it turned upon the peculiar phraseology of the charter provision.

But in Utica Water-works Co. v. Utica, 81 Hun, 423, it was held, without noticing either of the above cases, that a continuing contract for a supply of water to be paid for annually does not contravene a charter provision prohibiting debts which shall not be payable within the year in which contracted, and that it does not ripen into a debt except from year to year each year's indebtedness being only for the water furnished in that year.

Provision for future payment.

A municipality which has reached its limit may anticipate the collection of the revenue appropriated to its use by drawing warrants against taxes levied but not yet collected, thus virtually appropriating and assigning the amount taxes as it may legally and in good faith intend to levy therefor, such contract does not constitute the incurring of indebtedness within the meaning of the constitutional provisions.

See also Dixey v. Cedar Falls, 27 Iowa, 227.

Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, 49 Am. Rep. 417, is on "all fours" with the one at bar, involving precisely the same questions.

The court in substance declares that where the installments for water can be met out of current revenues no debt is created, even though the indebtedness be beyond the limit, and that the city is only liable for the water as furnished, and not before and only after the money is earned does it become a debt.

Where services are to be paid for in cash at the time of completion, out of a fund to be derived from special assessments upon the property benefited, no indebtedness is incurred therefor, even though during the pendency of the work bonds are issued to raise funds to carry it on. Quill v. Indianapolis, 7 L. R. A. 681, 124 Ind. 292.

An ordinance providing for local improvements to be paid for in part by general taxation and in part by assessment upon abutting property where no provision for credit or loan is made, does not create an indebtedness within a municipal restriction. Jacksonville R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 114 Ill. 567.

But in order to escape the restriction the tax must not only have been levied but the warrant must be drawn payable out of that particular fund and be such in legal effect as to discharge the municipality from all liability. Springfield v. Edwards, Law v. People, and East St. Louis v. Flannigan, supra; Fuller v. Chicago, 89 Ill. 292; Spillman v. Parkersburg, 35 W. Va. 605.

In East St. Louis v. Flannigan, supra, the language of the court would seem to confine the power to anticipate to the payment of current expenses.

The revenues must be absolutely certain to be received and it must be confined to the ordinary revenues. If the revenues of two years are required to pay an indebtedness previously incurred the restriction should be applied. French v. Burlington, 42 Iowa, 614.

The California courts have held that an act creating a future liability which appropriates the sum requisite to discharge it does not create a debt within restrictions upon municipal indebtedness though the limit is passed and though made in advance of the collection of the revenue. Koppikus v. State Capitol Comrs. 16 Cal. 248; People v. Brooks, 1d. 1; People v. Pacheco, 27 Cal. 175; State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 480.

In People v. Pacheco, supra, the law making the appropriation also imposed a special tax and set apart proceeds to constitute a special fund to meet it.

So a restriction upon incurring debts and making loans without a contemporaneous appropriation Haselrigg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On June 13, 1892, the appellee, through its board of councilmen, entered into a contract with its co-appellee John P. Martin, by the terms of which the latter agreed to construct and maintain in and near the city a system of waterworks and sewerage, and also an electric-light plant. For the use of seventy hydrants for five years, and of thirty-five arc lights for the same period, the city agreed to pay Martin, as rent, the sum of $5,500 per year. At the expiration of the five years the contract for water rental was to continue fifteen years longer, at $4,500 per year, the city having an option to renew the contract for lights at $1,000 per annum. The city contained a population of more than 8,000, and less than 8,000, and therefore would be a city of the fourth class whenever the assignment and classification should be made of the cities and towns of the state as ation of a sufficient annual income or tax to pay interest and sink the principal within a certain time, applies to funded debts only and does not require every contract to be accompanied by an appropriation though it may ripen into a debt. Tatham's App. 80 Pa. 465.

But a restriction upon incurring any expense unless an appropriation covering it had been previously made operates to invalidate any indebtedness incurred after an appropriation for that purpose has been made and exhausted. Kingland v. New York, 5 Daly, 448.

A restriction upon the creation of debts unless at the same time provision is made for taxation for its payment requires debts for current expenses to run concurrently with the current revenues. They are invalid if they mature at such a time as to make them a charge upon future revenues. Terrell v. Dessaint, 71 Tex. 770; Garrison v. Chicago, 7 Biss. 480.

A two-year old note falls within this restriction. Terrell v. Dessaint, supra.

A contract by a parish engaged in heavy litigation with an experienced attorney other than the legal adviser of the parish is not within a statutory requirement that a debtor's liability cannot be incurred without at the same time providing for its payment. Talbott v. Parish of Iberville, 24 La. Ann. 185.

A restriction against incurring indebtedness exceeding in any year the income and revenues provided for it for such year prohibits the payment of an indebtedness of one year out of the income and revenues of another year. San Francisco Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 641.

Current expenses and indebtedness payable out of current revenues.

The courts of a number of the states have held that an absolute prohibition against incurring indebtedness in any manner or for any purpose beyond certain limits invalidates any contract raising the indebtedness above that limit even though it pertains to the ordinary expenses of the affairs of government. Prince v. Quincy, 105 Ill. 138, 44 Am. Rep. 785; Prince v. Quincy, 128 Ill. 443; Prince v. Quincy, 28 Ill. App. 490; Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 626; Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 473, 45 Am. Rep. 467; People v. May, 9 Colo. 80; Nougues v. Douglass, 7 Cal. 66; Adams v. East River Sav. Inst. 65 Hun, 145, affirmed 136 N. Y. 52; Spillman v. Parkersburg, 35 W. Va. 605; Barnard v. Knox County, 18 L. R. A. 244, 105 Mo. 382; State v. Columbia, 111 Mo. 385; Book v. Earl, 87 Mo. 246; Hebard v. Ash- required by the constitution. This assignment or classification had not been made at the date of the contract or institution of this action. The indebtedness of the city was something like $125,000, due, mainly, in 5-30 bonds to the Ohio Valley Railway Company. The value of the taxable property for 1891 was $1,546,390. It is shown that with a tax rate of 75 cents on the $100, together with the usual collections from other fixed sources, the city could pay its annual current expenses of all kinds, and also the additional water and light rental proposed in the contract, and still have an annual surplus of several thousand dollars. Immediately after this contract was made, the appellants, who are citizens and taxpayers of the city, instituted this action to have the contract declared void, contending that the city of Hopkinsville, or its board of councilmen, had no constitutional power to make the contract, because it bound the city to pay an indebtedness shown to be in excess of the limitation imposed on the city and its authorities by the constitution. There were other contentions which are not necessary to notice. The chancellor determined all the points made against the plaintiffs below, upheld the contract and dismissed the petition. This appeal involves the correctness of that judgment.

The constitutional provision supposed to affect the question involved is as follows: "Sec. 158. The respective cities, towns, counties, taxing districts and municipalities shall not be authorized or permitted to incur indebtedness to an amount, including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding the following named maximum percentages on the value of the taxable property therein, to be estimated by the assessment next before the last assessment previous to the incurring of the indebtedness, viz.: . . . cities and towns of the fourth class, five per centum. . . . Provided, any city, town, etc., may

And even though they are payable out of current revenues. Prince v. Quincy, 28 Ill. App. 490.

A city whose indebtedness has reached the limit must carry on the corporate operations while in that condition upon the cash system and not on credit, doing nothing more than to anticipate a legal levy already made. Spilman v. Parkersburg, supra.

And even though they are compulsory obligations such as witnesses' and jurors' fees, election costs, charges for board of prisoners, county treasurers' commissions, etc. Lake County v. Rollins, supra.

As to compulsory indebtedness in such cases, see further supra under heading Must be voluntary.

In Indiana this rule does not extend to a contract for a usual and necessary thing such as water or light agreed to be paid for periodically as furnished, the debt for each period coming into existence when the compensation for that period has been earned. Crowder v. Sullivan, 13 L. E. A. 647, 128 Ind. 426.

Usual, ordinary, and necessary expenses are not included in restrictions upon municipal indebtedness by the courts of several of the states. Rice v. Keokuk, 15 Iowa; 579; Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396; Tucker v. Raleigh, 75 N. C. 267.

So some of the cases hold that debts in the nature of ordinary administrative and current expenses payable out of current revenues are not within such restrictions. Laycock v. Baton Rouge, 35 La. Ann. 475; Dwyer v. Brenham, 65 Tex. 526; Grant v. Davenport, supra.

Neither is the issue of warrants for current expenses which do not exceed the current revenue the creation of an indebtedness within a prohibition thereof unless a special tax be levied to meet the interest and create a sinking fund. Corpus Christi v. Woessner, 58 Tex. 462.

And the same rule applies to ordinances directing street labor within the limit of current revenues. Reynolds v. Shreveport, 13 La. Ann. 426.

An indebtedness incurred for a supply of water for the use of the municipality and its inhabitants is an ordinary indebtedness for a municipal purpose not affected by the restriction within the rule relied on in the latter class of cases. Comstock v. Syracuse, 5 N. Y. Supp. 874; Grant v. Davenport, 36 Iowa, 396; Capital City Water Co. v. Montgomery, 22 Ala. 366.

So is an indebtedness for supplying light to the city and its inhabitants. Laycock v. Baton Rouge, supra; Lott v. Waycross, 84 Ga. 681.

Including the establishment of an electric light system, that being a city purpose, within the meaning of a restriction on indebtedness except for a city purpose. Hequembourg v. Dunkirk, 49 Hun, 550.

So is an indebtedness for making and repairing township roads an incidental and ordinary expense. Lehigh Coal & Nav. Co's App. 112 Pa. 360.

So is an indebtedness incurred in the support of convicts. State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 420.

In Jonas v. Cincinnati, 13 Ohio, 518, it was held that a contract for lighting a street is within a charter provision prohibiting the city council from making or authorizing any contract for the payment of money at any day beyond the current fiscal year.

In Austin v. Seattle, 2 Wash. 667, it was held that an indebtedness incurred for water and sewerage purposes is not to be considered as a part of the general indebtedness of the city and is not to be considered in determining whether the limit of general indebtedness has been reached.

But in Nelson v. New York, 63 N. Y. 535, it was held that a statutory prohibition against incurring expense unless an appropriation covering it had been previously made applies to an authorized purchase of sewer materials.

So in Wallace v. San José, 29 Cal. 180, an agreement to pay an attorney a sum of money at a future time if he succeeds in placing the city in possession of certain lands was held to be within a prohibition against creating debts to arise in the future unless there is money in the treasury to pay them.

A prohibition against borrowing money or contracting debts which cannot be paid out of the revenues of the fiscal year does not apply to a contract whereby the city agrees to pay an electric light company a certain sum per year for a number of years if the amount to be paid each year does not exceed the revenue for that year. Merrill Railway & Lighting Co. v. Merrill, 80 Wis. 353.

Change of form of indebtedness.

Bonds issued and sold for the purpose of refunding other valid outstanding bonds, the issuance of which does not in fact increase the indebtedness, but merely changes its form, are not affected by restrictions upon municipal indebtedness. Atina L. Ins. Co. v. Lyon County, 44 Fed. Rep. 829.

The same rule applies to the issue of new bonds or other evidences of indebtedness in the place of contract an indebtedness in excess of such limitations when the same has been authorized under laws in force prior to the adoption of this constitution, or when necessary for the completion of the payment for a public improvement undertaken and not completed and paid for at the time of the adoption of this constitution. . . . "Sec. 166. All acts of incorporation of cities and towns heretofore granted, and all amendments thereto, except as provided in section one hundred and sixty-seven, shall continue in force under this constitution, and all city and police courts established in any city or town shall remain, with their present powers and jurisdictions, until such time as the general assembly shall provide by general laws for the government of towns and cities and the officers and courts thereof; but not longer than four years from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-one, within which time the general assembly shall provide by general laws for the government of towns and cities, and the officers and courts thereof as provided in this constitution."

By their contention the appellants mean that the indebtedness of the city at the time of the contract was in excess of 5 per centum on its taxable property, which is the limit prescribed by the 158th section of the Constitution for cities of the fourth class; and Hopkinsville is alleged to be a city of the fourth class, by reason of its population being 8,000 or more, and less than 8,000. In order to apply this limit of 5 per centum, counsel for the appellants plead as a fact that the population of the city was such as required its assignment and classification among cities of the fourth class. It is not contended, as we understand the argument, that the actual assignment—the mere form of classification—directed by the constitution to be made by the general assembly can be made by the courts, but that it was the evident intention of the framers of the constitution to have the wholesome limitations provided for in the section to apply instantly upon its adoption; that the assignment or classification was a mere form, and its delay should not entitle the cities desiring to do so to overreach the plain provisions of the constitution, and deliberately incur an unauthorized indebtedness. Notwithstanding the fact that some difficulty may seemingly arise in ascertaining what maximum percentage on the value of the taxable property in a given city is to be applied in determining what limitation on its indebtedness shall control in the absence of the classification, yet we are constrained to the conclusion that not to apply the section as one affecting and controlling the cities of the commonwealth, immediately upon the adoption of the constitution, would be in clear defiance of the determined will of the body framing the instrument. No one idea stands out more clearly than that barriers should be erected against the creation of municipal indebtedness. In times of popular excitement the internal improvement craze had well nigh wrecked many of the most flourishing counties and towns of the hitherto staid and conservative commonwealth. To seek excuses for withholding the application of these conservative restraints thus wisely devised by this body of enlightened men, and delay the matured bonds or a pre-existing debt. Blanton v. McDowell County Comrs. 101 N. C. 532; Powell v. Madison, 107 Ind. 106; Poughkeepsie v. Quintard, 65 Hun, 141, affirmed, 136 N. Y. 275.

Stock created by the city of New York constituting a debt payable by taxation held by commissioners of a sinking fund provided for the payment of a public debt, the object of the purchase by the commissioners being the extinction of the stock, is not an indebtedness of the city within restrictions thereon. Bank for Savings in New York v. Grace, 102 N. Y. 314.

But where bonds are issued and sold the fact that the proceeds are to be used to acquire property equal in value to the amount of the loan will not withdraw them from the operation of the restriction. Scott v. Davenport, 34 Iowa, 208.

So in Doon Dist. Twp. v. Cummins, 142 U. S. 366, 35 L. ed. 1044, the United States Supreme Court held, in the trend of the Iowa decisions in a case arising under the constitution and statutes of that state, that bonds issued by a school district in excess of the limit and sold for the purpose of applying the proceeds to the payment of its previous bonded indebtedness are void in the hands of a purchaser with notice, reversing Cummins v. Doon Dist. Twp. 42 Fed. Rep. 644.

Restrictions upon loaning credit or becoming a stockholder in a corporation do not prevent a municipality already owning stock in a corporation for the construction of a public work from purchasing the rest and becoming the entire owner and agreeing upon a dissolution under legislative authority. *People v. by an issue of bonds should be made at the time of the issue. If within it then it is immaterial that it would have exceeded at the time the bonds were issued. Thompson-Houston Electric Co. v. Newton, 42 Fed. Rep. 723.

Or at the time judgment thereon was rendered. Wilder v. Rio Grande County Comrs. 41 Fed. Rep. 512.

Unpaid interest on donations previously made will not be considered in making the estimates. Jones v. Hurlburt, 13 Neb. 125.

Nor will uncollected taxes or the levy for the current year be deducted. Council Bluffs v. Stewart, 51 Iowa, 385.

Restrictions apply to each municipality singly, so that where different municipalities embrace the same territory in whole or in part the validity of a debt incurred by one will not be affected by the extent of the indebtedness of the other. Wilson v. Sanitary Dist. of Chicago Trustees, 133 Ill. 443.

Nor does a restriction upon county indebtedness affect the validity of bonds issued by one of its precincts in addition to any amount the county may have issued. State v. Lancaster County Comrs. 6 Neb. 214.

So, a restriction upon a county containing a city with a designated number of inhabitants is to be taken distributively and not collectively, so that in determining where the limit has been reached a debt of one may not be charged against the other. Adams v. East River Sav. Inst. 136 N. Y. 52, affirming 65 Hun. 145.

beneficent results intended, merely because a formal assignment of a given city had not been made to its appropriate class, would be giving prominence to the shadow, and losing sight of the substance. Moreover, it will be observed that the percentages are not fixed wholly with reference to the classes to which the cities may belong, but the per centum fixed for some of the cities is made to depend on their population; and recourse must therefore be had, in such cases, to the ordinary methods of proof to ascertain the per centum applicable. In discussing a similar question it was said in Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385: "It has been repeatedly held, and is regarded as settled doctrine, that all negative or prohibitive clauses of this character found in a constitution execute themselves, as legislative provisions in the same or other language, prohibiting the incurring of such indebtedness, could be no more binding or forcible than the constitution itself." In the case of Holtzhauser v. Newport, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 188, it was contended that because the indebtedness of the city at the time of the adoption of the present constitution, and at the time the contracts in question were entered into, was in excess of 10 per centum on the valuation of her taxable property during that time, therefore the prohibitory provisions of section 158 were applicable; and we said of this contention: "It may be admitted that to the extent that this section provides for a state of case in existence at the time of the adoption of the constitution it is applicable to all towns and cities resting under the conditions named. But, in express terms, the limitation of 10 per centum may be exceeded when the proposed indebtedness has been authorized under laws in force prior to the adoption of this constitution." This section was therefore treated as in full force upon the adoption of the constitution, and as applicable to the cities and towns resting under the conditions named. The contract for the increased indebtedness of the city (Newport) was upheld upon the ground that it was contracted "under laws in force prior to the adoption of the constitution," those laws being in the form of amendments to the charter of the city, approved in 1890, authorizing the issuance of bonds for specific purposes, to be paid by taxes levied within certain specified tax districts created by the acts in question. These amendments to the organic laws of the city were held to be continued in force in express terms, under the provisions of section 166 of the Constitution.

Construing the section (158) as operative immediately upon the adoption of the constitution, the question is, Does the contract under consideration "authorize an indebtedness" on the part of the city of Hopkinsville "to an amount, including existing indebtedness, in the aggregate exceeding" five per centum on the taxable property of the city? The question is wholly new to the law of our state; but the constitutions of a number of the other states contain provisions similar to the one under consideration, and the answers given by their various courts to the question indicated are by no means harmonious. It is to be remembered that the annual rentals are to be met out of the annual revenues without any increase of the tax rate of 75 cents on the $100 of taxable property, and that as the contractor, Martin, furnishes the water and light, and thus earns the money, he is paid therefor. The appellees therefore contend that the liability is thus extinguished as soon as it comes into existence. They contend that "when liabilities are created, and appropriations are made, which are within the limits of the revenue accruing to meet them, they are not debts, within the meaning of the prohibition of the constitution." The cases relied on by them sustain their contention that revenues may be disposed of in advance of their receipt,—hypothecated, as it were, as if already in the treasury, and when such an appropriation will meet and discharge the obligation, which is but a contingent one, no indebtedness is created, in the meaning of the constitution. We suppose, however, that, if the words used in the constitution are to be given their usual and commonly accepted meaning by the contract in question the city does "incur an indebtedness," in the sense these terms are used in the constitution; and that this indebtedness is in excess of the limitation imposed is apparent.

Turning to some of the decisions in states with constitutional provisions similar to ours, we find the Illinois supreme court, in Springfield v. Edwards, 84 Ill. 626, thus discussing the question: "It is provided by section 12, article 9, of the present Constitution that 'no county, city, township, school district, or other municipal corporation shall be allowed to become indebted, in any manner or for any purpose, to an amount including existing indebtedness in the aggregate exceeding five per centum on the value of the taxable property therein, to be ascertained by the last assessment,' etc. . . . The prohibition is against becoming indebted—that is, voluntarily incurring a legal liability to pay in any manner, or for any purpose—when a given amount of indebtedness has previously been incurred. It could hardly be probable that any two individuals of average intelligence could understand this language differently. It is clear and precise, and there is no reason to believe the convention did not intend what the words convey. A debt payable in the future is obviously no less a debt than if payable presently; and a debt payable upon a contingency, as upon the happening of some event, such as the rendering of service or the delivery of property, etc., is some kind of a debt, and therefore within the prohibition. If a contract or undertaking contemplates, in any contingency, a liability to pay when the contingency occurs, the liability is absolute,—the debt exists, and it differs from a present unqualified promise to pay only in the manner by which the indebtedness was incurred; and, since the purpose of the debt is expressly excluded from consideration, it can make no difference whether the debt be for necessary current expenses or for something else." In Culbertson v. Fulton, 127 Ill. 80, in discussing a contract for constructing a system of waterworks to be paid for in the future, the court said: "By entering into the contract of August 15, 1887, the city 'became indebted.' The obligation entered into by the terms of the contract constituted such an indebtedness as is contemplated by the language of the constitution. It cannot be said that the indebtedness did not come into being until the work was completed and accepted by the city. The city bound itself to pay for the work when it should be completed, and could be compelled to so if this work should be done according to contract;" and the case of Springfield v. Edwards, supra, is referred to and approved. To the same effect are the cases in the same court, of Law v. People, 87 Ill. 385, and Prince v. Quincy, 105 Ill. 138, 44 Am. Rep. 785.

In the case of Sackett v. New Albany, 88 Ind. 473, 45 Am. Rep. 467, it was held that, where the constitution forbids a municipal corporation ever to become indebted beyond a certain amount, that sum may not be exceeded, even for necessary expenses. The contract was for the erection of fire-alarm strikers and signal boxes at the price of $3,325, when the limit imposed by the constitution had already been exceeded. The language of the constitution was similar to ours, and the court, by Chief Justice Niblack, after reviewing the decisions of the courts of Illinois and Iowa, said: "By 'indebtedness' in this connection we mean an agreement of some kind by the city to pay money where no suitable provision had been made for the prompt discharge of the obligation imposed by the agreement. It was obviously the intention of the legislature in submitting, and of the people in adopting, the thirteenth article of the constitution, to arbitrarily restrict the power of municipal corporations to contract debts to a limited per centum of the taxable property, and to require, when that limit of indebtedness has been reached, that such corporation shall be prepared to pay for whatever of value they may obtain, without the incurrence of any further indebtedness for any purpose whatever."

That there are cases in all these states upholding contracts similar to the one now under consideration must be admitted, and that the two classes of cases are not easily, if at all, reconcilable, is evident. We have adopted the view in accord with the spirit of our constitution as we understand it, and as we think also in accord with better reason. Any other doctrine opens the door to all the mischief intended to be inhibited by the constitution. A fair illustration of the doctrine contended for by the appellees is given in the case of Dively v. Cedar Falls, 27 Iowa, 232, relied on by them, where it is held that "if A. should undertake to build a court-house within three years, doing so much, and to be paid accordingly, each year, the obligation of the contract would arise when executed; but the indebtedness under the constitution (if there were none other) would be measured by that to be paid each year." It seems to us that such a construction of the constitution would render the limitations in question wholly nugatory. It is needless to notice any other of the alleged reasons urged against upholding the contract, as the views here announced are fatal to its validity.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to proceed according to the principles announced in this opinion.

v.

George Just BROWN et al., Appts.

STATE of South Carolina, Appt.,

v.

Thomas FAGAN et al.

And Four Other Cases.

(.....S. C.....)

1. The police power of the state does not extend to the entire prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors by private individuals, and the giving of a monopoly of such business to the state, without any attempt to restrict or discourage such sales.
3. The state cannot embark in any trade which involves the purchase and sale of any article of commerce for profit, even in the absence of any express provision in the constitution against it.

3. A statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors by any private individual and vesting in the state the exclusive right to manufacture and sell such liquors violates the provisions of the South Carolina Constitution, arts. 1 and 14, guaranteeing all men the rights of "acquiring, possessing, and protecting property," and providing that no person shall be "deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges . . . or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land."
4. An injunction is a proper remedy on behalf of taxpayers to prevent the use of public funds in a business under an unconstitutional statute.

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Darlington

NOTE.—The difficulty of preserving the true line between the rights of the individual and those of the public is well illustrated by the opinions in the above case. The evil of unrestrained traffic in intoxicating liquors and the need of a remedy are recognized in both opinions. But the difference of opinion seems to arise about the kind of remedy. It is to be regretted that the element of novelty could not be eliminated from the remedy stricken down in this case, that the reasoning of the majority opinion might not have so large an advantage as is given by want of precedent. See in connection with the above case the somewhat analogous one of Kippe v. Becker (Minn.) 23 L. R. A. 357.

County in favor of complainants in a suit brought to enjoin the carrying into effect of the Dispensary Act of 1893. Affirmed.

APP^{EAL} by the state from a judgment of the Court of General Sessions for Richland County in favor of defendants in an indictment for selling intoxicating liquors in violation of the Dispensary Act. Affirmed.

The complaint in the injunction case alleged that the complainants were freehold voters and taxpayers of the town of Darlington, who sued on behalf of themselves and other taxpayers similarly situated; that the general assembly had recently passed the dispensary act; that such act was unconstitutional, in violation of article 1, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, and of articles 5 and 7 of the Amendments; also in violation of article 1, sections 11 and 14, and article 9, sections 1 and 4, of the Constitution of South Carolina, and also was repugnant to the Constitution of South Carolina in attempting to reserve to the state the right to trade in intoxicating liquors to the exclusion of its citizens. That under this act Brown, Kirven, and Carter had been appointed the county board of control for Darlington county, and that the board met and appointed a day for receiving applications for county dispenser. That defendant John Buckner Floyd filed a petition for appointment, and that thereafter the board met and appointed Floyd. The complaint then alleged that Floyd's bond was not sufficient; that he did not have a majority of the freeholders of the town upon his petition, and asked for an injunction.

Floyd's petition was as follows:

"The State of South Carolina, Darlington County. To the County Board of Control: The undersigned, J. B. Floyd, respectfully petitions; for appointment as a dispenser at Darlington, in Darlington county. He resides in Darlington, has been engaged in business two years prior to this application as a student at the University of North Carolina, real estate agent, clerk in a lawyer's office, and clerk for his father, John Floyd, trial justice. He is a citizen of the United States and of South Carolina, has never been adjudged guilty of violating the law relating to intoxicating liquors, he is not a licensed druggist, keeper of an hotel, eating house, saloon, restaurant, or place of public amusement, and he is not addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. Dated at Darlington, S. C., this 7th day of June, 1893. J. B. Floyd.

"Sworn to before me this 7th day of June, 1893. [Seal.] John Floyd, Trial Justice.

"The State of South Carolina, County of Darlington. To the Honorable W. P. Carter, G. J. Brown, and J. O. A. Moore, constituting the county board of control for the county and state aforesaid, under an Act entitled 'An Act to Prohibit the Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors as a Beverage within This State, except as is hereinafter Provided,' approved December 24th, A. D. 1892. The petition of John Buckner Floyd shows to your honorable body that he is an applicant for the position of county dispenser, under and by virtue of the said act, in and for the county and state aforesaid, and hereby prays your honorable body to issue to him a permit to keep and sell intoxicating liquors, as in said act provided, at Darlington court-house, in said county and state; that your petitioner's name is John Buckner Floyd; that he resides with his father, John Floyd, at Darlington court-house, S. C.; that his present business or employment is as clerk in the office of the said father, who is trial justice for Darlington county, located at the town of Darlington, and that his employment for the past two years he was a student at the University of North Carolina, and for the rest of the time either as a clerk in a lawyer's office or as a real-estate agent and collector in the town of Darlington; that he is twenty-three years of age, and a citizen of the United States and South Carolina; that he has never been adjudged guilty of violating the law relating to intoxicating liquors, and is not a licensed druggist, a keeper of an hotel, eating house, saloon, restaurant, or place of public amusement; and that he is not addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; and your petitioner will ever pray, and so forth.

"The State of South Carolina, County of Darlington. Personally appears John Buckner Floyd, who, first being duly sworn, says that the allegations contained in the foregoing petition are true. J. B. Floyd.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this 7th day of March, A. D. 1893. [Seal.] John Floyd, Trial Justice."

The petition signed by the voters of the county was as follows:

"Exhibit A.

"B" "The State of South Carolina, County of Darlington. To the Honorable W. P. Carter, Geo. J. Brown, and J. O. A. Moore, constituting the county board of control for the county and state aforesaid, under an Act entitled 'An Act to Prohibit the Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors as a Beverage within This State, except as herein Provided,' and approved December 24th, 1892: The petition of the undersigned respectfully shows to your honorable body that they are freeholders and voters of the town of Darlington within the corporate limits of the town of Darlington, said state; that it has been brought to their attention that John Buckner Floyd has made application to your honorable body for a permit as county dispenser, authorizing him to keep and sell intoxicating liquors at Darlington court-house, S. C., as provided for in the above-stated act of the general assembly of said state, and that they hereby approve his application, and request his appointment as such dispenser; that they are informed and believe that the said John Buckner Floyd resides with his father, John Floyd, at Darlington, in said county and state; that his present business and employment is that of clerk in the office of his father, who is a trial justice for Darlington county, located in the town of Darlington; that his employment for the two years past has been a student at the University of North Carolina, the rest of the time either as a clerk in a lawyer's office or real-estate agent and collector in the town of Darlington; that he is twenty-three years of age, and a citizen of the United States and of the state of South Carolina; that he has never been adjudged guilty of violation of the law relating to intoxicating liquors; that he is not a licensed druggist, a keeper of an hotel, eating house, saloon, restaurant, or place of public amusement, and that he is not addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage; that each of us for himself hereby states that before signing this petition he has read the same, understands the contents and meaning thereof, and is well and personally acquainted with the said John Buckner Floyd. C. S. Nettles" and seventy-nine others.

Floyd filed a separate answer, as did also the board of control.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. R. W. Boyd, for appellant:

The judge said that taxpayers had a perfect right to come, in their own names, into the court on its equity side, and prevent the establishment of a dispensary, if the act be unconstitutional. It is true that an unconstitutional act will be treated as void, and so declared, as against the rights of an individual; but to justify the court in acting, the individual must allege, and show, that the act contravenes some special individual right of his.

State v. Gathers, 15 S. C. 372; Illinois & St. L. R. & Canal Co. v. St. Louis, 2 Dill. 70; Spencer v. McConnell, 1 McLean, 337.

So for an individual to enjoin in equity the operation of an unconstitutional statute, he must allege irreparable special injury to himself. Nor will it do for him simply to allege such damage; he must show the facts upon which he predicates such allegation.

Illinois & St. L. R. & Canal Co. v. St. Louis, supra; High, Inj. § 34; South Carolina S. B. Co. v. South Carolina R. Co. 4 L. R. A. 209, 80 S. C. 545.

An apparent exception to the rule occurs where taxpayers of a municipal corporation seek to restrain the corporation from illegal action, likely to increase their taxes.

Mauldin v. Greenville, 8 L. R. A. 291, 33 S. C. 19.

The exception is only apparent; the case is really in strict accord with the rule.

Neumeyer v. Missouri & M. R. Co. 52 Mo. 81, 14 Am. Rep. 399.

If we eliminate the attack on the constitutionality of the act, what remains of the action questions the title to his office of a public officer, and seeks to set aside and prohibit the action and judgment of a quasi judicial tribunal, in a matter entrusted to their judgment and discretion.

A statutory enactment will not be declared unconstitutional, and therefore void, unless a clear and substantial conflict exist between it and the constitution.

People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389.

Legislation by a state, prohibiting the manufacture within her limits of intoxicating liquors, to be there sold or bartered for general use as a beverage, does not necessarily infringe any right, privilege, or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States.

Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 628, 31 L. ed. 205.

The first ten amendments to the Constitution of the United States were not intended to limit the powers of the states in respect of their own people, but to operate on the federal government only.

McElwaine v. Brush, 142 U. S. 155, 35 L. ed. 971.

With these exclusions, the question for discussion is, whether a state can, as a police measure, prohibit its citizens from the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors and undertake itself the business of purchasing and selling such liquors within its borders.

Mugler v. Kansas, supra.

The first inquiry is whether the act, in its dispensary provisions, is a mere pretense as a police measure, and has no real or substantial relation to the police purposes for the accomplishment of which it professes to have been enacted. In making this inquiry we must bear in mind what is also said in Mugler v. Kansas, infra, that when the question is as to the exercise of its police power by the state, "the power to determine such question so as to bind all must exist somewhere, else society will be at the mercy of the few who, regarding only their own appetites and passions, may be willing to imperil the peace and security of the many, provided only they are permitted to do as they please. Under our system that power is lodged with the legislative branch of the government.

Cooley, Const. Lim. *201.

Looking to the provisions of the act, it is manifest that these provisions are likely to be conducive to the end to an unusual extent.

The people, acting through the legislature, have the right to pass all measures within the fundamental limits of legislation and not prohibited by the constitutions, state and national.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 178.

This theory of legislative power under a state government has been time and again declared to be the correct theory by the courts of last resort in this state.

State v. Hutson, 1 McCord, L. 242; State v. Williams, 2 McCord, L. 801; Pelzer v. Campbell, 15 S. C. 502, 40 Am. Rep. 705; Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 142, 62 Am. Dec. 625; Potter's Dwarrr. Stat. 60-65; Cooley, Const. Lim. §§ 87-173; Pine Grove Twp. v. Talcott, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 673, 23 L. ed. 232.

A large power in the selection of approprivate means for the accomplishment of governmental purposes is necessary to enable the legislature to adapt the laws to the ever varying needs and conditions of the people.

McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579.

The object of a written constitution is to fix the fundamental principles and limit the powers of government and not to legislate on mere details. It is fixed in its nature and therefore unsuited to contain the laws which from time to time are made necessary by the ever-changing necessities and wishes of the people.

Ex parte Lynch, 16 S. C. 34.

Every possible presumption is in favor of the validity of a statute, and this continues until the contrary is shown beyond a reasonable doubt.

Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 718, 25 L. ed. 501.

Any legislative act which does not encroach upon the powers apportioned to the other departments of the government, being prima facie valid, must be enforced, unless restrictions upon the legislative authority can be pointed out in the constitution, and the case shown to come within them.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 168.

The court has nothing to do with the motives and discretion of the legislature within its legitimate limits.

Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 679, 32 L. ed. 254; State v. Wheeler, 25 Conn. 297.

The general assembly has the general power of legislation upon all subjects not prohibited by the constitution.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 87-172.

Not only is there no constitutional inhibition, but it is the duty of the government to undertake a business theretofore left to and monopolized by private enterprise when the common good so requires.

Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, 318; State v. Brennan's Liquors, 25 Conn. 278.

In its prohibitory features, through which it alone materially affects the liberty and property of the citizens, the act is admittedly constitutional and in perfect accord with a line of authorities running back to a very early period in the history of the jurisprudence of the state.

Heisembrittle v. Charleston, 2 McMull. L. 236; Charleston v. Ahrens, 4 Strobb. L. 257; Stark v. McGowan, 1 Nott & McC. 387; State v. Gaillard, 11 S. C. 312; State v. Berlin, 21 S. C. 295, 53 Am. Rep. 677.

With such restrictions of legislative power as exist outside of the constitution, the judiciary can rarely, if ever, be called upon to concern itself.

Cooley, Const. Lim. § 129.

But it is contended that the introduction of section 41, article 1, into the Constitution of 1868, changed the whole theory of the state government of South Carolina, struck down its sovereignty, and make it like the general government, a government of granted and enumerated powers; so that, in this debate, it is for us to show that the dispensary act comes within the grant of legislative power, and not for our opponents to show that the act is in violation of some prohibition of the constitution, expressed or implied. If this be so, it is 23 L. R. A.

passing strange that so radical and revolutionary a change has remained unnoticed until this late day. This court has not only been unaware of the change, but has, time and again, declared that the government of this state is as sovereign as that of any one of her sister states, and that it is possessed of full legislative power, except in so far as that power is limited by constitutional prohibitions, express or implied.

Pelzer v. Campbell, 15 S. C. 593, 40 Am. Rep. 705; Ex parte Lynch, 16 S. C. 35; Columbia & G. R. Co. v. Gibbs, 24 S. C. 60.

The question, however, is of very little practical importance, in view of the admitted fact that the legislature is vested with full legislative power, except as restricted by constitutional limitations. The court, in construing it, will look first to the whole instrument, and will not permit a single clause to defeat its whole nature and design.

Southern Pac. R. Co. v. Orton, 6 Sawy. 157.

The right to pursue a business, and the right to acquire and hold property, are rights subject to the necessities of civil government.

Re Ferrier, 103 Ill. 367, 42 Am. Rep. 18.

Our Constitution, art. 1, § 36, says: "Each individual of society has the right to be protected in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property according to standing laws." In Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 387, the town council of Walterboro was held justified, as a police measure, in having hogs running at large in the streets, seized and sold by the marshal.

Summerville v. Prossley, 8 L. R. A. 354, 33 S. C. 63.

It is not only within its power, but it is the duty, of the state, to undertake a business called for by the needs of the people, where it cannot, consistently with the public welfare, be left to the voluntary efforts of individuals.

Granted that the purpose is good and constitutional, the court has no right to pass upon the necessity and propriety of the use of such extraordinary means.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77.

In State v. Brennan's Liquors, 25 Conn. 278, the court, referring to the propriety of legislation as a police regulation of evils, said: "Courts of justice have nothing to do with them, other than to discharge their legitimate duties in carrying into execution such laws as the legislature may establish, unless, indeed, they find that the legislature in making a particular law, has disregarded the restraints imposed upon it by the constitution of this state or of the United States."

Messrs. Oamund W. Buchanan, Atty-Gen., J. M. Johnson and P. H. Nelson also for appellants.

Mr. C. A. Woods, for respondents:

Judge Field says, in Slaughter-House Cases, 83 U. S. 111, 21 L. ed. 419: "The state may prescribe such regulations for every pursuit and calling of life as will promote the public health, secure the good order, and advance the general prosperity of society, but when once prescribed, the pursuit or calling must be free to be followed by every citizen who is within the conditions designated and will conform to the regulations. This is the fundamental idea upon which our institutions rest; and unless adhered to in the legislation of the country our government will be a republic only in name."

All license laws and all these regulations are based upon the idea, that while the traffic in spirits should not be denied to the citizens, yet it is so dangerous that safeguards should be thrown around it, and restrictions put upon it, neutralizing as far as possible its evil effects.

These laws cannot be sustained upon the ground that the traffic in itself is a nuisance; for if it be a nuisance, in the legal acceptance of the term, then the state must abate and destroy it, and not recognize or legalize it. The state may prohibit absolutely the sale of liquor, and this is based upon the idea that the sale of liquor is in itself a nuisance, and that no citizen has any natural right reserved from under the constitution or the law to engage in it.

These two theories do not stand together; the state cannot prohibit the sale by all of its citizens, except one, and grant him the exclusive privilege to sell, for the legislature cannot deny to its citizens the privilege of selling liquors, on the ground that it is an evil, and, therefore, there can be no personal right to engage in the trade, and at the same time allow to any one citizen the exclusive privilege of maintaining such nuisances.

Hudson v. Thorne, 7 Paige, 261, 4 L. ed. 148; Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 208.

This act is contrary to all governmental precedents in this country.

In discussing whether a tax was levied for a private or public purpose, Justice Miller says, in determining the question: "The courts must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether state or municipal."

Citizens Sav. & L. Asso. of Cleveland, Ohio v. Topeka, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 655, 23 L. ed. 455.

The enumeration of rights in this Constitution shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people.

Art. 1, § 41.

The general propositions laid down by the authorities must be modified in passing upon the statutes of this state, to the extent, at least, of sustaining the following propositions: (1) The legislature of this state may exercise the full legislative function of government, but it cannot extend and widen those functions to an extent not expressed or necessarily implied in the constitution, and it follows as a conclusion from this proposition that it cannot engage the state in trade, which is not a function of government at all, and certainly could not be claimed to be a necessary or even a usual function of government. No similar effort has ever been made in this country before, except once in the state of Indiana, and the statute was not held constitutional.

Herman v. State, 8 Ind. 545.

(2) In passing on the constitutionality of the statute, this section of the constitution shifts the burden which usually rests upon those who deny the constitutionality of the statute to those who affirm it, and requires them to show the authority of the legislature, expressed or necessarily implied in the constitution, to take from the people a business and confer upon the state a monopoly.

When, in addition to this, we find that the Constitution of 1868, in article 1, section 41, expressly declares that "the enumeration of rights in this constitution shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people," we think there can be no doubt that even in the absence of any express restriction upon the taxing power of the legislature, such power can only be exercised for some public purpose, and that whenever it is attempted to be exercised for a private purpose, it is the duty of the courts to declare such legislation void.

Feldman v. Charleston, 23 S. C. 68, 55 Am. Rep. 6.

This constitutional provision means, the legislature may exercise the usual and commonly understood functions of legislation, but may not take to itself or the state, and deny to the citizen, that which has been regarded in all the history of the English law outside of the scope of governmental activity, and peculiarly within the sphere of individual enterprise and endeavor.

So far from such a creation being the exercise of a legislative function, as understood in this republic, it is an effort upon the part of the legislature to add to the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the government a commercial department involving the state in all the perils of trade.

Adam Smith says: "No two characters seem more inconsistent than those of trader and sovereign."

Wealth of Nations, 646.

Experience proves that the depositories of power who are mere delegates of the people—that is, of a majority—are quite as ready (when they think they can count on popular support) as any organs of oligarchy, to assume arbitrary power and encroach unduly on the liberty of private life.

The present civilization tends so strongly to make the power of persons acting in masses the only substantial power in society that there never was more necessity for surrounding individual independence of thought, speech, and conduct with the most powerful defenses in order to maintain that originality of mind, and individuality of character, which are the only source of any real progress, and of most of the qualities which make the human race much superior to any herd of animals.

Hence it is no less important in a democratic than in any other government that all tendency on the part of public authorities to stretch their interference and assume a power of any sort which can easily be dispensed with, should be regarded with unremitting jealousy.

Mills, Political Economy, 561-563.

These ideas of the functions of government in a free country are held in England, though they are not enforceable as law, because an act of parliament, as Blackstone says, "is the exercise of the highest authority that the kingdom acknowledges upon earth." Even then, such judges as Coke, Hobart, and Holt held that an act of parliament must, notwithstanding, be declared void, when contrary to common right and reason.

It has always been found impossible to fix the limits of legislative power by a constitutional article.

It has been decided many times in this state and others that a municipal corporation cannot, even under express authority conferred by an act of the legislature, engage in a business venture of any kind, either directly or by loaning its credit or money to an individual, for the purpose of increasing the prosperity of such town, and that the courts, and not the legislature, must ultimately determine what is a public purpose.

Allen v. Jay, 60 Me. 124, 11 Am. Rep. 185; State v. Osawkee Twp. 14 Kan. 419, 19 Am. Rep. 99; Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39; Weisner v. Douglas, 64 N. Y. 91, 21 Am. Rep. 586.

Trade is not appropriate to government but is an appropriate occupation of the people; and it is not a function of the government, but a right of the citizen; the citizen may be prohibited from exercising it, when it is in itself injurious to the people, but the government cannot prohibit the citizen, and monopolize the trade to itself. The courts, and not the legislature, must determine whether these views of the legislative function be correct.

Mr. J. P. K. Bryan, also for respondents:

This act is unconstitutional in the main principle thereof, in that it provides for the conduct of the whole business of liquor dealing in the state of South Carolina by and through the state commissioners, agents, and employes. In other words, it puts the state into the liquor trade, and the same with its business risks and revenues is assumed by the state, wholly and exclusively conducted by the state with the public funds of the public treasury, and through officers, agents, and employes paid by the state out of the public treasury.

The right to trade, the commercial power, is nowhere delegated in the constitution, and is reserved by the people.

The affirmative system and the specific enumeration of the constitution imply a limit to the power of the legislature, and the legislature had no power to go further than the constitution had provided.

Duncan v. Barnett, 11 S. C. 337, 32 Am. Rep. 476.

For the government to seize on a trade and monopolize it is an invasion of the right of the citizen.

Say, Political Economy, p. 103.

The character of sovereign and trader is inconsistent.

3 Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, 857.

Under the Declaration of Independence, one of the enumerated rights was the "trade" of the subject; and one of the enumerated grievances was "the cutting off of our trade with the world."

This question as to whether a state has the right to monopolize and engage in a trade, where it is denied to the individual, has occurred only once in the history of this country, and it was when the state of Indiana attempted to do with the liquor trade exactly what the state of South Carolina has, by its legislature, attempted to do in this case, that is, to engage in and monopolize the business, and conduct it with the public funds, through its officers and agents, taking its profits for the state, county, and city. And this attempt was decided by the supreme court of Indiana as unconstitutional, null, and void.

See Bebe v. State, 6 Ind. 501, 63 Am. Dec. 891.

The state cannot go into trade because it is opposed further to the whole system of "finance and taxation," as set forth in article 9 of the Constitution, which is the financial policy of the state, and which has adopted taxation as the affirmative system of raising the revenue and meeting the burdens and expenses of government.

The state legislature cannot divert public funds by making advances to the county dispenser to buy and sell liquors, such advances to be regarded as loans, to be refunded out of the profits.

See Dispensary Act, § 18.

And this is an unconstitutional diversion of public funds.

McIver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These cases all arise under an Act entitled "An Act to Prohibit the Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors, as a Beverage, within This State except as herein Provided," approved 24th of December, 1893 (31 Stat. at. L. 62), and were, therefore, heard and will be considered together; for, while there are certain subordinate questions presented in some of the cases which do not arise in others, yet they all present the question of the constitutionality of the act. To that question, as one of overshadowing importance, we propose first to direct our attention. Before doing so, however, it may be proper to state that just before the commencement of the argument the attorney-general, deeming it due to the court so to do, presented a suggestion in writing, calling the attention of the court to the fact that at the recent session of the general assembly (1893) another act on the same subject had been passed, which might possibly be regarded as repealing or superseding the Act of 1892, under which these cases arise, and, if so, might deprive the questions presented in these cases of any practical character, leaving them only as speculative questions, which the court might not be willing to hear. But, as no motion to dismiss the appeals was made, and no application on the part of the counsel for the state to abandon the appeals upon any such grounds was presented, this court will not, of its own motion, decline to hear the cases, but, on the contrary, will assume, for the purpose of this discussion, that these cases are not in any way affected by the passage of the Act of 1893, but do present practical questions which this court is bound to decide. Recurring, then, to the question of the constitutionality of the act, it may be as well to say in the outset that we freely concede that the presumption is always in favor of the constitutionality of an act of the legislature; and hence, as is said by Shaw, Ch. J., in Ex parte Wellington, 16 Pick. 95, 26 Am. Dec. 681, referred to with approval by Judge Cooley in his great work on Constitutional Limitations, at page 182 of the second edition (which it may be well to say here is the edition referred to throughout this opinion): "When courts are called upon to pronounce the invalidity of an act of legislation, passed with all the forms and ceremonies requisite to give it the force of law, they will approach the question with great caution, examine it in every possible aspect, and ponder upon it as long as deliberation and patient attention can throw any new light on the subject, and never declare a statute void unless the nullity and invalidity of the act are placed, in their judgment, beyond reasonable doubt." A reasonable doubt must be solved in favor of the legislative action, and the act be sustained. Or, as was said by Marshall, Ch. J., in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 128, 8 L. ed. 175, likewise quoted with approval by Judge Cooley, in the same connection: "The question whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution is at all times a question of much delicacy which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled by duty to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station could it be unmindful of the solemn obligation which that station imposes; but it is not on slight implications and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered as void. The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." These views have been fully recognized in this state, as is most fully, clearly, and forcibly set forth by Mr. Justice McGowan in Ex parte Lynch, 16 S. C. 32, and have been approved in many other cases. We also freely concede that in considering the question whether an act of the general assembly of this state is in conflict with the constitution, either state or federal, the inquiry is whether there is anything in either of those instruments forbidding the passage of such an act, either in express terms or by necessary implication; whereas, in considering the question of the constitutionality of an act of congress, the inquiry is whether there is anything in the Federal Constitution which, either in express terms or by necessary implication, confers upon congress the power to pass the act in question.

Fully impressed with these conceded principles, we approach the consideration of the question whether the Act of the 24th of December 1892, which for convenience will be designated throughout this discussion as the "Dispensary Act," is in conflict with any constitutional provision, either state or federal. In considering this question the first inquiry which naturally presents itself is, What are the general nature, scope, and objects of the act, as disclosed by its terms? Without going into a detailed consideration of the numerous sections of the act, we think it is safe to say that it is an act forbidding the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, within the limits of this state, by any private individual, and vesting the right to manufacture and sell such liquors in the state exclusively, through certain designated officers and agents. (We may say here that in the further discussion of this subject we will drop the word "manufacture" and speak only of the sale or keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. Not only for convenience of phraseology, but for the better reason that in none of these cases which we are called upon to decide does the question of the manufacture of intoxicating liquors arise, but they all relate to the sale or keeping for sale of such liquors). It seems to us that the view which we have presented as to the nature, scope, and object of the act is manifest, not only from the title of the act, but also from the provisions found in almost every section. The title declares it to be "an act to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors, except as herein provided," and the various sections show beyond dispute that the only exception made is the state, which is expressly authorized to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors for any purpose whatsoever, either as a beverage or otherwise. Indeed, the body of the act goes further than the title, for, while the language used in the title seems to indicate that the purpose of the act was only to forbid the sale of intoxicating liquors "as a beverage," yet in the body of the act it is very manifest that a sale of such liquors for any purpose, and not simply "as a beverage," is forbidden, except when made by the state, through certain designated officers and agents. Licensed druggists must buy such intoxicating liquors as may be necessary in compounding their medicines and tinctures only from the designated agents of the state. Even wine for sacramental purposes can only be bought from such agents. In other words, the manifest object of the act is that the state shall monopolize the entire traffic in intoxicating liquors, to the entire exclusion of all persons whomsoever, and this, too, for the purpose of profit to the state and its governmental agencies, counties, and municipal corporations; for the act, after appropriating the sum of $50,000 from the state treasury for the purpose of purchasing a supply of liquors with which to begin the business, provides that the liquors so purchased by the state commissioner shall be sold by him to the various county dispensers, at a profit not exceeding 50 per centum of the net cost thereof, and that the proceeds of such sales shall be paid into the state treasury, upon which the commissioner may draw from time to time to the amounts necessary to meet the expenses incurred in conducting the business; and also provides that the county dispensers may sell such liquors to consumers at a profit not exceeding 50 per centum above the cost thereof, except in sales to licensed druggists, where the profit is limited to 10 per centum, and that all profits, after paying the expenses of such dispensary, shall be divided equally between the county and the municipal corporation within which such dispensary is located. It is also provided that the state commissioner may sell intoxicating liquors so purchased by him to persons outside of the state.

This being the nature, scope, and object of the dispensary act, our next inquiry is whether it conflicts with any provision of our state constitution. There are at least two of the provisions of that instrument with which the dispensary act conflicts. The first section of the first article of the constitution reads as follows: "All men are born free and equal, endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are the rights of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties, of acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness." And in section 14 of the same article it is explicitly declared that "no person shall be . . . despoiled or dispossessed of his property, immunities, or privileges, . . . or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." Here, then, we have not only an explicit declaration that every person in this commonwealth has certain rights, derived, not from the government, but from the Creator, which are declared to be inalienable, but also an expressed declaration that he shall not be deprived of them except in one of two ways: First, by the judgment of his peers; or, second, by the law of the land. So sacred was this right of property regarded that the framers of the constitution, not content with the general provisions above referred to, declaring the right and forbidding an interference with such right, proceeded in the twelfth section of the first article to declare explicitly that "no person shall be . . . prevented from acquiring, holding, and transmitting property." Now, then, what are these inalienable rights of personal liberty and private property thus emphatically asserted and carefully guarded, and what do they necessarily involve? As is said by Earl, J., in Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 686: "The constitutional guaranty that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law may be violated without the physical taking of property for public or private use. Property may be destroyed, or its value may be annihilated. It is owned and kept for some useful purpose, and it has no value unless it can be used. Its capability for enjoyment and adaptability to some use are essential characteristics and attributes, without which property cannot be conceived; and hence any law which destroys it or its value, or takes away any of its essential attributes, deprives the owner of his property. The constitutional guaranty would be of little worth if the legislature could, without compensation, destroy property or its value, deprive the owner of its use, deny him the right to live in his own house, or to work at any lawful trade therein." Blackstone (in 1 Com. 138) says: "The third absolute right inherent in every Englishman is that of property, which consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution save only by the laws of the land." To the same effect, see what is said by Miller, J., in Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co., 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 177, 178, 20 L. ed. 560, also what is said by Comstock, J., in Wynehamer v. People, 18 N. Y. 398, and also by Andrews, J., in People v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48. See, also, what is said by the same judge in Bertholf v. O'Reilly, 74 N. Y. 509, 80 Am. Rep. 328.

Again, it is said in the case of Re Jacobs, supra: "So, too, one may be deprived of his liberty, and his constitutional rights thereto violated, without the actual imprisonment or restraint of his person. Liberty, in its broad sense, as understood in this country, means the right not only of freedom from actual servitude, imprisonment, or restraint, but the right of one to use his faculties in all lawful ways, to live and work where he will, to earn his livelihood in any lawful calling, and to pursue any lawful trade or vocation." See also, to the same effect, what is said by Mr. Justice Field in his concurring opinion in the case of Butchers' Union, S. H. & L. S. L. Co. v. Crescent City, L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 111 U. S. 756, 757, 28 L. ed. 591; and what is said by Mr. Justice Bradley in his concurring opinion in the same case, in which he was joined by Mr. Justice Harlan and Mr. Justice Woods (page 764, 111 U. S. and page 589, 28 L. ed.); and as was said in Livestock, D. & B. Assn. v. Crescent City, L. S. L. & S. H. Co. 1 Abb. U. S. 388, 398, Fed. Cas. No. 8,408. "There is no more sacred right of citizenship than the right to pursue unmolested a lawful employment in a lawful manner. It is nothing more nor less than the sacred right of labor." If, then, it can be shown that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is not in itself unlawful, but, on the contrary, that intoxicating liquor is a lawful subject of commerce, then it follows from what has been said that the dispensary act, in so far as it undertakes to forbid every person in this state from engaging in such traffic, conflicts with the above-mentioned constitutional provisions, and is therefore null and void, unless such legislation can be defended as an exercise of what is known as the "police power,"—a question which will be hereinafter considered. We do not see how it can be denied that such a traffic is lawful. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, at pages 583, 584, says in express terms that it is lawful, and every one of the numerous cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, involving questions whether state legislation designed to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors is affected by the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, necessarily implies that intoxicating liquor is a subject of lawful commerce, for otherwise such questions could not arise. It was only upon this ground that the decision in the case of Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 86, was or could be defended. There the question was whether such liquor, imported into the state of Iowa from the state of Illinois, could be lawfully sold, in the unbroken packages in which they were imported, within the limits of the state of Iowa, and the court held that, notwithstanding the stringent provisions of the Iowa prohibitory law, such liquors could be sold by the importer, as long as the original packages remained in his hands unbroken; and that the Iowa statute, in so far as it purported to forbid such a sale, was in conflict with that clause of the United States Constitution conferring upon congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign states and between the several states. In that case Fuller, Ch. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, cites with approval certain language used by Mr. Justice Matthews in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 323, involving the same principle, where he draws a distinction between articles not in a merchantable condition, and therefore not legitimate subjects of commerce,—for example, rags likely to spread infectious diseases,—and other articles which are the legitimate subjects of commerce, among which intoxicating liquors must have been classed, or the decision could not possibly have been what it was. Even in the case of Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 558, 35 L. ed. 574, Fuller, Ch. J., recognizes the same doctrine, although that case arose after the passage of what is commonly known as the "Wilson Bill," which was doubtless passed with a view to obviate the effect of the decision in Leisy v. Hardin, supra. Indeed, the whole course of legislation, both state and federal, demonstrates that the sale of intoxicating liquors is a legitimate subject of commerce and trade; for otherwise it would be absolutely impossible to vindicate the United States internal revenue law, and the very numerous statutes which have been passed in this state ever since the foundation of the government permitting the sale of intoxicating liquors, under such regulations as the lawmaking power may have from time to time deemed necessary, either to secure a revenue from such traffic, or to surround it with such restrictions as have been thought necessary or expedient to prevent evils apt to grow out of such traffic. To say, therefore, that the sale of intoxicating liquors belongs to that class of wrongs denominated as "mala in se," would be to cast a grave imputation upon the lawmaking department of the government, both state and federal; and this we are very far from being willing to do. Indeed, the very highest of all authority might be cited to show that the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors is not malum in se. Indeed, the most ardent prohibitionists, so far as their wishes have taken the shape of law, must be regarded as admitting the proposition for which we contend; for every prohibition law which has fallen under our notice contains provisions recognizing this proposition by excepting from its operation sales of liquors for certain purposes, namely, medical, scientific, mechanical, or sacramental purposes, thereby expressly admitting that the mere sale of intoxicating liquors is not only not wrong, but actually necessary or useful for certain purposes.

The very act now under consideration—the dispensary law—by its express terms shows beyond all dispute that the general assembly did not intend to put its seal of condemnation upon the sale of intoxicating liquors as morally wrong, or even as subversive of the public welfare, for it makes ample provision for the sale of such liquors to an unlimited extent for any purpose whatsoever, and makes specific provision for the sale of liquor in just such quantities as would suit all classes of consumers. Before, therefore, the sale of intoxicating liquors can be declared unlawful, there must be some valid statute declaring it to be so; and we must say that we have been unable to find any such statute on the statute books of this state. Of course, we can find many statutes forbidding such sale except upon certain prescribed conditions, but none making the sale absolutely unlawful, unless it be in certain specified localities, under what are called "local option laws," which are exceptional in their character, and need not be considered here. While, therefore, without permitting ourselves to indulge in any sentimental declamation as to the evils flowing from an unregulated and unrestricted traffic in intoxicating liquors, which, however appropriate elsewhere, we do not regard as becoming in a judicial opinion, we freely admit all that can properly be said on the subject, and therefore we fully concede the power on the part of the legislature to throw around such traffic all safeguards necessary and proper to prevent, or at least minimize, such evils; and while we may further admit, for the purposes of this discussion, that the legislature may go further, and absolutely prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within the limits of this state,—yet the practical question still remains whether the dispensary act falls within either of these classes. It does not seem to us possible to regard the dispensary act as a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. On the contrary, it not only permits, but absolutely encourages, such sale to an unlimited extent; for by its profit feature it holds out an inducement to every taxpayer to encourage as large sales as possible, and thereby lessen the burden of taxation to the extent of the profits realized. If the act, instead of confining the privilege of selling liquor to the state, had undertaken to confer such exclusive privilege upon one or more individuals, or upon a particular corporation, could there be any doubt that such an exercise of legislative power would be unconstitutional? We can see no difference in principle between the two cases. Even the Slaughter-House Cases, as they are called (88 U. S. 16 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 394), decided by a bare majority of the court, and which must be regarded as having gone to the extreme limit, did not go to the extent of holding that an act forbidding all other persons except the favored corporation from pursuing the lawful occupation of a butcher, or from carrying on any other lawful business or trade, would be constitutional, for the opinion of the majority of the court was rested expressly upon the ground that the act there in question did not forbid any person who might desire to do so from pursuing the avocation of a butcher, but only required him, as a measure of police regulation, to have his slaughtering done at a specified place, upon paying reasonable charges described by the act to the corporation for the use of the conveniences for that purpose, which such corporation was bound, under a heavy penalty, to furnish any one who desired to use them. It is very obvious, therefore, that the act there under consideration differed very widely from the act which we are now called upon to consider.

If, then, the dispensary act cannot be defended as a prohibitory law, it is contended that it may be sustained as a law regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors, under what is called the "police power," which, it is claimed, practically is unlimited in its scope by constitutional provisions; and its exercise depends solely upon the legislative will, which cannot be controlled or restricted by the judiciary. It seems to us that such a claim is not only utterly at variance with any just conception of a constitutional government, but is entirely inconsistent with the numerous cases in which the courts, both state and federal, have undertaken to limit and restrict the exercise of such a power by state legislation; and what is more to the point in this particular case our own court has distinctly repudiated the idea that the exercise of what is claimed to be the police power is beyond judicial control. In the case of McCandless v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 38 S. C. 103, 18 L. R. A. 440, Mr. Justice Pope, as the organ of the court, after referring to the fact that the circuit judge had held that the statute there in question was a valid exercise of the police power, uses this language: "But a careful consideration of the latest official declarations of this law by the Supreme Court of the United States has led us to modify our conceptions of what is involved in what is called the 'police power' of a state in this union of states. The fundamental idea in ascribing such potency to this principle of the law is based upon the immutable principles of self-defense." And upon this point of the case the court was unanimous, though there was a dissent upon another point. Indeed to hold that every act of the general assembly passed under the guise of an exercise of the police power, or sought to be defended upon that ground, is beyond judicial control, would render every guaranty of personal rights found in the constitution of little or no value. See, also, what is said by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case of Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 661, 31 L. ed. 210, where, after recognizing the existence of and the necessity for the police power, and after admitting that such power belongs to the legislative department of the government, he uses this language: "It belongs to that department to exert what are known as the 'police powers' of the state, and to determine primarily what measures are appropriate or needful for the protection of the public morals, the public health, or the public safety. It does not at all follow that every statute enacted ostensibly for the promotion of these ends is to be accepted as a legitimate exertion of the police powers of the state. There are, of necessity, limits, beyond which legislation cannot rightfully go. While every possible presumption is to be indulged in favor of the validity of a statute, Sinking Fund Cases, 99 U. S. 700, 25 L. ed. 496, the courts must obey the constitution, rather than the lawmaking department of government; and must, upon their own responsibility, determine whether, in any particular case, these limits have been passed. 'To what purpose,' it was said in Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60, 'are powers limited, and to what purpose is that limitation committed to writing, if these limits may at any time be passed by these intended to be restrained?' . . . The courts are not bound by mere forms, nor are they to be misled by mere pretenses. They are at liberty—indeed, are under a solemn duty—to look at the substance of things whenever they enter upon the inquiry whether the legislature has transcended the limits of its authority. If, therefore, a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relations to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge, and thereby give effect to the constitution. (Italics ours). See, also what was said by our own court in the case of Whaley v. Gaillard, 21 S. C. 578, where the same principle was applied to a totally different subject,—the limitation of the power of the legislature to contract a public debt. It seems to us, therefore, that it is not only our right, but our duty, to inquire whether the dispensary act was intended to be an exercise of the police power to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, and, if so, whether its terms have any real or substantial relation to that object.

Now, it is quite certain that the act does not, in terms, purport to be an act to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors by persons who may be engaged, or who may desire to engage, in such traffic. On the contrary, its declared purpose is to absolutely prohibit such sale by private individuals; and this is made more manifest by the numerous provisions found in the body of the act. Now, while the power of the legislature to enact such laws as may be deemed necessary and proper to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors by any person within the limits of the state, in order to prevent, or at least reduce as far as possible, the evils which are apt to flow from such a traffic, is conceded, yet we cannot regard the dispensary law as such an act. Indeed, it would be a contradiction in terms to speak of an act of such a character as this is as an act to regulate the sale of liquor by the people of the state, for it is difficult to see how an act forbidding a sale can be regarded as an act regulating such sale. That which is forbidden cannot well be regulated. But it may be said that the dispensary act, while forbidding all private persons to sell intoxicating liquors, does permit such sale to be made by the state itself, through its authorized officers and agents, and that these sales may be and are regulated by the numerous provisions of the dispensary act. But when it is remembered that all restrictions upon or regulations of sales of any lawful article of commerce can be vindicated only as an exercise of the police power, we do not see how such a view can be accepted. The police power can only be resorted to for the government and control of the people of the state, and cannot with any propriety be appealed to for the purpose of controlling the action of the state itself; and, as the state can only act through its authorized officers or agents, the police power cannot be resorted to for the purpose of controlling such officers and agents, if for no other reason, because it is wholly unnecessary, as the state has ample means of controlling its own officials, without resorting to the undefined, and therefore dangerous, power, known as the "police power." But, even if this view be not sound, and this provision of the dispensary act whereby the state assumes to itself the exclusive right to engage in the sale of intoxicating liquors, taking to itself and its subordinate governmental agencies the entire profits of such a traffic, to the utter exclusion of all private individuals, could, with any propriety, be regarded as a police regulation for the protection of the public health or public morals, there would still remain the question whether such an exercise of the police power was necessary to effect these important purposes; for, after all, the exertion of the police power, especially where it abridges or destroys the constitutional rights of the citizen, can only be vindicated as a measure of self-defense, as it is expressed by Mr. Justice Pope, supra, or as it is expressed by other authorities, by some overruling necessity. If the various restrictions and regulations as to the sale of intoxicating liquors by the officers and agents of the state be designed only for the protection of the public health or the public morals, and are fit and appropriate to that end, we do not see why such restrictions and regulations could not be applied to the sale of such liquors by private individuals; and, if so, then certainly there was no necessity for any such sweeping act, whereby the constitutional rights of the citizen, hereinbefore referred to, have been absolutely destroyed, but these rights would be reserved to the citizen, and only restricted by such regulations as may be necessary for the public good.

But, in addition to this, we are compelled to say, without in the slightest degree intending to impeach the motives or to criticize the intentions of the members of the legislature by which this act was passed, and, on the contrary, freely according to them the best motives and the purest intentions, that, judging the act from the terms employed in it (the only way in which a court is at liberty to form an opinion), it cannot be justly regarded as a police regulation, but simply as an act to increase the revenue of the state and its subordinate governmental agencies. This is apparent from the profit features of the act, from the various stringent provisions designed to compel consumers of intoxicating liquors to obtain them only from the officers and agents of the state, and notably by the provision authorizing the state commissioner to sell such liquors to persons outside of the limits of the state, which certainly cannot be regarded as bearing the faintest resemblance to a police regulation for the purpose of protecting the public health or the public morals of the people of this state. But it is earnestly contended by the attorney-general that if the power to prohibit absolutely the sale of intoxicating liquors be conceded, it follows necessarily that the state may assume the monopoly of such a trade; and in support of this view he cites Tiedeman on the Limitations of the Police Power (page 818), where that author uses the following language: "There is no doubt that a trade or occupation which is inherently and necessarily injurious to society may be prohibited altogether; and it does not seem to be questioned that the prosecution of such a business may be assumed by the government, and managed by it as a monopoly." But the only authority which the author cites to sustain this rather extraordinary proposition is the case of State v. Brennan's Liquors, 25 Conn. 278, overlooking entirely the case of Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 503, 63 Am. Dec. 891, which holds an opposite view, and which had been previously cited by the same author at page 197 and quoted from, apparently with approval; but, in addition to this, we are unable to perceive how the right to prohibit a given traffic carries with it the power in the state to assume the monopoly of such traffic. If the right to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors rests upon the ground that such a traffic "is inherently and necessarily injurious to society," as is involved in the statement by the author of this proposition, then it seems to us that the logical and necessary consequence would be that the state could not engage in such traffic, for otherwise we should be compelled to admit the absurd proposition that a state government established for the very purpose of protecting society could lawfully engage in a business which "is inherently and necessarily injurious to society." We must prefer, then, to follow the case of Beebe v. State, rather than State v. Brennan's Liquors; for while it has been said that the case of Beebe v. State has been overruled (though the case to that effect has not been brought to our attention), yet we do not cite the case as authority, for it is not authority here, but it is only referred to for the reasoning contained in the opinion. Indeed, neither the Indiana nor the Connecticut case could constitute authority in this case, for the reason that the statute which we are called upon to construe contains very different provisions from those found either in the Indiana or Connecticut statutes. But in this connection we are enabled to cite a very recent case, which the research of counsel for respondents has furnished us with, which, it seems to us, is as conclusive of this whole matter as any case from abroad can be. That is the case of Rippe v. Becker (Minn.) 23 L. R. A. 857, in which one of the points distinctly decided is thus stated in the syllabus, prepared by the court: "The police power of the state to regulate a business is to be exercised by the adoption of rules and regulations as to the manner in which it shall be conducted by others, and not by itself engaging in it." In that case the question was as to the constitutionality of an Act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Purchase of a Site and for the Erection of a State Elevator or Warehouse at Duluth for Public Storage of Grain," and one of the grounds upon which it was sought to sustain the constitutionality of the act was that it was an exercise of the police power. But the court held that, while "the right of the state, in the exercise of its police power, to regulate the business of receiving, weighing, inspecting, and storing grain in elevators and warehouses, as being a business affected with a public interest, is now settled beyond all controversy" by the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 118, 24 L. ed. 77, and others on the same line, yet that the act there in question could not be regarded as a police regulation of the business, and that the police power of the state to regulate a business does not include the power to engage in carrying it on. It would extend this opinion to an unwarrantable length to make further quotations from the opinion of the court in that case, which might be instructive and profitable. It seems to us, therefore, that in no view of the case can the dispensary act be regarded as a police regulation of the business of selling intoxicating liquors, and, even if it could be, that such police power does not include the power on the part of the state to engage in carrying on such business.

Finally, the constitutionality of the dispensary act is assailed upon the ground that the legislature have undertaken thereby to embark the state in a trading enterprise, which they have no constitutional authority to do: not because there is any express prohibition to that effect in the constitution, but because it is utterly at variance with the very idea of civil government, the establishment of which was the expressly declared purpose for which the people adopted their constitution; and therefore all the powers conferred by that instrument upon the various departments of the government must necessarily be regarded as limited by that declared purpose. Hence when, by the first section of the second article of the constitution, the legislative power was conferred upon the general assembly, the language there used cannot be construed as conferring upon the general assembly the unlimited power of legislating upon any subject, or for any purpose, according to its unrestricted will, but must be construed as limited to such legislation as may be necessary or appropriate to the real and only purpose for which the constitution was adopted, to wit, the formation of a civil government. In this connection it is noticeable that the word "all" is not used in the section above referred to, but the language used is, "the legislative power," meaning such legislative power as may be necessary or appropriate to the declared purpose of the people in framing their constitution and conferring their powers upon the various departments constituted for the sole purpose of carrying into effect their declared purpose. It is manifest from the numerous express restrictions upon the legislative will found in the constitution that the people were not willing to intrust even their own representatives with unlimited legislative power, but, as if not satisfied with these numerous express restrictions, and perhaps fearing that some important right might have been overlooked, a general clause, not usually found in state constitutions, was inserted, apparently designed to cover any such omissions, for in section 41 of article 1 it is expressly declared that "the enumeration of rights in this constitution shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people." Now, upon well-settled principles of constitutional construction we are not at liberty to disregard this clause, but must give it some meaning and effect. It seems to us that the true construction of this clause is that, while there are many rights which are expressly reserved to the people, with which the legislature are forbidden to interfere, there are other rights reserved to the people, not expressly but by necessary implication, which are beyond the reach of the legislative power, unless such power has been expressly delegated to the legislative department of the government. These views have not only the support of the highest authority in this country, as may be seen by reference to the cases of Citizens Sav. & L. Assn. of Cleveland v. Topeka, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 655, 22 L. ed. 455, and Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 27 L. ed. 238, but have been distinctly adopted by the supreme court of the state in Feldman v. Charleston, 28 S. C. 57, 55 Am. Rep. 6, as well as by the courts of Massachusetts and Maine, as may be seen by reference to Allen v. Jay, 60 Me. 124, 11 Am. Rep. 185; and Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39, and what is more, they were applied to the vital power of taxation,—a power absolutely essential to the very existence of every government. These cases substantially hold that, although there may be no express restrictions contained in a state constitution forbidding the imposition of taxes for any other purpose than a public purpose, yet such a restriction must necessarily be implied from the very nature of civil government; and hence the legislative department, under the general power of taxation conferred upon it, cannot impose any tax except for some public purpose. Upon the same principle it seems to us clear that any act of the legislature which is designed to, or has the effect of, embarking the state in any trade which involves the purchase and sale of any article of commerce for profit, is outside and altogether beyond the legislative power conferred upon the general assembly by the constitution, even though there may be no express provision in the constitution forbidding such an exercise of legislative power. Trade is not, and cannot properly be, regarded as one of the functions of government. On the contrary, its function is to protect the citizen in the exercise of any lawful employment, the right to which is guaranteed to the citizen by the terms of the constitution, and certainly has never been delegated to any department of the government.

We do not deem it necessary to go into any extended consideration of the fearful consequences of recognizing the power of the legislature to embark the state in any trade, arising from the hazards of all business of that character, or to comment upon the danger to the people of the monopoly of any trade by the state,—for if it can monopolize one it may monopolize any or all other trades or employments,—although it is permissible for a court, when called upon to construe an act, to consider its effects and consequences; for it may be said—indeed, has been said—that the good sense and patriotism of the members of the general assembly may be safely relied upon to protect the people from such apprehended dangers. But that great luminary of the law, Chief Justice Marshall, did not seem to think that this was a sufficient protection, as may be seen by what he said in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 316, 4 L. ed. 579; and in Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678. Nor did the Supreme Court of the United States in later days seem to think that this confidence in the good sense and patriotism of the legislative department was a sufficient safeguard against exercise of a power which might become dangerous, for while, on the one hand, in the case of Dobbins v. Erie County Comrs., 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 435, 10 L. ed. 1022, it was held that a state cannot tax the salary of a United States officer, on the other hand, in the case of Buffington v. Day, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 113, 20 L. ed. 123, it was held that the United States could not tax the salary of a state officer, although in the case last cited, in his dissenting opinion, Mr. Justice Bradley took the ground that such confidence would be a sufficient safeguard against a dangerous exercise of the taxing power. These two cases were decided upon the principle that, inasmuch as "the power to tax involved the power to destroy," as had been said by Marshall, Ch. J., in McCulloch v. Maryland, supra, the only adequate protection was to deny the power of the state government to tax the means and instrumentalities employed by the United States government to carry into operation the powers granted to it; and for a like reason the power of the United States government is denied to tax the means and instrumentalities employed by the state government to carry into effect its powers, although both of these governments were established for the protection and preservation of the rights of the same people; and this was held although there is no express provision in either of the constitutions of these two governments forbidding the imposition of such a tax, for, as was said by Mr. Justice Nelson in delivering the opinion of the court in the case last cited: "It is admitted that there is no express provision in the constitution that prohibits the general government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the states, nor is there any prohibiting the states from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation." It is urged, however, that in the past the state engaged in the business of banking and in the establishment of a state college, and these furnish a precedent for the state engaging in any other business which may be deemed by the legislative department of the government conducive to the public welfare. In the first place, these institutions were established under the Constitution of 1790, which contained no such provision as that found in the forty-first section of the first article of the Constitution of 1868. In the second place we are not informed of any instance in which the constitutionality of the acts establishing either of those institutions was ever brought to the test of judicial decision, and therefore they can form no precedent for our guidance in this case. In the third place, the establishment of a bank may be, and has been, most ably defended, upon the ground that such an institution is necessary to the proper control and management of the fiscal affairs of the government, and is therefore a proper governmental instrumentality, though we must not be understood as indorsing the proposition thus ably defended, for that question is not now before us, and we do not propose now to intimate any opinion upon the subject. As to the college, we do not regard that institution, in any proper sense of the term, as a business, certainly not as a trade, and it bears no analogy whatever to the business of buying and selling intoxicating liquors, or any other article of commerce. And as to the business of school teaching, if such an occupation can be characterized as a business, in the sense in which that term is used in this opinion, the very fact that the framers of the present constitution saw fit to incorporate in the present constitution an express mandate requiring the establishment of public schools, is not only destructive of any argument drawn from analogy as to the power of the state to engage in any business, but also warrants the inference that without such express mandate the state would not have the power to engage in such so-called business.

Finally, it seems to us that the question as to the right of the state to engage in any trade or business for the purpose of gain has been practically determined adversely to such right in the recent case of Mauldin v. Greenville, 33 S. C. 1, 8 L. R. A. 291. There one of the questions raised was as to the power of the city council to purchase and hold an electric light plant for the purpose of lighting the streets and public buildings and offices of the city, and also for the purpose of furnishing lights to the people at proper charges therefor. The court held that, while the city council was invested with power to provide for lighting the streets and public buildings in the mode proposed, yet they had no power to engage in the business of furnishing lights to private individuals in their residences or places of business, for the reason, as it was pointedly expressed by Mr. Justice McGowan in delivering the opinion of the court: "As we understand it, all the powers given to the city council were for the sole and exclusive purpose of government, and not to enter into private business of any kind, outside of the scope of the city government." And this was said although the charter of the city—its constitution, so to speak—conferred upon the city council the broadest and most extensive powers for the good government of the city. So here we may say that the legislative power conferred upon the general assembly by the constitution of the state was given to them "for the sole and exclusive purpose of government, and not to enter into private business of any kind, outside of the scope of the [state] government." Although the counsel for appellant very properly did not rely upon the case of State v. Chester (S. C.) 17 S. E. Rep. 752, as any authority whatever, upon the questions presented in the present case, yet it may not be amiss for us to say that the questions here presented were not there decided or considered, for the obvious reason that they were not necessary to the decision of that case, and therefore, under the well-settled rule (Cooley, Const. Lim. 168) that a court will not, and ought not to, pass upon a constitutional question, and declare a statute to be invalid, unless a decision upon that very point becomes necessary to the determination of the cause, in the Chester Case the court did not feel at liberty to consider the general question of the constitutionality of the dispensary act, and, on the contrary, carefully guarded against even any intimation of opinion as to the general question. Now, however, the question is squarely presented, and has been fully and ably argued on both sides and we are compelled to meet it. After the fullest and most careful and deliberate consideration, we feel constrained to say that the act is clearly unconstitutional, except in so far as it forbids the granting of licenses to retail spirituous liquors beyond the 30th of June, 1893. Under this view, all subordinate questions presented in all the cases, except the first named, lose all practical importance, and need not, therefore, be considered.

In the case first mentioned in the title of this opinion, however, there are other questions presented, some of which it is necessary to decide, although the necessity for the consideration of others is superseded by the conclusion which we have reached on the main question of the constitutionality of the dispensary act. It may be stated in general terms that this was an action instituted by certain taxpayers of the county of Darlington in behalf of themselves and other taxpayers of said county, who are too numerous to be made parties, for the purpose of enjoining and restraining the defendants from establishing a dispensary in the town of Darlington, upon several grounds, mainly upon the ground that the act providing for such establishment is unconstitutional, null, and void. It will be well, however, for a full understanding of this branch of the case, that the pleadings in the case, without the accompanying affidavits, should be incorporated in the report of the case. Without considering at any length this question of mere procedure, it seems to us that the remedy by injunction is appropriate in the case as presented by the pleadings. The real object of the action is to prevent certain persons from engaging in a business involving the use of public funds derived from taxation under an act of the legislature claimed to be unconstitutional, and we think the authorities cited by the counsel of record for the plaintiffs, especially Cooley on Taxation, 784, and 1 Pomeroy on Equity Jurisprudence, 277, together with our own case of Mauldin v. Greenville, supra, are amply sufficient to sustain the view taken by the circuit judge. All the other exceptions in this case present questions which, in our judgment, it becomes unnecessary to consider, under the view which we have taken as to the unconstitutionality of the act.

The judgment of this court is that the judgments and orders appealed from in each of the cases mentioned in the title be affirmed.

McGowan, J., concurs.

Pope, J., dissenting:

These six cases, separately tried on circuit, though differing in some particulars, inasmuch, however, as each one involved constitutional questions of similar import, were heard together in this court, by common consent, and under an order duly passed here for that purpose.

The first case—that of McCullough et al. against Brown et al.—involves this point which is not contained in the questions raised by the other five cases, viz., whether, in an action on the equity side of the court of common pleas, an injunction can issue to restrain a special tribunal, created by law for a well-defined purpose, from the performance of the duties confided to its discretion, while acting within its jurisdiction. We are of opinion that such a remedy cannot avail the plaintiffs. The only way the errors of such a tribunal, while acting within its special jurisdiction, can be corrected, is under the writ of certiorari. This point has recently been considered and decided by this court in the case of State v. Kirkland (S. C.) 19 S. E. Rep. 215. The next five cases differ from the first case—McCullough et al. against Brown et al.—in this: These being indictments against the respective defendants in the court of general sessions for a violation of what is known as the “Dispensary Act,” in the sale of beer against the provisions of that statute, the defendants demurred because such act creating the offense provided no punishment therefor; and it was claimed that by section 2653 of the General Statutes, which provides that in case of a conviction, where no punishment is provided by statute, the court shall award such sentence as is conformable to the common usage and practice in this state, according to the nature of the offense, and not repugnant to the constitution, the selling of liquor without a license is made a misdemeanor. The punishment affixed to misdemeanors should have been applied. This ruling of the circuit judge was erroneous. Besides, it is far from being clear that section 21 of the Dispensary Act does not apply to the offense charged in the indictment. Section 21 is complete, in defining the offense, and providing a punishment, in express terms. Thus the way is cleared, and it becomes necessary to consider the constitutional questions raised in these cases, they being the same in each of the six cases.

The majority of this court has reached the conclusion that the whole act is unconstitutional. I am unable to agree with the other members of the court in such conclusion, and I propose to state my reasons for holding just the opposite views to those expressed by them. Now, this is a court. Therefore, the expression of any opinion on the merits of prohibition or anti-prohibition, license or no-license, is no part of my business. The justice or injustice of an act of the legislature, its wisdom or improvidence, belong exclusively to the legislature, and the people, whose servants they are. If the law is unwise or improvident, let an appeal be made to the ballot box. Neither this court nor any other court has a right, under the constitution, to meddle with the legislature in regard to the foregoing matter. I make these remarks because it is very palpable that, in effect, such interference is sometimes made, and there is a growing tendency on the part of the courts to assume a power which the law has never given them, under the guise of some philosophical abstraction that there is some power in them, by reason of some mysterious something, called, for the want of a better name, “the social compact.” This country has been made to drink the cup of sorrow to its bottom by reason of their abstractions, and it is fully time that the good sense of judges shall stamp such a vague and shadowy claim—having for its basis nothing in the organic law to support it—out of existence; and if they do not, or will not, it is very sure they are leading the way to incalculable mischief, for the mutterings of a coming storm by reason thereof are plainly distinct. “An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.” The opinion of the majority is very explicit in its admission that all the presumptions are in favor of the constitutionality of an act of the general assembly, and that it is the duty of any one assailing such an act as unconstitutional to point out, by specific objections, wherein it is unconstitutional. In the cases at bar, we have more than presumptions as to its constitutionality, for this court, in the case of State v. Chester (S. C.) 17 S. E. Rep. 752, have, among other things, held that the dispensary act was duly passed by the general assembly, and approved by the governor, as far as a compliance with the constitutional requirements relating to and governing the mode of enacting laws by the legislature are concerned. The respondents, in the court below, recognized this duty to specify the constitutional defects in this law, and have sought to comply with it by assailing the power of the general assembly to enact such a law, by reason of certain sections of the state constitution restricting the legislative power, or, by necessary implication, denying its exercise. I think I fully recognize the gravity of the suggested difficulties to enable me to discharge my duty in their consideration. I have endeavored to realize my solemn oath of office to uphold, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and this state, and, for this purpose, to close my ears to popular clamor, or expressions of opinion by others than members of this court, after the arguments of counsel had been heard. It will be a sad day for constitutional liberty, in this state or country, when cases are to be decided here in haste, and without a thorough consideration by the members of this court, or when a decision here reached is the result, not of investigation of legal and constitutional principles, but of partisan influences or dictation. A moment's reflection will establish it as a truth that a judge who is made to vary his honest conclusions of the law by a popular demand for such variance is to be pitied as well as condemned. He is not justly entitled to be ranked with O'Neill, Johnston, Wardlaw, and others.

Let me now direct my attention to the points here raised, which, in my judgment, may be considered in the form of the following questions: (1) What is the legislative power of this state, as defined in the constitution, our own decisions, those of the Supreme Court of the United States, those of other states of this Union, and by text-writers of acknowledged authority? (2) What restrictions are placed, by the sections of our constitution relied upon here, fixing limits to the exercise of legislative power? (3) To what class of legislation do restrictions refer, or the denial of the right to sell intoxicating liquors belong? And herein a brief sketch of our legislative history touching the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage. (4) Is the exercise of the police power attempted under the provisions of this act inhibited by the sections of the constitution, either in their terms, or by necessary implication from the terms actually used?

The preamble of our constitution declares: "We the people of the state of South Carolina, in convention assembled, grateful to Almighty God for this opportunity, deliberately and peaceably of entering into an explicit and solemn compact with each other, and forming a new constitution of civil government for ourselves and posterity, and recognizing the necessity of the protection of the people in all that pertains to their freedom, safety, and tranquillity, and imploring the direction of the Great Legislator of the Universe, do agree upon, ordain, and establish the following declaration of rights and form of government as the constitution of the commonwealth of South Carolina." In the twenty-sixth section of the declaration of rights it is provided: "In the government of this commonwealth, the legislative, executive and judicial powers of the government shall be forever separate and distinct from each other and no person exercising the functions of one of said departments shall assume or discharge any other." Section 27: "The general assembly ought frequently to assemble for the redress of grievances, and for making new laws as the common good may require." I will not transcribe the other sections in this declaration of rights, but will content myself with giving the effect of other sections thereof bearing on the general assembly. Section 4 prevents any legislation looking to a dissolution of the American Union. Section 6 provides that no law shall be passed to prevent the people from peaceably assembling to consult for the public good, and petition any department of the government. Section 7 prohibits the enactment of any laws to abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. Section 9 prohibits any law interfering with the liberty of conscience. Section 10 prohibits any legislation establishing religious worship. Section 11 preserves the right of trial by jury. Section 12 preserves personal rights from legislative interference, except such as are made to apply upon others under like circumstances. Section 14 prevents interference with full protection of the law to all, and the enactment of any laws ex post facto. Section 15 requires that all courts shall be public. Section 17 secures the right of habeas corpus. Section 18, that no man shall be put twice in jeopardy of his life. Section 19 regulates petit crimes and the grand jury. Section 20 provides an estate in homestead, and regulates imprisonment for debt. Section 21 provides that no bill of attainder, ex post facto law, nor any law impairing the obligation of a contract, shall be enacted,—no corruption of blood, or forfeiture of estate. Section 22 prescribes that no warrant for search and seizure shall be issued but in cases, and with the formalities, prescribed by the laws.

Section 23 regulates the enactment of laws under eminent domain. Section 24 prescribes that the general assembly shall alone provide for the suspension of the laws. Section 25 restricts the authority to declare martial law to the authority of the general assembly. Section 26 restricts the interference with the right to bear arms to the general assembly. Section 29 relates to quartering soldiers, in times of peace, in any house, without the consent of the owner, except in a manner prescribed by law. Section 33 provides that the right of suffrage shall be protected by laws regulating elections. Section 34 relates to representation, and forbids any interference therewith, except by a trial by jury, or a law of the land. Section 36 relates to taxation, and requires ad valorem taxation. Section 37 requires that no subsidy, impost tax, or duties shall be levied without the consent of the people, or their representatives lawfully assembled. Section 39 relates to letters of nobility or distinctions. Section 40 relates to the navigability of waters within the state. Section 41 provides that the enumeration of rights in this constitution shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people. By the first section of article 2 of our Constitution, it is provided: "The legislative power of this state shall be vested in two distinct branches, the one to be styled the 'Senate' and the other the 'House of Representatives' and both together the 'General Assembly of the State of South Carolina.'" By section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of South Carolina, adopted in June, 1790, it was provided: "The legislative authority of this state shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a senate and a house of representatives." 1 Stat. at L. 184. The constitution adopted in 1790 virtually was of force until April, 1868, when the present constitution was adopted. So we will speak of the former as the "Old Constitution," and the latter as the "New Constitution." Prior to the formation of the national government, and after this state had ceased to be a colony of Great Britain, the state of South Carolina was one of the sovereign states of the world. Its power of legislation was as unlimited as the parliament of Great Britain. Having entered the union of states, it parted with as much of its sovereign power as was vested, by the Constitution of the United States and its amendments, in the government of the United States. These grants of power so parted with were enumerated in the constitution of the general government, but all the balance of the sovereign powers were retained by the people, and were confided by them to the governmental agencies created in the organic law,—the state constitution. One of these governmental agencies, as we have seen, was the legislature. It became necessary for the courts to define the constitutional provision creating this department, and we propose to show that, both under the old and the new constitution, the words used in both instruments have been determined by the courts of last resort in this state to mean that the whole legislative power of the state of South Carolina was devolved upon the general assembly, limited only by restriction upon the exercise of such legislative power by the Federal Constitution on the one hand, and by the state constitution upon the other. In Osborne v. Huger, 1 Bay, 206, speaking of the power of the legislature of this state, Mr. Justice Bay said: "To suppose that the supreme legislature of a sovereign country has no right to regulate the conduct of its officers and the mode of business, would be straining the matter very far indeed." Judge Richardson said in State v. Hutson, 1 McCord, L. 242: "But, by the constitution of this state, all legislative authority, with very few restrictions, is given to the legislature or general assembly. A law, then, when enacted by that body, must be deemed constitutional, unless it comes plainly within some constitutional exception to the general power of legislation." Judge David Johnson said in State v. Williams, 2 McCord, L. 304: "The constitution confers on the legislature a general power to legislate with only two classes of limitations; those that are directory, and those that are prohibitory; you shall do this, and you shall forbear to do that." Chief Justice John Belton O'Neill said in State v. Charleston, 10 Rich. L. 491: "I know no restrictions on legislative power, which in this state is vested by the constitution in the general assembly, except those which deny certain powers, or which, by implication, arise because certain powers are conferred on congress. So far as legislative power is concerned, I agree that, subject to the restrictions which I have suggested, the general assembly has all the powers of the parliament of Great Britain."

So much for the decisions of our court of last resort upon the grant of power to the legislature rendered prior to the 16th of April, 1868. Let us see what this court has laid down since that date. Chief Justice Willard, as the organ of the court, said in the case of State v. Hayne, 4 S. C. N. S. 420: "Although the particular office of this section [section 1 of article 2 of our Constitution] is to fix certain important features of the body through which the functions of legislation is to be exercised, yet it describes in an authoritative way the nature of the power thus vested. It is no less than the legislative power of the state. It is not such and so much of the legislative powers of the state as were intended to be used by that particular body, but it was the whole legislative power of the legislature of this state,—its whole capacity for making laws, and providing a means for their enforcement. It was not intended that the legislature should exercise power without limitation or restraint, for the constitution that uses these words of grant imposes many such restrictions and limitations, affecting the extent to which it may be effectually exercised." So, too, Mr. Justice McGowan, in Peleer v. Campbell, 15 S. C. 592, 40 Am. Rep. 705, said: "The legislature is a lawmaking power of this state upon all subjects not prohibited by the constitution, every part of which should, if possible, be so construed as to allow full force to section 1 of article 2, which vests the full legislative power of the state in the general assembly. The English parliament, in a political sense is omnipotent; but with us it is the people, and the people speak through the legislature, except when restricted by the Constitution of the United States or this state. No statute can be disregarded, unless a constitutional violation can be pointed out." Equally as explicit is the same justice in Ex parte Lynch, 16 S. C. 33, and the justice who delivered the unanimous opinion in Utsey v. Charleston, S. & N. R. Co. 38 S. C. 399.

But what says the United States Supreme Court on this subject? Said Mr. Justice McLean in the License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 587, 12 L. ed. 293. "Before the adoption of the constitution [United States] the states possessed respectively, all the attributes of sovereignty. In their organic laws, they had distributed their powers of government according to their own views, subject to such modifications as the people of each state may sanction. . . . The federal government is supreme, within the scope of its delegated powers; and the state governments are equally supreme in the exercise of those powers not delegated by them to the United States, nor inhibited to them." I am sorry that the extended references to our own decisions, and those of other states, in relation to the extent of the legislative power in the states, will forbid my resorting, at this point, to more extended notice of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Upon investigation it will be found that no decisions rendered by that court assert any greater restrictions upon the legislative power in the states than I have already admitted, except an obiter dictum of Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U. S. 4

Wheat, 883, 4 L. ed. 595; in a dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer (Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 551, 36 L. ed. 258,) and the guarded language of Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 661, 37 L. ed. 601, when he says: "Irrespective of the operation of the Federal Constitution, and restrictions asserted to be inherent in the nature of American institutions, the general rule is that there are no restrictions upon the legislative power of the legislature of a state, except those imposed by its written constitution." It will be noticed that Chief Justice Fuller does not admit the existence of the social-compact theory. He merely says it is asserted. A very pungent article on this subject by Richard C. McNortin, Esq., in the American Law Register and Review, of December, 1893, uses these words: "Could there be found one man that would consent to thus transfer the sovereignty of the nation from its representatives to a court, by enacting that all legislation contrary to the said compact shall be void? And what that compact is, the judges shall be the final arbitrators, and they are to ascertain it from their own notions as to what it ought to be assumed to have been." This legal heresy had disappeared, from early in this century until recently.

What do some of the other states of this Union hold? Unquestionably, the supreme court of Pennsylvania, announced by that splendid jurist, Chief Justice Jeremiah S. Black, in Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 169, 59 Am. Dec. 759, has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States and the courts of the different states of the Union as the leading authority on this subject. I can recall at least four instances where this decision has been recognized in this state: State v. Charleston, State v. Hayne, Pelzer v. Campbell, and Utsey v. Charleston, S. & N. R. Co. supra. This judge said: "The powers bestowed on the state government were distributed by the constitution to the three great departments: the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. The power to make laws as granted in section 1 of article 1 by the following words: 'The legislative power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a general assembly, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives.' It is plain that the force of these general words, if there had been nothing elsewhere to qualify them, would have given to the assembly an unlimited power to make all such laws as they might think proper. They would have had the whole omnipotence of the British parliament. But the absolute power of the people themselves had been previously limited by the Federal Constitution, and they could not bestow on the legislature authority which had already been given to congress. . . . The jurisdiction of the assembly is still further confined by that part of the constitution called the 'Declaration of Rights,' which, in twenty-five sections carefully enumerates the reserved rights of the people, and closes by declaring that 'everything in this article is excepted out of the general powers of the government, and shall remain forever inviolate.' The general assembly cannot, therefore, pass any law to conflict with the right-ful authority of congress, nor perform a judicial or executive function, nor violate the popular privileges reserved by the declaration of rights, nor change the organic structure of the government, nor exercise any other power prohibited in the constitution. If it does any of these things, the judiciary claims, and in clear cases has always exercised, the right to declare such acts void.

. . . We are urged, however, to go further than this, and to hold that a law, though not prohibited, is void if it violates the spirit of our institutions, or impairs any of those rights which it is the right of a free government to protect, and to declare it unconstitutional if it be wrong and unjust. But we cannot do this. It would be assuming a right to change the constitution, to supply what we conceive to be its defects, to fill up every casus omissus, and to interpolate into it whatever, in our opinion, ought to have been put there by its framers. The constitution has given us a list of what the legislature may not do. If we extend that list, we alter the instrument; we become ourselves the aggressors, and violate both the letter and spirit of the organic law as grossly as the legislature could. If we can add to the reserved rights of the people, we can take them away. If we can mend, we can mar. If we can remove the landmarks which we find established, we can obliterate them. If we can change the constitution in any particular, there is nothing but our own will to prevent us from demolishing it entirely." See also, People v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 404; Stewart v. Polk County Suprs. 30 Iowa, 9. But space bids us to desist.

Now, as to the opinions of text-writers: Mr. Bishop, in his work on the Written Laws, at section 92, says: "The Constitution of the United States consists chiefly in a grant of enumerated powers. Hence, in interpreting it, the courts presume the existence of no powers not expressly or impliedly conferred. On the other hand, a state constitution proceeds on the idea that all legislative functions are in the legislature. Therefore, in its interpretation, the powers not taken away by the United States Constitution are preserved, excepting as expressly or by implication denied." Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (page 307), says: "All legislative power is conferred on the senate and assembly; and, if an act is within the legitimate exercise of that power, it is valid, unless some restriction or limitation can be found in the constitution itself. The distinction between the United States Constitution and our state constitution is that the former confers upon congress certain specified powers, only, while the latter confers upon the legislature all legislative powers. In the one case, all legislative powers not prohibited may be exercised." I might go forward, and quote other text-writers, but Mr. Cooley is recognized as standard authority.

Thus, our own state courts, those of the United States Supreme Court, the supreme courts of other states, and standard text-books on constitutional law, plainly show that this modern dress to an exploded idea is not sustained by authority, and that the authority of the legislature of this state to enact laws is only restricted by our constitution and that of the United States, as is in each instrument actually specified, or necessarily implied from such restrictions there plainly expressed.

We are now prepared, as the next step in our investigations, to see wherein the dispensary act violates the constitution of this state. I say "state," for the opinion prepared by the majority of this court is exceedingly careful to confine the discussion to the state constitution, so as not to include the question suggested in the court below as to federal questions.

It is suggested that this act violates at least two of the sections of the state constitution. What are these? It may be as well to quote these sections from the text of the constitution itself. Section 1 of article 1 provides: "All men are born free and equal, endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are the rights of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties, of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and of securing and obtaining their safety and happiness." Section 12 provides: "No person shall be disqualified as a witness or be prevented from acquiring, holding, and transmitting property, or be hindered in acquiring education, or be liable to any punishment for any offense or be subjected in law to any other restraints or disqualifications in regard to any personal rights than such as are laid upon others in like circumstances." Section 14 provides: "No person shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled or dispossessed of his property immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land, and the general assembly shall not enact any law that shall subject any person to punishment without trial by jury, nor shall he be punished but by virtue of a law already established or promulgated prior to the offense and legally applied." Section 41 provides: "The enumeration of rights in this constitution shall not be construed to impair or deny others retained by the people, and all powers not herein delegated remain with the people." I have thus taken the pains to reproduce the text itself, so far as these sections are concerned. Let us now take the pains to investigate the claims set up in the opinion of the majority of this court as to the inalienable rights of the citizen.

I submit that the true office of section 1 of article 1 has been obscured. It is true it is there stated that life, liberty, property, tranquillity, or safety and happiness are therein set up as inalienable rights. What is meant by these terms? Surely, no one for a moment will contend that these inestimable boons of a wise Providence, in a civilized community, mean that life is to be preserved to an individual, no matter how many other lives are ruthlessly destroyed by him; that the liberty of a man is to be preserved as an inalienable right, when he has lost his senses, and endangered the lives of others; that the property of a man is to be preserved as an inalienable birthright if that man recklessly destroys the property, reputation, or liberty of his fellow man, or that others must guarantee him safety if he is a murderer. No, for we find that, under this very constitution, laws may be enacted to hang the murderer, the man guilty of arson or rape; to imprison for life a man guilty of certain crimes, or one found guilty of fraud, or that even steals a chicken for food; to sell his property, and every part of it, to pay taxes due the government, and sell everything, except a homestead, for debt. Let us cease these assertions of inalienable rights, in the connection in which they are so frequently, and with such unction, lauded. The true view of this section is to lay down, in the first place, enumerated rights, that individuals, acting in their own behalf, cannot disregard or destroy; and, in the second place, to call on the government, in its different agencies, to promote all the blessed rights of free men. These four sections of our constitution should be construed together, and when this is done all is made clear and consistent, the one clause with the other, and to accord with what we see taking place around us in governmental affairs, both in the state and nation. Certainly, the grand, central thought, in government, is to secure the happiness, and promote the welfare, of the entire body of the citizens, and it was for this purpose the people established government. The courts have construed these provisions in the sections of article 1 of our state Constitution. The meaning to be attached to the terms "privileges and immunities" was construed many years ago by Mr. Justice Washington in Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 371, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230, as follows: "They may all, however, be comprehended under the following heads: Protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue happiness, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole." This definition has been accepted by the United States Supreme Court and by the courts of the states. So far as government is concerned, no rights may be said to be absolute. They all are held subject to such restraints as the government may impose for the general good of the whole. In regard to land, by our state constitution, in addition to the general restrictions upon its enjoyment by its owner as his property, its ultimate ownership is in the people. Therefore, wherever the rights enumerated in Corfield v. Coryell, supra, and which appear in our declaration of rights, are involved, it may be regarded as settled in accordance with the view that they can be subjected to such restraint as the government may justly prescribe for the good of the whole. An examination of sections 12 and 14 plainly declares that personal rights shall not be ruthlessly or capriciously or unnecessarily or partially invaded by the government for "the good of the whole," but that the same shall only be interfered with (in the twelfth) in the same manner "as are said upon others under like circumstances," and (in the fourteenth section) no interference with personal rights, except "by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." By the term "judgment of his peers" is meant trial by jury; and "the law of the land" has been carefully considered, in this state, in the cases of Zylstra v. Charleston, 1 Bay, 884; White v. Kendrick, 1 Brev. 471; State v. Mazoy, 1 McMull. L. 503; State v. Simons, 2 Speers, L. 761; Forst v. Bailey, 5 Rich. L. 115; State v. Tax Collector of St. Philips & St. Michaels, 2 Bail. L. 677; Charleston v. Stelges, 10 Rich. L. 440. Chief Justice O'Neill, in State v. Simons, supra, said: "There can be no hesitation in saying that these were the common law and the statute law existing in this state on the adoption of our Constitution (1790). Altogether, they constitute the body of our law, prescribing the course of justice to which a free man is to be considered amenable in all times to come." Bear in mind that the making of a constitution is always preceded by the existence of a society of people who make it. Our forefathers, as before remarked, had not only the common law of the mother country, but also statutes they had previously enacted, and had lived under. The idea, in forming a new constitution, is always to correct, by enlargement, modification, or negation of laws previously existing, by the people of the state. Thus, we find, in 1868, when our present constitution was adopted, it eliminated very carefully laws that were objectionable. For example, "slavery," "corporate privileges," "restrictions upon banks," etc. The same terms, "the laws of the land," which were used in the old constitution, were retained in the new Constitution of 1868. So the definition of these words, and the others I have quoted, which were used in both instruments, are to be construed by us to mean what the decisions I have quoted declared them to mean. Thus, it is made manifest that what has been declared to be the meaning of the 1st, 12th, and 14th sections of the one article of our constitution cannot legitimately be construed as has been contended. Now, as to section 41. When that section is examined, it will be seen that it does not cover the case of rights and powers, as expressed in the instrument, for these words are used not "to impair others retained by the people," that are not set out in the instrument. "And all powers not herein designated are reserved for the people." The full legislation had been and was granted by this very instrument. But we need not cast about for the meaning of this section. It has already been construed by this very court in State v. Hayne, 4 S. C. N. 8. 421, where Chief Justice Willard uses this language: "The true effect of this declaration [forty-first section of article 1] is that it reserves to the people whatever is not granted by the instrument; as, for instance, the right to make changes in the form of government is not granted, and, under this clause, remains in the hands of the people, capable of exercise when they may see fit so to do. As the legislative power is granted in express terms, importing a grant of general powers, such general powers of legislation cannot be regarded as reserved to the people under this section. Such general language as that contained in section 41 of article 1 cannot be allowed such force and effect as to change entirely the nature of the legislative power, and to introduce anomalous ideas in the structure of the government." And this decision has been affirmed by several other decisions of this court. Mr. Cooley, in his great work on Constitutional Law, at page 68, says: "A cardinal rule in dealing with written instruments is that they are to receive an unvarying interpretation, and that their practical construction is to be uniform. A constitution is not to be made to mean one thing at one time, and another at some subsequent time, when the circumstances may have so changed as, perhaps, to make a different rule in the case seem desirable. A principal share of the benefits expected from written constitutions would be lost, if the rules they establish were so flexible as to bend to circumstances, or be modified by public opinion."

Having thus fixed ideas as to the meaning of these four sections of our constitution, let us patiently examine the dispensary act, to ascertain what is its nature, scope, and object, to the end that we may justly apply other principles of law duly involved.

It may be as well to settle definitely what is the nature, scope, and object of the Act of 1892. Its title declares it to be "An Act to Prohibit the Manufacture and Sale of Intoxicating Liquors as a Beverage within This State except as herein Provided." Now, what was the law in this state regulating the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage on the 24th day of December, 1892? "It shall be unlawful for any person or persons to sell spirituous or intoxicating liquors without a license so to do." "No license for the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors shall be granted in South Carolina outside of the incorporated cities, towns, and villages of this state." Gen. Stat. S. C. § 1731. Not only so, but all citizens living in certain towns, cities, and counties, under local option laws of this state, were not allowed to sell, under license or otherwise, such spirituous or intoxicating liquors. An exception was also made under an act allowing the counties of Charleston, Beaufort, Colleton, Berkeley, and Hampton to allow licenses to sell such liquors outside of such incorporated cities and towns, so that, by the title to this act, its declared purpose was to revoke all powers to license the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage if the same were not recognized in the body of the act. Pause, first, a few moments longer before we dissect the provisions of this act, and remember some other pregnant truths. For intoxicating liquors to be sold under license in this state required that such applicant or such licensee should, as a condition precedent to such permit, enter into a bond in the penalty of $1,000, conditioned that he would obey the laws of the state pertaining to the conduct of the sale of spirituous liquors as a beverage. The force of public opinion was so great that many good men dared not face the obloquy of engaging in the business.

Some of the greatest of our churches incorporated it into their organic laws that he who sold liquors as a beverage should not be received or retained in their membership. The evils of the business were so great as to gambling in such places, as to the sale to minors, as to the sale to habitual drunkards, and as to the losses to families by reason of the heads of such families drinking too much, that special statutes had been enacted to punish the saloon keepers for sales to such persons. But, towering above all these evils, a more dreadful one still struck terror into the breasts of all good men. The sanctity of the honor of our women was constantly jeopardized by the inflammation of the brutal passions of the low and vicious among us by strong drink. Under these circumstances and others—notably the experience at the ballot box in November, 1892, by a majority of more than 10,000 votes, the people had demanded the passage of a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors. The experience of the other states where prohibitory laws had been enacted had failed to convince this country that as yet such laws accomplished their most beneficent aims.

Under all these circumstances, the legislature of this state passed this act whereby the manufacture and sale were prohibited to the citizens as such. It undertook to confine the sale to the agents of the state, to be selected for such work because of their well-known sobriety and character for uprightness of life. The general agent was called the "commissioner," who, under a board of control, consisting of the governor, the comptroller general, and attorney-general, should purchase all intoxicating liquors, and should have each and every part of the same analyzed by the state chemist, and declared by him pure and unadulterated. Such commissioner should sell such liquors to the county dispensers at not greater profit than 50 per cent above the net cost thereof. The commissioner was required to execute a bond in the penalty of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties. He was to pay all moneys received from sales into the state treasury monthly. Such commissioner was required, when his duties were not fixed by law, to obey such rules and regulations as were prescribed by the state board of control. He was paid a stated salary, and was commissioned by the state. County dispensers might be appointed in this state, except in those counties and towns in the state where an act of the legislature had declared licenses to sell liquors should not exist. These county dispensers were to be selected by county boards of control, to be appointed by the governor. Such county boards of control could not issue permits to such county dispensers until the city or town where such dispensary was to be established should, by a petition signed by a majority of the freehold voters of such city or town or township, request the same, and certify in such petition to the good character and sobriety of the applicant, which applicant should enter into a bond in the penalty of $3,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties under this law. His duties under the law were: (1) To obey the regulations of the county and state boards of control. (2) To sell liquors at a profit not greater than 50 per cent of their cost, and for cash. (3) To keep open his place of business in the exact building designated in his permit from the county board of control. (4) To retain the packages of liquor as received from the state commissioner without any seals being broken; to sell such sealed packages ranging from a half pint to five gallons without any seal being broken, and such seal not to be broken in the building used for such sale, and no part of such liquor shall be drunk at the place of such sale. (5) No sale shall be made by the county dispenser or his clerk unless upon a printed or ink written application, to be signed by the applicant himself, and witnessed by the signature of the county dispenser or his clerk, on blank forms to be furnished by the county auditor, wherein shall appear the true date of the sale, the place of residence of the applicant, the kind and quantity of liquors so sold; nor shall such sale be made unless the county dispenser knows the applicant personally, or has such applicant identified by a responsible person, not to be a person who is drunk at the time of the purchase, or who is a minor, or who is addicted to drink in excess. (6) Every county dispenser shall report his sales each month, shall file a report thereof with the proper officer, and shall keep a book wherein is enumerated the purchase of any kind and all kinds of liquor, which shall always be open to the public. (7) Every county dispenser shall file with the county auditor the applications for the sale of liquors, and make affidavit that he filed such applications as made therein, and no other, and that no more than one sale was made under each application. (8) No county dispenser shall be allowed to sell any other intoxicating liquors than such as he may purchase from the state commissioner, nor shall he adulterate, nor cause to be adulterated, any intoxicating, spirituous, or malt liquors which he or they may keep for sale under this act, by mixing with the same any coloring matter or any drug or ingredient whatever, or shall mix the same with other liquors of different kinds or quality or with water, or shall sell or expose for sale liquor so adulterated, knowing it to be such, under the pain of being tried for a misdemeanor, and subject therefor to a fine of not less than $200, or imprisonment in the county jail for not less than six months. (9) No county dispenser could hold his office as a right, but as a trust reposed in him, and with the liability to have his permit canceled at any time within the discretion of the county board of control. (10) He should be liable to suit for any civil damage accruing to a wife, child, parent, guardian, employer, or other person under the provisions of law, and his bond should be the basis of such suits, if any. (11) His permit could in no case extend beyond one year from its date. (12) Sales could also be made by county dispensers to licensed druggists or manufacturers of proprietary medicines of intoxicating liquors (except malt liquors), for the purpose of compounding medicines, tinctures, and extracts that cannot be used as a beverage. Such sales should only be at a profit of not over 10 per cent net profit for liquors so sold. (18) All profits accruing to the business so conducted by the county dispensers should be paid, after providing for all the expenses of the county dispensary, one half to the county treasury, and one half to the municipal corporation in which it was located. By the eighteenth section it is provided that the sum of $50,000, if so much be necessary, be appropriated for the purpose of purchasing and supplying liquors to be distributed to county dispensers under the provisions of this act, to be expended by the state treasurer upon the requisition of the state commissioner, with the approval of the state board of control: provided, that the amounts advanced to each county dispenser shall be considered loans to be refunded out of the profits derived from the sales of liquors by the county dispensers. By the sixth section of the act it is provided "that on and after the first day of July, 1893, no person, firm, association or corporation shall manufacture for sale, sell, keep for sale, exchange, barter, or dispense any intoxicating liquors for any purpose whatever, otherwise than is provided in this act: . . . provided that no license for the sale of spirituous liquors now authorized to be granted by municipal authorities shall be of any force or effect after the 30th day of June, 1893, but licenses may be issued or extended to said 30th day of June, 1893, upon payment of one half of the annual license required by the municipal and county authorities in cities or towns where such licenses are or may be authorized to be issued: provided, further, that manufacturers of distilled, malt, or vinous liquors who are doing business in this state shall be allowed to sell to no person in this state except to the state commissioner, and to parties outside of the state. Every package, barrel, or bottle of such liquors shipped beyond the limits of the state shall have thereon the certificate of the state commissioner, allowing the same and otherwise it shall be liable to confiscation, and the railroad carrying the same shall be punished as in section 2: and provided that any person shall have the right to make wine, for his or her own use, from grapes or other fruit." Section 21 provides: "Every person who shall directly or indirectly, keep or maintain by himself, or by associating or combining with others, or who shall in any manner aid, assist or abet in keeping or maintaining any club room or other place in which intoxicating liquors are received or kept for the purpose of barter or sale as a beverage, or for distribution or division among the members of any club or association, by any means whatever, and any person who shall barter, sell, or assist or abet another in bartering or selling, any intoxicating liquors so received or kept shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment in the county jail not less than ninety days nor more than one year." Section 22 provides: "All places where intoxicating liquors are sold, bartered, or given away in violation of this act, or where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage, or where intoxicating liquors are kept for sale, barter, or delivery in violation of this act, are hereby declared to be common nuisances, and if the existence of such nuisance be established, either in a criminal or an equitable action upon the judgment of a court or judge having jurisdiction, finding such place to be a nuisance, the sheriff, or his deputy, or any constable of the proper county or city where the same is located shall be directed to shut up and abate such place by taking possession." etc.

Now, in view of these features, distinctly supplied by the provisions of the act in question, can it be fairly inferred that the nature, scope, and object of the act was to raise revenue for the state and its municipal corporations, as is contended in the opinion of the majority of this court? Notice that the sales provided for are not so fixed as to raise a revenue, although it is not denied that a revenue may result from its enforcement. Sales by the state commissioner are not to be made at a profit of 50 per cent over cost, but shall not exceed that sum. Sales by county dispensers are not fixed at 50 per cent above cost, but they shall not exceed that limit. Would it not be a strange and unusual construction of a provision in a criminal law which provided $20 as a minimum and $500 as a maximum fine, as a punishment, to say the judge who passed sentence must affix $500 as the fine? These matters are merely left to the discretion of the state board of control in the state commissioner's case, and to the county board of control in the case of county dispensers. Nor are the provisions of this law such as to induce generous buying by the community. No man prefers to sign his name to an application to be allowed to buy intoxicating liquors as a beverage. No man prefers that such testimony shall be preserved in a permanent form. Besides, is it not one of the most potent objections to the traffic in intoxicating liquors that they are adulterated? All this is prevented under this act. Is it not admitted that the strongest temptation to drink in bar-rooms is the social feature of men drinking together? Is it not the experience of the world that intoxicating liquors are not so liable to be taken to excess except when obtained in the barroom? We submit, therefore, that it is unjust to the act in question to ascribe to it as its leading and controlling feature the receiving of a revenue for the state and its municipalities. The proper construction is that, in the exercise of the state's undoubted police power, in order to promote sobriety, preserve the health, and provide for the safety, of her citizens, the state has passed this law prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors by private persons; but, recognizing the demand for pure unadulterated liquors, she has created a governmental agency under strict regulations to sell these liquors, with enough profit thereon to pay the expenses of the purchase of these liquors, the expenses of conducting the business, and to police the state to prevent infractions of her laws in this act provided.

We will next consider what power has been applied in this state and the other states of this Union, as fixed by our own decisions, those of the Supreme Court of the United States, and other state courts, and as supported by eminent text-writers, in the suppression altogether or the regulation of the liquor traffic. In the beginning, it is admitted that the legislature of this state has never hitherto exercised the power, by its direct enactments for that purpose, to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage throughout the entire state. What effect the local option laws may have in this direction may be considered presently. These local option laws were enacted in 1882. See 17 Stat. at L. 898. The state, however, as before remarked, has always had and enforced the license as a prerequisite to the retail of spirituous liquors. Among the cases decided before the new constitution are found Heisembrittle v. Charleston, 2 McMull. L. 286; Charleston v. Ahrens, 4 Strohh. L. 257. Since the year 1868, among these decisions may be found: State v. Thornburg, 16 S. C. 484; State v. Mancke, 18 S. C. 84; State v. Turner, Id. 105; State v. Chester, Id. 468; State v. Berlin, 21 S. C. 296, 53 Am. Rep. 677; State v. Neese, 38 S. C. 261. In State v. Thornburg, supra, Mr. Justice McGowan delivered the opinion upholding the conviction of a citizen for selling a small quantity of whiskey to be used as a medicine for a consumptive, the sale having been made outside of an incorporated city, town, or village, where alone it was lawful to sell intoxicating liquors. In the case of State v. Mancke, supra, Mr. Justice McGowan, delivering the opinion of the court, held that the Act of 1880 (17 Stat. at L. 459), requiring a license fee to be paid for the use of the county in addition to the municipal license, was constitutional. In the case of State v. Turner, supra, Mr. Chief Justice McIver delivered the opinion of the court, and said: "We presume, however, from the course of the argument here, that the main object of this ground [of appeal] was to assail the constitutionality of the Act of 1880. The power of the legislature to regulate the sale of spirituous liquors has been too long and too well settled to admit of question at this late day. Experience has demonstrated that the unrestrained traffic in spirituous liquors is dangerous to the peace and welfare of society, and therefore it has long been settled that the lawmaking power may throw such restraints around that traffic as, in the judgment of that department of the government, may be necessary to secure the peace and welfare of society, and persons who wish to deal in such an article must conform to the regulations prescribed, or they cannot claim the right to do so. [Italics mine.] There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States or of this state which forbids the legislature from exercising this power." In State v. Chester, supra, Mr. Chief Justice Simpson held, in delivering the unanimous opinion of this court in passing upon the constitutionality of the Act of 1892 (17 Stat. at L. 893),—known as the "Local Option Act," which provides that, upon the petition of one third of the citizens who voted at the next preceding municipal election of any incorporated city, town, or village, the council of such city, town, or village was authorized and required to submit the question of license or no license to the qualified electors of said city, town, or village, at a special election to be holden, and, if a majority voted for no license, it should be unlawful to issue any licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors within the limits of such city, town, or village (this act was assailed as unconstitutional, because in violation of the twelfth section of article 1 of our Constitution),—that the local option law did not infringe upon the said twelfth section, nor any other provision of that instrument, alleged in that case. In the case of State v. Berlin, supra, when the unanimous opinion was delivered by Chief Justice McIver, it was held (quoting from the syllabus of the case) that the act of the legislature prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors outside of incorporated cities, towns, and villages, while permitting such sale under license within cities, towns, and villages, does not violate section 12, article 1, of the Constitution of this state, nor the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution. Laws regulating the sale of liquors are police regulations, and the legislature may prescribe different regulations in different localities, but such laws must apply equally to all persons within the territorial limits affected. Chief Justice McIver used, inter alia, these words: "It must also be remembered that laws regulating the sale of spirituous liquors are to be regarded as police regulations, over which the state has absolute control, limited only by some constitutional prohibition. The state, therefore, in the exercise of this police power, may pass laws absolutely prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors, except unbroken packages while in the hands of the importer, and except, perhaps, where the rights of property existing at the time of the passage of the law might be destroyed; or it may throw around such traffic such restraints as, in the judgment of the legislature, may be most conducive to the peace and good order of society, by preventing the evils which might flow from an unrestrained traffic in such articles. Licenses Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929, and two state cases. Mr. Justice McGowan concurred in this opinion, as did Chief Justice Simpson. So much for our own state decisions. Every state in the American Union admits the right of the legislature to control by regulations and license the sale of spirituous liquors, and ascribes this power in the state governments to the police power; and only two states, by the decision of their courts of last resort, have decided against the right of prohibition, and these by divided courts. See Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 873, and Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 501, 68 Am. Dec. 891. In the first of these cases just cited, it will appear that this right of prohibition had some side features—property on hand—to control the judgment of some members of the court of New York, and in the Indiana case it has been either overruled or modified by a late judgment of that state, according to a note in Tiedeman on Limitations of Police Powers. I have only space to quote a few of the state decisions. Our House No. 2 v. State, 4 G. Greene, 172; Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 328; State v. Wheeler, 25 Conn. 290; State v. Robinson, 83 Me. 568; State v. Barrels of Liquor, 47 N. H. 369; and many others.

Mr. Cooley, at page 718, 6th ed., sums up very admirably the decisions of the United States Supreme Court affirming the right of the states to prohibit or to regulate "these state laws, known as 'prohibitory liquor laws,' the purpose of which is to prevent altogether the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, so far as legislation can accomplish that object, cannot be held void as in conflict with the 14th Amendment. . . . The same laws have also been sustained when the question of conflict with state constitutions or with general fundamental principles has been raised. They are looked upon as police regulations established by the legislature for the prevention of intemperance, pauperism, and crime, and for the abatement of nuisances." In a note at this page he adds: "If the state so determines, it may forbid the manufacture, sale, and use of liquor as prejudicial to public health, safety, and morals, even though thereby existing property be depreciated in value without compensation." Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 81 L. ed. 205; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 846, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929; Licenses Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256, and many other cases. All of these decisions ascribed the control of the sale of liquor to the exercise of the police power of the state. Mr. Cooley, at page 706, quotes with decided approval the language of Chief Justice Redfield in the famous case of Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 27 Vt. 140, 63 Am. Dec. 635. "By this general police power of the state, persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state, of the perfect right in the legislature to do which no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned; and neither the power itself nor the discretion to exercise it can be bargained away by the state." Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 802. Thus, too, the recent work of Parker and Worthington on Public Health and Safety, at page 24: "The police power of the state is fully competent to regulate the business [sale of intoxicating liquor], to mitigate its evils, or to suppress it entirely. There is no inherent right in a citizen to make or sell intoxicating liquor. Inasmuch as it is a business attended with danger to the community, it may, as already said, be entirely prohibited, or be permitted under such conditions as would limit to the utmost its evils. . . . Consequently, statutes prohibiting the manufacture or sale, or keeping for sale, of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and declaring all places where such liquors are manufactured or kept for sale in violation of the statute to be common nuisances, and forbidding their future use for the purpose, and authorizing courts to restrain violations of the law by injunctions, and to punish the disregard of their injunctions as a contempt by fine or imprisonment, or both, do not impinge any right, privilege, or immunity of the citizens secured by the Constitution of the United States. They do not deny to the citizens whom they affect the equal protection of the law, nor deprive them of property without due process of law. . . . Intoxicating liquors are but an example of a class of things that may be made subject to state regulations such as these just mentioned." Mr. Tiedeman, in his extended work on Limitations of Police Power, is quite as distinct in his recognition of the foregoing views being established as fixed legal principles in this country.

Lastly, we will consider some of the specific objections set out in the opinion of the majority of this court in this case to the dispensary act as being in excess of or beyond the limitations of law. It is objected to as interfering with the inalienable rights of the citizen. I propose to show that this court, and notably the justices who unite in the opinion in this case, are inconsistent by reason of this opinion being at variance with other opinions they have given officially. It must be understood that I am dealing in personal kindness with them, for I am actuated by these feelings. But my duty to the whole people of this commonwealth, whose servant I am, requires that I shall not permit such, to my mind, glaring inconsistency to pass without exposure, especially as it so nearly concerns the welfare of this people. In a previous part of this opinion I have quoted cases in which both took an active part, where it was held by them that the inalienable rights of citizens are not affected by the restraints placed upon the liquor traffic, even where the people whose right it is to labor, to have freedom, etc. I refer to the decisions of State v. Thornburg, State v. Mancke, State v. Turner, State v. Chester, and State v. Berlin, supra,—where they held that the citizens of South Carolina living outside incorporated cities, towns, or villages had no constitutional right to sell intoxicating liquors, and that the denial by the state of such right did not impinge upon any rights of the citizen, as sustained by an appeal to the twelfth section of article 1 of our Constitution. They may attempt to escape from this dilemma that the act which forbade any person to sell liquors outside an incorporated city, town, or village was general in its application to all the citizens who lived outside those limits. The dispensary act applies to every citizen of the state, and they think this act unconstitutional. So, too, as to the local option laws. They were declared to be constitutional, and as not trenching upon the rights of the citizen, when he appealed for protection to the twelfth section of article 1

of our Constitution; and yet they hold the dispensary act—which, as I before said, applies to the whole state—unconstitutional as denying the right of the citizen to sell spirituous liquors, in violation of this very section 12 of article 1 of our Constitution. They have not only virtually overruled those cases I have quoted, but in doing so they not only transcend their powers under our state constitution, but such a course of conduct is opposed to decision after decision of the United States Supreme Court. In the Licenses Cases the court not only decided that the state had the right to legislate liquor up and down,—either to license its sale or to prohibit its sale,—but also that such laws did not trench upon any inalienable right of a citizen. Here is the language (McLean, J.): “No one, it is presumed, can claim a license to sell liquors as a matter of right.” In Mugler v. Kansas, supra, Mr. Justice Harlan said: “Such a right does not inhere in citizenship. Nor can it be said that government interferes with or impairs any one’s constitutional rights of liberty or of property when it determines that the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks for general or individual use as a beverage are, or may become, hurtful to society, and constitute, therefore, a business in which no one may engage.” Mr. Justice Field, in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 91, 84 L. ed. 623, said: “Their sale in that form may be absolutely prohibited. It is a question of public expediency and public morality, and not of federal law. The police power of the state is fully competent to regulate the business, to mitigate its evils, or to suppress it entirely. There is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of the state or of a citizen of the United States. . . . The manner and extent of regulation rests in the discretion of the governing authorities.” These quotations might be multiplied, but time is precious, and I must forbear. I repeat it, these conclusions of the majority of this court as to inalienable rights are not only disapproved by decisions previously made by them, but are in direct conflict with the judgments of the United States Supreme Court. Not only so, but I assert that there never was in South Carolina any inalienable right in the citizen to sell liquor as a beverage. It was always a privilege extended by government, surrounded by restrictions. No right can be said to be an inalienable one that is not inherent, like life, liberty, etc. Nor is the power in the citizen to sell liquor as a beverage interfered with by the legislature because done so by “a law of the land,” for by the decisions of the court of last resort in this state such a term includes the right either to license or to decline to license. If this be so, how can a law duly enacted by the legislature declining to license any and all citizens be opposed to the twelfth and fourteenth sections? The chief justice held, in State v. Berlin, supra, that neither restrictions on the sale of liquors, nor even prohibition itself, invaded any of the personal rights of the citizen under the twelfth section of article 1 of our State Constitution. In this 23 L. R. A.

Mr. Justice McGowan concurred. Contrast their utterances then with those announced to-day. In a previous part of this opinion I have shown that section 41 has already been construed by this court (State v. Hayne, supra), and that the views herein suggested by the opinion of the majority virtually overruled that decision. Surely, twenty-six years of acquiescence in a decision on a constitutional question ought to commend it to us; but it seems nothing is too sacred to be uprooted.

Again, it is objected that under the provisions of this act the state is embarking in trade to the exclusion of her citizens. In 10 Rich. L. 491, in the case of State v. Charleston, the question of the power of the state to confer upon one of her municipal corporations the right to embark in business was denied upon the ground that the state did not possess that power herself. The gravity of the question was so great that it was submitted to the court of errors, composed, as it was, of the whole judiciary of the state law judges and chancellors; and hear what O’Neill (afterwards chief justice), as the organ of the court, said: “That the general assembly have all the powers which the corporation [city of Charleston] have exercised in their corporation in and for the whole state, I have no doubt. If they [the general assembly] thought proper, they could build a railroad with just as much propriety as a granite state house. Both might lead to an extravagant waste of money, but still the power cannot be questioned. They have dug canals and built roads, and I have no doubt they will do so again. . . . The powers of the general assembly in all these respects seem to me to be undoubted, and, if so, why may they not clothe a municipal corporation with the same powers, to be exercised for the benefit of the people of their charge? It seems to me clear that they can.” This became the unanimous judgment of the court, concurred in by Chancellors Jobe, Johnstone, Duncan, Dargan, and Wardlaw, and by Judges Withers and Whitner. This decision has been at least twice recognized by this court as law since the new constitution went into effect. This court also has recognized the power of the legislature to clothe its municipal corporations with like powers, and affirm their constitutionality.

Again, on this point we have shown that by our own decisions, as well as those of the United States Supreme Court the right to sell intoxicating liquors as a beverage is not an inalienable right in the citizen; in other words, that such a business is not of common right. Hence what Mr. Cooley says on this subject. At page 342 (6th ed.) in his work on Constitutional Limitations he says: “As every exclusive privilege is in the nature of a monopoly, it may at some time become a question of interest whether there are any, and if so what, limits to the power of the state to grant them. In former times, such grants were a favorite resort in England, not only to raise money for the personal uses of the monarch, but to reward favorites; and the abuse grew to such enormous magnitude that parliament in the time of Elizabeth, and again in the time of James I., interfered and prohibited them. What is more important to us is that in 1602 they were judicially declared to be illegal. Darcy v. Allein (Case of Monopolies) 11 Coke, 84. These, however, were monopolies in the ordinary occupations of life, and the decision upon them would not affect the special privileges most commonly granted. Where the grant is of a franchise which would otherwise not exist, no question can be made of the right of the state to make it exclusive unless the constitution forbids it, because, in contemplation of law, no one is wronged when he is only excluded from that in which he never had any right. An exclusive right to build and maintain a toll bridge, or set up a ferry, may therefore be granted; and the state may doubtless limit, by the requirements of a license, the number of persons who shall be allowed to engage in employments, the entering upon which is not a matter of common right, and which, because of their abuse, or their liability to abuse, may require special and extraordinary police supervision. The business of selling intoxicating drinks and of setting up a lottery are illustrations of such employments." Is there any consistency in denying to the present legislature the power to protect the health, the morals, and the safety of our people by regulating, and under proper agencies conducting, the business of providing pure and unadulterated liquors, when this court has repeatedly declared legislation for building railroads by county or city aid constitutional? Very ingeniously it is suggested, how can the state regulate itself?

This is specious and unsound. The people are the state; government is their agency. Does not the state run the health department, furnishing the plant necessary to conduct that beneficent work, and pay all its expenses, under a system of regulation? So, too, the state penitentiary, the lunatic asylum, the deaf and dumb institute. Look at the post-office of the general government. Then it is, again, suggested that this is a monopoly created by the state as to this matter. It may be suggested that such a term as "monopoly," as applied to a sovereign state, is a misnomer. Monopolies at the common law, and against which all Englishmen protested, were grants to individual citizens. Here the state operates the business for the benefit of all her citizens. The people are the state; the government is their agent; and any benefits under the act are enjoyed by the whole people. It will be found on an analysis that the act of Minnesota referred to in the leading opinion is right because there the state sought to absorb one of the ordinary avocations of life. The laws of the state of Connecticut were right because concerned in the liquor trade, which no citizen enjoys as a common right. So, the law of Indiana as cited in Beebe v. State, 6 Ind. 501, 63 Am. Dec. 391, being concerned as to the liquor traffic, was right. Hence Beebe v. State, adverse to the state in the exercise of this right, has been overruled. But there must be a close to this discussion. A conclusion opposite to that held by the majority of this court is inevitable. Hence I must dissent.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

C. P. ELLERBE, Superintendent of State Insurance Department, Resp't.,
v.

Charles E. BARNEY, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

A member of a mutual benefit society is personally liable for assessments regularly made during his membership, although there is no express promise on his part to pay them, where his certificate recites that it is in consideration, among other things, of his payment of such assessments, although it is made on the express condition for the forfeiture of all his rights and that the contract shall be null and void if he fails to pay any assessment when due.

(Black, Brace, and Burgess, JJ., dissent.)

NOTE.—Liability of member of benefit society to action for assessment.

The cases are very few in which the enforceability by action of assessments by a mutual benefit society has been discussed, although there are numerous cases in which the effect of a default to cause a forfeiture of membership has been decided. The case above decided is of much importance, and more fully presents the question than any other has done.

In Fogg v. Supreme Lodge Order of Golden Lion, 50 Mass. 2, the court held, where payment of an assessment had been interrupted by legal proceedings, that a part of the assessment making an amount sufficient to pay creditors, might be collected from those who had not paid, and a receiver was required to proceed with the collection; but there was no question decided in the case as to the right of members to suffer a forfeiture by nonpayment, although the law applicable to the case provided for a forfeiture on thirty days' default.

that members of an unincorporated association, known as the Knights of Pythias, formed for mutual benefit and advantage, were jointly and severally liable for the amount of sick benefits due to another member, unless their liability was restricted by the law of the order.

The same doctrine was declared in New Era Life Assn. v. Rossiter, 132 Pa. 314, but the questions raised in this case did not include that of the right of a member to suffer a forfeiture of membership and thus escape payment.

In Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. French, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 321, it was held that the giving of a premium note, stating "if not paid at maturity, said policy to be void," and taking a receipt for the premium, made the policy merely voidable at the election of the insurer in case of default of payment, but did not allow the maker to defend the note, and on this ground the mere non-payment of the note, without any demand of payment, was held insufficient to forfeit the policy, the maker being still solvent.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel payment of certain assessments made by a benefit insurance society. Affirmed.

Messrs. F. H. Bacon and Lubke & Muench, for appellant:

The association in question was doing a life insurance business on the assessment plan and its contracts are those of life insurance, just as much as the policies issued by the regular life insurance companies, hence the same rules applicable to life insurance contracts should be applied to this contract so far as possible.

Com. v. Weatherbee, 105 Mass. 149; Farmer v. State, 69 Tex. 561; Berry v. Knights Templars & Masons Life Indemnity Assn. 46 Fed. Rep. 439, affirmed, Knights Templars & Masons Life Indemnity Assn. v. Berry, 4 U. S. App. 353, 50 Fed. Rep. 511; Masonic Aid Assn. v. Taylor (S. Dak.) 21 Ins. L. J. 695; Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 299; State v. Miller, 66 Iowa, 26; Rensenhouse v. Seeley, 72 Mich. 603.

A contract of life insurance is a peculiar contract in that its obligations are unilateral. It contains no undertaking of the assured to pay premiums but simply gives him an option to pay or not, and thus continue the obligation of the association.

The nature of the association and of kindred organizations is voluntary and the members join with that understanding. The levying of an assessment places them under simply a necessity of choosing whether they will pay it, or allow their certificate to lapse. The penalty for non-payment being a cessation of the obligation of the contract.

Re Protection L. Ins. Co. 9 Biss. 188; Rood v. Railway Pass. & Freight Conductors' Mut. Ben. Assn. 31 Fed. Rep. 62; Burden v. Massachusetts Safety Fund Assn. 147 Mass. 360.

The consideration for the payment of an assessment is the continuance of the protection afforded by the association until the next assessment matures. The company becoming insolvent before the time for the payment of assessments arrives made it impossible for it to give any consideration for the assessment levied.

Re Protection L. Ins. Co. and Burdon v. Massachusetts Safety Fund Assn. supra; Atty-Gen. v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 336; Atty-Gen. v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 83 Hun, 138.

These life insurance organizations must not be confounded with the mutual fire insurance corporations where the obligation is to pay a pro rata on such losses as shall be sustained by the association. If this distinction is observed it explains the only case opposed to the views herein set forth which is—

McDonald v. Ross-Lewin, 29 Hun, 87.

The doctrine concerning liability of members of mutual fire insurance organizations is very different from that which applies in this case.

May, Ins. § 658.

In the case of McDonald v. Ross-Lewin, 29 Hun, 88, where the certificate entitled the member to its benefits, provided he continued to comply with the regulations, and that if he did not comply his payments should be forfeited, while his application contained an agreement "to accept and pay for the same subject to all the conditions of the by-laws and regulations of the association," one of which said it should be the duty of the secretary to notify members of assessments, and that each should pay within thirty days, or forfeit his membership, a member was held to have no right to escape payment of an assessment by accepting a forfeiture for non-payment of it, and that in case of such forfeiture he must also pay all assessments levied to pay losses which occurred before his forfeiture of membership became complete by expiration of the thirty days, in which he was required to pay the assessment.

A member is also held liable in a co-operative assessment insurance company to make by-monthly payments of dues required by his contract, in addition to a payment made on entering the association. Smith v. Bown, 73 Hun, 281. But the court in this case, although basing its decision in part on that of McDonald v. Ross-Lewin, holds that such by-monthly dues are not in reality assessments.

Again in Re Globe Mut. Ben. Assn., 66 Hun, 263, the general term of the supreme court in holding that infants could not become members of a co-operative or assessment insurance company laid stress on the case of McDonald v. Ross-Lewin, as showing that the nature of the contract creating a personal liability on the member was such that an infant could not make it.

But the court of appeals in affirming the case, 17 L. R. A. 547, did not touch this point, but mentioned the character of the association as one in 23 L. R. A.

which the members held meetings and acted upon reports of management and considered and passed upon by-laws, and which was therefore such that adult persons only were contemplated by the statute as entitled to membership.

In Chicago Mut. L. Indemnity Assn. v. Hunt, (Ill.) 2 L. R. A. 542, in which the right of infants to become members of the association was upheld, the court declared that while the certificate of membership was a contract, the contract was purely unilateral and that payment of assessments was wholly in the discretion of the member, with mere cessation of membership in case of failure to pay. This was declared, however, merely by way argument in respect to the eligibility of infants to membership.

A peculiar kind of policy was involved in Re Protection L. Ins. Co., 9 Biss. 188, which was not the case of a mutual benefit society or of a mutual insurance company, but one in which a policy was issued on the so-called contributory plan, by which a policy holder, having no voice in the management of the business, was to pay a specified sum on the death of another policy holder, and in default thereof forfeit his rights. The court held that there was no right in the company to enforce such payment, and, so far as the report shows, there was no agreement on the part of the policy holder to pay.

Notwithstanding the very large number of mutual benefit societies and the considerable body of decisions that have been made concerning them, the above cases are all that have been found on the question involved. Decisions as to the liability of members of mutual fire insurance companies to pay their assessments have not been here considered.

B. A. R. ,

Mrs. James E. Hereford and M. W. Huff for respondent.

Martin, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the superintendent of the insurance department of the state, as receiver of the Masonic Mutual Benefit Society of Missouri (a mutual insurance organization), to recover the amount of certain assessments levied upon the members of the association to pay death losses. The defendant was a member of the organization. Shortly before the receiver took charge, the directors of the company regularly levied against defendant assessments amounting to $140.80, which assessments he refused to pay. The regularity of the assessments is admitted. The suit was originally before a justice of the peace, where judgment was rendered against defendant, who then appealed to the circuit court. There an amended statement was filed, to which appellant demurred for the reason that it did not set forth a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled, and defendant declined to plead further, but appeared at the trial and demurred to plaintiff's evidence. The court gave judgment for plaintiff. After unsuccessfully moving for a new trial, defendant appealed to the supreme court. The case is, in effect, an agreed one, as all the facts are conceded.

Defendant became a member of the society in 1885, accepting two certificates (one in division B, the other in division C), in the nature of policies, the material parts of which follow, viz.: "This certificate of membership witnesseth that the Masonic Mutual Benefit Society of Missouri, in consideration of the representations made to it in his application for membership, and the sum of six dollars to be paid by Charles E. Barney, of St. Louis, state of Missouri, and the further sum to be paid by him to this society within twenty days after the notice, duly mailed or delivered to him, of a death occurring in the membership of division C of this society, of one dollar and sixty cents for each such death, as assessments therefor may be made, so long as he may be a member thereof, promises and agrees to and with the said Charles E. Barney well and truly to pay or cause to be paid to his children, within sixty days after due notice and satisfactory proof of the death of said Charles E. Barney have been filed in the office of the secretary of the society, for every member in good standing in said division of this society, as follows: For each member in said division of the first class, seventy cents; of the second class, seventy-five cents; of the third class, eighty-five cents; of the fourth class, ninety-five cents; of the fifth class, one dollar and five cents; of the sixth class, one dollar and twenty cents; of the seventh class, one dollar and forty cents; and of the eighth class, one dollar and fifty cents: provided, however, that the aggregate amount of the sums so paid shall in no case exceed the sum of three thousand dollars. Upon this condition, however, that, if the said Charles E. Barney shall fail to pay any assessment when the same becomes due and payable by him according to the by-laws of this society and the terms of this certificate, then this contract and agreement shall be null and void and of no effect, and the said Charles E. Barney and the beneficiary therein shall forfeit all rights accruing under this certificate. This certificate is issued by the society, and accepted by the holder and beneficiary therein, upon the following express conditions and agreements: 1st. That the same is issued and accepted subject to the provisions of the articles of association and by-laws of this society," etc. The certificates were duly executed by the president and secretary of the society. No question as to their form is raised. Afterwards, the name of the company was changed to "United Masonic Benefit Association of Missouri," and its internal laws were amended so as to fix the sum to be paid on each certificate at $2,000, and the amount of assessment for each death of a member at $6.40. The by-laws of the society bearing on the present controversy provide that "upon the death of a member, or as soon thereafter as ordered by the executive committee, each member of the association, at the time such death occurred, may be assessed, and shall pay to the secretary of the association," the regular amount of the assessment above indicated. The by-laws then immediately proceed to declare it the duty of the secretary to notify, by mail, each member of each assessment upon his certificate, and then recite that "any member failing to pay such assessment within twenty days after the date of such notice which have been served upon, sent, or given to him, shall forfeit his membership in the association, and all benefits and interests therefrom and therein: provided, that the payment of assessments after such forfeiture, or any notice to pay or subsequent assessment by the association, shall not have the effect to restore the person notified or paying to membership, or to any rights under his certificates, until his application for reinstatement shall be presented and approved by the executive committee." The defendant paid assessments until those now in dispute were called. The latter were regularly made by the proper officers of the society to pay the amounts due upon deaths of members in good standing holding valid certificates. Defendant was duly notified of these assessments. Afterwards the insurance commissioner now plaintiff, took possession of the assets of the concern, under the laws of Missouri, because of the insolvency of the company, and now seeks to compel payment of these assessments as assets for the benefit of those properly entitled to share therein.

1. It is apparent from the foregoing statement, which was prepared by Judge Barclay, that the issue in this case is one of law, to be determined by a construction of the contract disclosed in the record. On the part of the appellant, it is contended that he never became indebted for the assessments levied against him, but that he had the option of forfeiting his rights under the certificate by declining to pay them, which forfeiture left the company without any right to collect them. If this is a proper construction of the contract, the judgment will have to be reversed. If, however, these assessments constituted a liability of the appellant from the date of their levy, payable after notice given according to the by-laws, then the action of the lower court will have to be affirmed. In his contention the appellant argues that the certificate held by him constituted a contract of life insurance, which, in a general sense, may be conceded, inasmuch as it provides for payment of an ascertainable sum upon the death of the holder. It is next argued that, being a contract of life insurance, it must necessarily possess the distinguishing features imputed to such a contract by the courts, in being a unilateral or one-sided undertaking of the assured, as to all future payments required of him. If he chooses to pay them the company is bound to continue the insurance. If he declines to make further payments, the insurance ends, without imposing on him any liability on account of them. I am sensible of the danger, in construing contracts, of attaching undue importance to particular words and phrases as controlling the intention of the parties, and overruling the presence and effect of other parts. All contracts should be construed with reference to the general object and purpose for which they were entered into by the contracting parties and a rational and harmonious effect given to all the parts, if possible. The construction that this is a unilateral contract, in like manner and effect as a policy of life insurance, I propose to consider briefly on principle, and not on the analogy of names, or accidental use of concurring phrases. The unilateral feature contended for in this contract has been very generally imposed upon the contract of the regular, old-line, premium-collecting life insurance companies. These companies were unable to commence business except upon capital paid in by the members, or stockholders, to be used in meeting death losses as they occurred. Until called for, the capital, along with all premiums not wanted for expenses, was required to be invested for profit and accumulation. The premiums were paid annually, and invariably in advance. Upon payment of the first premium, as a condition precedent, the assured received a policy covering him for one year, with the option to continue it by payment of other premiums. This payment constituted the full consideration of value to be paid during the year of insurance. Nothing in the shape of dues or assessments could be exacted from him for the period covered by the premium paid. If any of the old line companies should suddenly stop insuring, and decline to issue another policy, every policy outstanding would be paid from the accumulated capital as it matured. An inability to do so would put it out of line, in the business of insurance, and indicate that it had not been conducted and managed according to the principles upon which it was founded.

2. The certificate in controversy differs materially from the premium-paying policies of the old capital-stock companies. It is the undertaking of a corporation organized on an entirely different basis. The Masonic Mutual Benefit Society of Missouri belongs to that class of life insurance companies known among insurance men by the name of "fraternal beneficiary associations." The prototype of these organizations is met with in the friendly benefit societies of England appearing more than a century ago, which made provision for the relief of members in sickness, and for payment of a small sum at death, generally for defrayment of funeral expenses. The organization of the modern fraternal beneficiary company consists of an association of members who agree to assist each other and their families on occasions of disability and death, by contributing money and means for aid and relief. On joining the association, each member becomes bound to assist the others in the mode and for the object pointed out in the articles and by-laws of the association. The managing officers, whether incorporated or not, represent the association, and discharge the function of enforcing and carrying out the purposes of the compact. Hence, the certificate of membership in such an organization is a contract with every member of it, to be enforced by the managing officers as representatives or trustees for all the members of the concern. When the member joins, he pays the admission fee, which is used to defray necessary expenses, but which is altogether too small to constitute a fund or capital wherewith to satisfy death losses. No fund or capital is kept on hand or invested for such a purpose. Indeed, the economy underlying the plan of the organization aims at doing away with the expense and loss incident to management, investment, and accumulation of capital. As a substitute therefore, each member promises to contribute an equal share with every other member upon occasion of every death in the membership, which is collected and paid over by the officers of the association to the wife or children of the deceased member, as the case may be. The ascertainment and declaration of death losses is left to the members of the association, and their action in that behalf is known as an assessment. They are bound to make these assessments on occasion of every death and the wife or children of the deceased member or other beneficiary have the right to compel them to make and collect the assessments inuring to their benefit. It is manifest that these assessments, in their nature, bear a near resemblance to the dues incident to membership in a friendly society, and constitute a consideration for the promised insurance of the association, materially differing from the annual premium stock companies. When considered in the light of society dues, it will be admitted that a person cannot, by discontinuing his membership, escape the obligation of paying those dues which accrued before the termination of his membership. I am not aware of anything in the organic structure of those organizations, as thus defined, and to which the one in question seems to belong, which could bring them in conflict with the policy of the law. On the contrary, it will be found that they have very generally merited the approbation of the public. It is only when they have substituted for their fraternity dues promises of endowment to living members, payable irrespective of disability or death, that they have been justly subjected to the charge of departing from the principles upon which fraternal beneficiary associations can be safely conducted.

3. It is necessary next to consider whether or not the contract disclosed by the record in this case is in conformity with the avowed object of the association, to furnish aid and relief to the families of deceased members, and is sufficient in its phraseology and provisions to carry out that object, and made it beneficially effective as to all of them. Of course, the language of the certificate must be interpreted in connection with the by-laws and articles of association alluded to in its body. The certificate is expressly declared to be "issued and accepted subject to the provisions of the articles of association and by-laws of the society." Section 1 of article 7 of the by-laws provides that "upon the death of a member, or as soon thereafter as ordered by the executive committee, each member of the association at the time such death occurred may be assessed, and shall pay to the secretary of the association, a fixed sum, according to the class of which the assessed was a member at that time, based upon the aggregate amount of benefit to which he or the beneficiary named therein, or in section 1, article 6, of the by-laws, is entitled under his certificate or certificates of membership." The assessments in this case were at the rate of $6.40 each, in behalf of the beneficiaries of fifty-eight members, who died while the appellant was a member of the association in good standing, amounting to the aggregate sum of $140.80. The beneficiaries of the deceased members must have acquired a right to these assessments intended for their relief; otherwise, the primary object of the association as a society for the benefit of widows and orphans would fail. The assessments could have no value or meaning, if they conferred no right on the beneficiaries to collect the amount so assessed, and a corresponding obligation on the part of the members to pay them. The principal, if not the only, fund provided for payment of them consisted in the obligation imposed by the by-laws of the members. Their liability took the place of capital and accumulated funds, and constituted substantially the only assets provided by the members for securing the aid and relief contemplated in the compact of association. Thus we perceive that, independent of the language of the certificate of membership, the liability to pay assessments by the members was imposed, by the by-laws and articles of association, as a debt or burden incident to membership. This debt or burden, according to the by-laws recited, accrued as soon as the death occurred and the assessment was declared. It was payable at once, but, according to the third section of the same article of by-laws, the time for payment was extended to twenty days after notice. The time and manner of serving notice are definitely prescribed. It then proceeds to declare that "any member failing to pay such assessments within twenty days after the date of such notice which have been served upon, sent or given to, him, shall forfeit his membership in the association, and all benefits and interests therefrom and therein." There is nothing whatever in this language, providing, as it does, for the forfeiture of membership and discontinuance of the rights incident to it, which suggests or intimates a discharge from past society debts and dues. In the first section of the article the assessment is expressly declared to be binding as a demand which the members must pay. In the second section, he forfeits his membership and rights by failure to pay after a notice of twenty days. A condition of forfeiture of rights is a well-known feature added to many contracts, which does not in itself discharge the obligations which have already accrued under it. Such is the case of forfeitures in leases, and in most of the policies of mutual fire insurance companies. The natural effect of the forfeiture is to cut off the possibility of future obligations, but not to disturb the validity of past indebtedness. Something very positive would have to appear, either in the express declaration of the contract, or as a necessary implication from its nature, to give it a different effect. No such declaration appears, and I have endeavored to show that precisely the contrary is implied in the nature and purpose of the contract in question. Right here I may add that the fact that the obligations attempted to be enforced in this case rise, independently of the provisions of the certificate of membership, from the constitution and by-laws of the association, goes a great way, in my mind, to clothe them with the features and character of society dues, and to distinguish them from the premium of the old-line insurance companies.

4. In coming now to consider the language of the certificate itself, I think it will appear to be little else than a recital of the contract which we have found to be imposed on every member by the constitution and by-laws. It promises to pay to the children of the appellant, sixty days after notice of his death, a certain percentage on every member of the association in good standing, according to the class to which he belongs, provided that no payment of such percentage shall be permitted to exceed, in the aggregate, the sum of $2,000. As we have seen that the organic structure of the association did not contemplate that this percentage on the membership should be paid from the accumulated capital, but from amounts to meet death losses, it is natural to expect some allusion in the certificate to the prevailing method of raising funds with which to make good the promised benefits of the association. Accordingly, we find it expressly provided in the certificate that the benefits inuring to the children of the appellant are agreed to be paid by the association "in consideration" of the admission fee "originally paid in by appellant, and the further sum to be paid in by him to this society," of the assessment made on him for every death occurring in the membership of the division to which he belonged, "so long as he shall be a member thereof." It thus appears that the obligation imposed on him by the by-laws to pay the assessments against him is expressly declared to be of the consideration for the benefits promised to his children by the certificate. The only way that he can make good the consideration for the certificate is to keep his obligation to pay the assessments. And I may repeat that these obligations constituted the principal resources placed at the command of the association, to enable it to pay the death losses. It is true that the certificate repeats the provision in the by-laws which terminates membership by nonpayment of assessments. But it goes no further than to debar the appellant of his rights, thus leaving his liabilities as they existed at the date of the forfeiture. The declaration that the certificate, after forfeiture, shall be null and void, relates to its future, not its past, effect. Now, it appears from admitted facts that the appellant was in full possession of all the rights of membership at the date of these assessments, and that he continued to hold them up to the instant of forfeiture by his failure to pay such assessments. If he had died after the assessments against him, and before his failure to pay them, his children would have been entitled to the promised benefits of the certificate. Having during all that time had the benefits of the certificates upon consideration that he would pay his assessments, he is not in a position to withhold the consideration, by refusing to keep his obligation. I am not prepared to approve the startling proposition that the appellant should have the privilege of paying or withholding, at his pleasure, the consideration promised for carrying a risk, after the risk had been carried. I do not regard this contract unilateral, in the sense of relieving the assured from liability for insurance carried and consideration earned. No unilateral contract has ever been permitted to accomplish such an unjust result.

I am satisfied that the judgment of the lower court is without error, and should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Barclay, Gantt, and Sherwood, JJ., concur.

Macfarlane, J., not sitting.

Black, J., dissenting:

I do not agree to the majority opinion filed in this case. Each certificate, it will be seen, contains this stipulation: "Upon this condition, however, that if the said Charles E. Barney shall fail to pay any assessment when the same becomes due and payable by him according to the by-laws of this society and the terms of this certificate, then this contract and agreement shall be null and void and of no effect, and the said Charles E. Barney and the beneficiary therein shall forfeit all rights accruing under this certificate." After the certificates had been issued, and various assessments levied and paid by the defendant, the name of the association was changed to that of the "United Masonic Benefit Association of Missouri." The by-laws were also amended so as to make the amount to be paid by the association on each certificate the fixed sum of $2,000, and so as to fix the amount to be paid by the insured for each death loss at the sum of $6.40. The amended by-laws which have any bearing upon this case are as follows: (1) "Upon the death of a member, or so soon thereafter as ordered by the executive committee, each member of the association shall pay to the secretary of the association a fixed sum, according to the class of which the assessed was a member at that time, based upon the aggregate amount of benefits to which he or the beneficiary named therein, or in section 1 of article 6 of these by-laws, is entitled under his certificate of membership." (3) By this by-law it is made the duty of the secretary of the company to notify each member of the assessment made upon him; and it then provides that "any member failing to pay such assessment within twenty days after the date of such notice which has been served upon, sent, or given to, him shall forfeit his membership in the association, and all benefits and interests therefrom and therein; provided, that any payment of assessments after such forfeiture, or any notice to pay a subsequent assessment by the association, shall not have the effect to restore the person notified or paying to membership, or to any rights under his certificates, until his application for reinstatement shall be presented to and approved by the executive committee." The defendant paid several assessments under and pursuant to these amended by-laws. An assessment of $6.40 on account of each certificate was duly levied upon defendant on the 4th of December, 1891, of which he was properly notified by notice dated and mailed on the 20th of January, 1892; and on the 25th of January, 1892, twenty other assessments, of $4.40 each, were duly levied, of which he was notified on the 1st of February, 1892. On the next day the company was adjudged insolvent, and was then placed in the hands of the superintendent of insurance. The defendant failed to pay the several assessments levied on the 4th of December, 1891, and on the 25th of January, amounting in all to $140.80, and it is these assessments which the superintendent seeks to recover by this suit.

The question whether these assessments constitute debts, to recover which suits may be maintained by the company or the superintendent of the insurance department, must be determined by the contracts; for it is the duty of the court to give effect to the contracts which the parties have made, and it has no right to build up a contract for them. This court, in defining a life insurance contract, adopted and approved the language of Mr. Justice Gray in the case of Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149, where it is said: "This is none the less a contract of mutual insurance upon the life of the insured because the amount to be paid by the corporation is not a gross sum, but a sum graduated by the number of members holding similar contracts, nor because a portion of the premiums is to be paid upon the uncertain periods of the deaths of such members, nor because, in case of nonpayment of assessments by any member, the contract provides no means of enforcing payment thereof, but merely declares the contract to be at an end, and all moneys previously paid by the assured, and all dividends and credits accruing to him, to be forfeited to the company." State v. Merchants' Exch. Mut. Benev. Soc., 73 Mo. 160. There can be no doubt but these certificates issued to the defendant are life insurance contracts; and it accomplishes nothing to say they are in a general sense life insurance contracts. Being life insurance contracts, the principle applicable to such contracts in general is applicable to them, though the company denominates itself a "benefit association." Speaking of these associations, Mr. May says: "Their certificates of membership often resemble, both in form and substance, ordinary policies of life insurance; and the courts have, with great uniformity, treated them as substantially life insurance companies, applying to them and to the mutual relation of the members the rules and principles applicable to the contract of life insurance." 2 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 550a. According to the better authority, an ordinary contract of life insurance is an entire insurance for life, subject to forfeiture for non-payment of any premium. New York Ins. Co. v. Statham, 93 U. S. 24, 23 L. ed. 789; Manhattan L. Ins. Co. v. Smith, 44 Ohio St. 156, 58 Am. Rep. 106. In ordinary life policies, requiring payment of premiums at stated times, and providing for a forfeiture in case of non-payment of any premium, it is optional with the insured whether he will pay or not. Such contracts are unilateral, and the insured can pay, or forfeit all that he has paid, as he may elect. The premiums do not constitute an indebtedness against him in favor of the insurer. Worthington v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co. 41 Conn. 379, 19 Am. Rep. 495; Goodwin v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 485. "The payment of the premium is optional with the insured, and if he make default the insurer has no other remedy than the avoidance of the policy. If the policy be payable only at the option of the insurer, it may be different." 2 May, Ins. 3d ed. § 841a. The same principle applies to certificates issued by mutual benefit societies. Re Protection L. Ins. Co. 9 Biss. 188, Fed. Cas. No. 11,444; Niblack, Mut. Ben. Soc. § 276. The law on this subject is correctly stated in Bacon on Benefit Societies and Life Insurance, at section 357, where it is said: "In a contract of life insurance there is generally no absolute undertaking of the insured to pay the premiums or assessments, and consequently no personal liability therefor. The payment of the premium or assessments is only a condition precedent of the liability of the company. The insured does not promise to pay the premiums, and the company only promises to pay if it has received the agreed consideration. Therefore, the insured may pay or not, as he pleases. He has the perfect right to do either, and need give no excuse for his choice. If he does not pay, the contract is ended. It follows, therefore, that the premium or assessment is only a debt when there is an absolute promise to pay embodied in the contract."

Now, if we turn to the certificates issued to the defendant, it will be seen there is no obligation imposed upon him to pay the assessments. Payment of the assessments within the designated time after notice is simply a condition to the continuation of the insurance. The condition written in the contract is that, if the said Charles E. Barney fail to pay any assessment when due and payable, "then this contract and agreement shall be null and void, and of no effect; and the said Charles E. Barney and the beneficiary therein shall forfeit all rights accruing under this certificate." Void as to whom? Not as to Barney alone, but as to the insurer and the insured. Such is the plain language of the contract. That this is the legal effect of the contract, as expressed in the certificates themselves, seems clear to the writer.

But stress is laid upon the amended by-laws, which charge the amount of the assessment for each loss from $1.60 to $6.40, and the amount to be paid on each certificate to the fixed sum of $2,000. We cannot see that these charges affect the question in hand in the least. If the assessments are to be regarded as an indebtedness from the defendant to the association, it is because of the second amended by-law, which provides that upon the death of a member each living member may be assessed, and shall pay to the association, a fixed sum, according to the class of which the assessed was a member. This by-law must be taken in connection with the third, which provides that any member failing to pay the assessment within the designated time shall forfeit his membership in the association, and all benefits therefrom. These by-laws point out what the association and its officers are to do upon the death of a member. They prescribe the procedure to be pursued, and that is their object and purpose. They are to be taken together, and in connection with the certificates. When this is done, they do not change the terms of the contract from that expressed in the certificate, so far as concerns the liability of the insured to pay the assessments. It is still optional with the insured, whether he will pay, or suffer a forfeiture. This case is wholly unlike those cases where mutual insurance companies insure property against loss or destruction, and in consideration therefor receive the note or notes of the insured; the policy containing a provision that it is to be void in case of a failure of the insured to pay the note or notes at maturity, or in case of a failure to pay any assessments made thereon. In many cases of that character, it is held that neither the insolvency of the company nor the cancellation of the policy deprives the company of the right to make and collect assessments to pay losses which accrued while the policy was in force. In such cases the policy and the notes are but parts of one transaction, and, taken together, constitute mutual agreements to be performed by each party. It is manifest that such cases have no bearing on the question now in hand. In the case of New Era Life Assn. v. Roskier, 182 Pa. 814, the assignee of the company sued the defendant to recover certain assessments levied upon a life policy. The case shows that the defendant signed an application in which it was stated: "The members and beneficiary shall be jointly and severally liable for all death claims accruing during life membership, which shall become due within thirty days after mailing a notice showing a statement of the death," etc. The policy lapsed by reason of non-payment of an assessment, and the insured ceased to be a member. The defendant was held liable for assessments levied to pay death losses which accrued while he was a member, and he was held liable for the reason that such were the plain terms of his express agreement. As to the case of McDonald v. Ross-Lewin, 29 Hun, 88, it is sufficient to state that the defendant there also signed an application for membership, in which he, in terms, promised and agreed to accept the certificate, and pay therefor as provided by the by-laws and regulations of society. The two cases last cited are much relied upon by the plaintiff, but they are unlike this one; for, while the certificates issued to this defendant recite the fact that he made representations in an application for membership, still the applications are not in evidence, and there is nothing in the recitals from which it can be inferred that he agreed to be personally liable for any assessment. The certificates issued to the defendant, and the by-laws, taken together, show—and they only show—that the company agreed, in each case, to pay the children of the defendant, at his death, the sum of $2,000, provided he made payment for each assessment within the designated time after notice; and a failure to pay any assessment is, by the terms of the contract, made to operate as a forfeiture of all that has been paid. The contracts are unilateral, and in respect of the liability of the insured to pay, and thereby keep them in force and effect, do not differ from an ordinary life policy requiring the payment of premiums at stated times. The payment of all assessments up to a given date continued the insurance until the expiration of twenty days after date of notice of another assessment, and it was entirely optional with the defendant whether he would pay the further assessment, or suffer a forfeiture. It follows that the defendant was not liable to the company in a suit by it to recover the assessments, nor is he liable to the plaintiff.

- *1. While a railway company has no right to interfere with a United States mail agent in the discharge of his official duties, yet it has the right, and it is its duty, to prevent him, while on its trains, from continuing any dangerous practice, of which it has notice, which is liable to cause injury to passengers and others lawfully on its premises; and, if the practice is one from which such injury might be reasonably anticipated, it is not necessary, in order to charge the company with this duty, that on some former occasion a like injury had occurred.
- *2. Evidence considered, and held sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the mail agents on defendant's trains had been so long and so frequently in the habit of throwing mail sacks from moving trains upon the station platform, used and occupied by passengers and others lawfully there, as to charge the defendant with notice of the fact; also, in finding that this practice was one from which such injuries as those sustained by plaintiff by being struck by a mail sack might have been reasonably anticipated; also, in finding that the part of the platform where the injury was sustained was one which was in the habit of being used by passengers and others by the license or implied invitation of the company.
- *3. Held, also, that the damages awarded are not so large as to warrant this court in setting aside the verdict as excessive.

NOTE.—The liability of a railroad company for negligence of mail clerks in the employ of the United States is we believe a novel question without precedents.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County overruling a motion for a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. W. Root, with Messrs. W. H. Norris and Flandrau, Squires & Cutcheon, for appellant:

The grossest negligence of the mail agent on this occasion only will not charge the railway company. No one is bound to anticipate, or can be held responsible for not anticipating, what has never yet happened.

S. 15 Wall. 534, 537-539, 21 L. ed. 210-212.

If the appellant is responsible for this accident, any damages beyond a merely nominal sum are excessive, and the manifest result of the proclivity of the jury against a railroad company and of sympathy, without expense to themselves, provoked and kept in tension by the dramatic display of the respondent's inviolable condition.

For breach of duty, a negligent wrongdoer, as distinguished from a willful wrongdoer, is not liable for all remotest consequences, however distinctly traceable to his wrong.

Messrs. Davis, Kellogg & Severance, for respondent:

The plaintiff is, as a matter of law, entitled to recover if she establishes: First, the dangerous practice; second, the injury by reason thereof; and third, that she is suffering as a result of said accident.

This testimony abundantly justifies the finding of the jury with reference to the injuries of the plaintiff, and is of such a character that a verdict for a much larger amount could not be deemed excessive.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action for personal injuries occasioned to the plaintiff by being struck by a mail bag thrown by a United States mail agent from a mail car belonging to the defendant on one of its passenger trains at the station on its road at Durand, Wis. At this station the railway track runs north and south, and the depot and platform adjoin it on the west. The platform is of the width of 12 feet on all sides of the depot, and, of the width of 8 feet, extends along the track in two wings,—one to the south about 75 feet, and one to the north about 100 feet, to the south line of a street which crosses the railway at right angles. The principal part of the village lies north and west of the station. The passenger train run on this road consisted of an engine and tender, mail and express car, baggage car, and two passenger coaches, in the order named; the mail end of the combination car being next the tender, the entire length of the train being about equal to the entire length of the platform. Trains from the south usually stopped so that the nose of the engine would be 10 or 15 feet beyond the north end of the platform, out on the street crossing. On the day in question the plaintiff came from the village to the station, accompanying a young girl, for the purpose of seeing her safely upon the north-bound passenger train. Approaching the station from the north, she stepped up on the north end of the platform just as the train was pulling in from the south, and walked hurriedly along towards the south end of the platform, where the passenger coaches would be when the train stopped; and, as she claims, when she had reached a point on the platform some 20 or 25 feet from the depot, she was struck by a mail sack thrown from the mail car while the train was still in motion. Inasmuch as the mail agent was not the servant of the defendant, it is not claimed that the railway company would be liable for his negligence, however gross, on this occasion only. To render it liable, as negligent, for the negligence of the mail agent, this government employé must have practiced a dangerous method of discharging mail sacks on the platform at this station so habitually, or so frequently, as to charge the company, as part of its duty to its passengers and others occupying its depot platform by its invitation or license, with notice, actual or implied, of his negligence or recklessness. While the railway company had no power to interfere with the mail agent in the discharge of his official duties, yet it was its right, as well as duty, to prevent him, while on its cars and on its premises, from continuing any negligent practice, of which it had notice, which was liable to cause injury to passengers and others lawfully there. The case comes fully within the rule which enjoins care, not only on the part of the company's servant, but also like care in preventing injury from the wrongful act of others whom it permits to come upon its premises. The negligence charged against the defendant is that it had notice of a long-continued custom of the mail agents of throwing heavy mail bags from the cars, while still moving at a high rate of speed, onto the platform occupied by persons lawfully there, in such a reckless and negligent manner as to endanger their safety, and that, notwithstanding such notice, it took no steps to prevent this negligent practice, or to warn people of the danger. The answer admitted that the platform is a public place for the purposes of railway travel to and from the station, and for the transaction of railway business with the defendant, but denied all the allegations of negligence in the complaint. On the trial the defense was that mail bags were never thrown from the car upon the platform while the train was in motion and the plaintiff, instead of being struck by the mail bag, walked against it, and stumbled over it, while lying on the platform; and, so far as plaintiff's right to recover was concerned, the case was tried squarely and exclusively upon this issue.

We are satisfied that the evidence justified the jury in finding that plaintiff was struck by a mail bag thrown from the cars while still in motion, and that the practice of throwing mail bags upon the platform before the train had come to a stop had been so frequent and long continued as to charge the defendant with notice of it. It is not claimed that the company had ever made any attempt to stop this practice, and it is expressly admitted that no notice or warning had been given, either to the plaintiff or the public, that it was the habit of mail clerks to throw out the mail bags while the train was in motion. Leaving out of account extreme instances testified to, the fair import of the evidence produced in behalf of the plaintiff is that it had for a long time been the practice of the mail clerks to throw out the mail sacks while the train had still sufficient speed to run from 10 to 30 feet after they had thrown the sacks. Hence, in view of the evidence as to where the head of the engine usually stood when brought to a full stop, and as to the length of the engine and tender, the jury was warranted in concluding that the act of the mail clerk on this particular occasion was not an exceptional one, but that the sack or bag was thrown out upon a part of the platform where he had been in the habit of throwing it. It follows that, if this platform was used by passengers and others rightfully there by defendant's invitation or license, and that this practice of throwing out mail sacks from a moving train might reasonably be apprehended to result in injury to such persons, then the defendant was guilty of negligence which was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. It was not necessary to charge defendant with negligence to show that on some former occasion a like injury had happened. The practice of throwing loaded mail bags out of a moving train upon a platform occupied by the public is itself a dangerous act, and the accident which did happen on this occasion was just such a one as might be reasonably anticipated; at least, the jury had a right to so find. Carpenter v. Boston & A. R. Co. 97 N. Y. 494, 49 Am. Rep. 540; Snow v. Fitchburg R. Co. 186 Mass. 552, 49 Am. Rep. 40.

Defendant's main contention, however, is that, upon the arrival of a train from the south, this north end of the platform was not used by passengers, and that it had no reason to anticipate that it would be so used. Of course, it stands to reason that on such occasions that part of the platform would be used in part for the purposes of receiving and delivering mail, baggage, and express matter; but it was nowhere suggested, either in the pleadings, or on the trial, or in the requests to charge, that the plaintiff was not rightfully on this part of the platform, or that it was not rightfully used by the public, or that there was any distinction, in that respect, between this and any other part of the platform. On the contrary, it seems to have been assumed and conceded throughout the trial that this part of the platform was rightfully used by passengers and the public generally, precisely the same as any other part of it. Moreover, while there is very little direct evidence as to the use of this part of the platform by passengers on the arrival of trains from the south, yet it appears all through the testimony that it was used by bystanders by the license of the defendant, and by customers by its implied invitation, and it is conceded that plaintiff was lawfully there on this occasion. All persons having duties to perform incidental to the departure and arrival of passengers, and all persons having business with the company on its premises at a station, are entitled to the same protection as passengers, or intended passengers, while there. The plaintiff was a customer of the defendant, within the essence and spirit of the rule, and was entitled to protection as such.

It is claimed that the damages ($10,000) are excessive. The verdict is certainly a large one. The immediate injury—a wound on the knee—seems, in and of itself, a comparatively small one. But it is claimed, and the evidence tended to prove, that this caused a nervous shock, which resulted in the development of heart disease, and in what the physicians called "traumatic neurosis," which, being translated from Greek into English, simply means a disease of the nerves caused by a wound; that these injuries are permanent, and have rendered the plaintiff a helpless invalid. The cause might seem inadequate to produce such serious consequences. It is one of the class of cases where there is a chance for "malingering," and where about the only available evidence tending to prove the connection of cause and effect, aside from chronological coincidence, is that of medical experts, which, it must be admitted, is often subject to the suspicion of dealing largely in doubtful speculation and surmise. But it is well known that there are many genuine cases of serious and permanent injuries resulting from what at first seem very trivial causes. In this case the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff was, prior to this accident, a healthy, active woman; that immediately after the accident she was compelled to take to her bed, and has ever since been almost helpless, and has grown worse, rather than better; and, while suggestions were made that she was shamming, no substantial evidence was produced to support these assertions. The expert evidence on behalf of the plaintiff was to the effect that these ailments were real, that they were the result of the injury complained of, and that they were permanent; and the defendant produced practically no evidence to rebut this. If the plaintiff's alleged present diseases are real, and are the proximate result of the injury (and under the evidence we cannot say that such are not the facts), the damages awarded are not so large as to warrant this court in saying that they are excessive.

A new trial was also asked on the ground of newly discovered evidence, but, as this point is not argued, it must be deemed abandoned. We may say, however, that we have examined the affidavits on the subject, and are clearly of opinion that there was no error in refusing a new trial on that ground.

Order affirmed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

ROOT & MCBRIDE BROS., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

(51 Ohio St.—)

- *1. A mortgagee of personal property, in possession after condition broken, is the legal owner, entitled to retain the possession, subject to a liability to account for the surplus of its value after the satisfaction of his own claim.
- *2. The liability of the mortgagee, in possession after condition broken, to account for the surplus, is a credit of the mortgagor, and may be attached, as such, by the process of garnishment.
- *3. In a proceeding in attachment commenced by a plaintiff residing in one county against a defendant residing in another county of this state, a debtor of the defendant, residing in the county where the suit is commenced, may be garnished on the ground of the nonresidence of the defendant, and required to pay the money owing by him to the defendant into court, although service by publication, only, has been made on the defendant.
- *4. The proceedings of a justice of the peace after jurisdiction of the subject-matter has attached are to be liberally construed. Therefore, an order made by a justice of the peace upon a garnishee, in a proceeding in attachment, after service of notice upon him, and the rendition of judgment for the plaintiff, to pay the money owing by him to the defendant into court, presupposes a finding that the garnishee is so indebted, and cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the transcript fails to show that such finding has been made.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Lucas County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover possession of certain personal property claimed by plaintiffs under a bill of sale, but which defendants claimed to hold by reason of garnishment; proceedings instituted to secure a claim against the one who executed the bill of sale. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Harris & Thurston, for plaintiff in error:

A justice of the peace in this state has limited and inferior jurisdiction. The proceedings in the cases before the justice were special statutory proceedings.

*Headnotes by the Court.

NOTE.—The nonresidence of a creditor as affecting the power of the courts to subject his demand to claims against him has been recently presented in a note to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Smith (Misc.) 19 L. R. A. 577; also in the more recent cases of Douglas v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 112; Bragg 23 L. R. A.

The necessary jurisdictional facts do not appear in the records of the justice.

The record alone must show jurisdiction, and cannot be aided by extrinsic evidence of any kind.

Proceedings in attachment and garnishment are special statutory proceedings. In the exercise of such powers the record must show affirmatively compliance with the statute, even if the court is one of general common-law jurisdiction. Otherwise the judgments will be void.

Recitals on the docket, such as "summons duly served," "proof of publication duly made," etc., are not sufficient. They are not the facts that are necessary to show jurisdiction. They are merely the conclusions or findings of the justice of the peace, which he has no authority to make. The facts must appear upon the record, and not conclusions.

Freem. Judgm. §§ 517, 519, 527, also cases before cited.

It is necessary that summons issue for the defendant and be returned not served, etc., before any steps can be taken to acquire or make constructive service, even if property is attached.

Rev. Stat. 6496; Swan's Treatise, 13th ed. pp. 49, 50.

The justice has power—jurisdiction—to continue the cause for publication, and further proceed in the case, only on the concurrence of two conditions: (1) That the summons has not been and cannot be served on the defendant in the county; and (2) when property of the defendant has been taken under the order of attachment and these jurisdictional facts must appear of record.

Without the concurrence of both of such conditions a continuance of the cause by the justice is unauthorized—a nullity.

v. Gaynor (Wis.) 21 L. R. A. 161; and Neufelder v. German Am. Ins. Co. (Wash.) 23 L. R. A. 297.

The question in the present case respecting a nonresident of the county in which suit is brought is somewhat novel.

If property or money in the hands of the garnishee is relied upon as a ground of jurisdiction, that fact must appear of record, and there must be a finding of the justice that the garnishee had property of the defendants in their possession, etc.

Without such finding no order can be made on garnishees, and no judgment can be rendered against defendants served only by publication, if the publication were sufficiently shown.

Liberality of construction and consideration does not apply to jurisdictional facts and matters.

Robbins v. Clemmens, supra.

Property not within the jurisdiction of the court, nor within reach of its process, cannot be bound by notice of garnishment any more than it can be taken by manual attachment.

If the property is not held by the garnishee within a jurisdiction where the process of the court may run, so that he may turn it out, if he shall so desire, to the officer holding the process, it is not bound, nor is the garnishee answerable for it, unless possibly by his own negligence or wrongful act.

National Bank of New London v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. supra; Sheldon v. Newton, 30 Ohio St. 494.

Minshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action below was a suit in replevin brought in the common pleas of Lucas county by Root & McBride Bros. against Davis & Bros. for the possession of certain specific personal property, described as twenty-three cases of merchandise and some other articles, recently owned by A. J. Stewart & Co., of Crawford county. It appears from the answer and cross-petition of the defendants, and the testimony, that on August 23, 1888, Stewart & Co., being then the owners of the property, and residing and doing business at a town in Crawford county, this state, were indebted to Davis & Bros. in the sum of $195.50, and, to secure this indebtedness, executed a chattel mortgage on the property, on which Davis & Co. made the proper affidavit, and duly filed it for record in the proper office, and on the same day, in pursuance of the provisions of the mortgage, took possession of the property. On August 28, Davis & Bros. boxed up the goods, and on the 29th shipped the same to their place of business, in Toledo, Lucas county. Previous to this, on August 27, Luce & Co. commenced an action before a justice of the peace of Lucas county, against Stewart & Co., to recover a claim of theirs, and caused an attachment to issue, on the ground of the nonresidence of the defendants, and caused notice of garnishment to be served upon Davis & Bros., mortgagees. On August 28, Shaw & Co. commenced two similar actions against Stewart & Co., before the same justice of the peace, and like proceedings were had as in the case of Luce & Co. On October 11, 1888, notice by publication having been given as required by law, the justice rendered judgments in the several cases, and ordered the garnishees, Davis & Co., to deliver the property of the defendants held by them into court, and also to pay the money due from them to the defendants into court. Before this, on August 29th, after the goods had been delivered by Davis & Bros. to the railroad agent at the depot in Crawford county, to be shipped to Toledo, but while still at the depot, Stewart & Co. made and delivered to Root & McBride Bros. a bill of sale of the property to secure a debt due them, of some $800. On the next day they notified Davis & Bros. of their bill of sale, offered to pay the amount of their claim, and demanded the property. This was refused by Davis & Bros. because of the proceedings in garnishment against them. Luce & Co. and Shaw & Co. were made defendants, and filed answers and cross-petitions. The court found for the defendants upon the pleadings and evidence, and rendered judgment in their favor for the value of the property taken under the writ, and—the claim of the defendants, Davis & Bros. having been paid by the defendants during the pendency of the action—ordered the amounts due Luce & Co. and Shaw & Co. to be paid them according to priority. The judgment was affirmed on error by the circuit court.

The principal question in the case is whether the service of garnishment on Davis & Bros.

in Lucas county gave to Luce & Co., as well as to Shaw & Co., a lien upon the property covered by the mortgage to Davis & Bros., or on any indebtedness of the latter to the mortgagors, Stewart & Co.,—the property being at the time of the service in Crawford county, the residence of the latter. We think it did. At the time of the service of process on the garnishees, they had, as mortgagees, taken possession of the property under the provisions of the mortgage, so that, irrespective of its physical location, they were the owners of it, subject only to a liability to account to the mortgagor for the surplus of its value after satisfying their claim. In other words, their relation had changed from that of creditor to that of debtor of the mortgagor for whatever this surplus might be. Robinson v. Fitch, 26 Ohio St. 659, 662; Carly v. Fenstermaker, 14 Ohio St. 457, 461; Lindemann v. Ingham, 36 Ohio St. 1, 9; Morgan v. Spangler, 20 Ohio St. 38; Kingsbury v. Phelps, Wright (Ohio) 871; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1031. And this credit of the mortgagors was liable to be attached, and was attached by the service of the process of attachment upon the debtors, Davis & Bros., and made them liable to the attaching creditors for whatever might be found due from them on the value of the property after satisfying the amount of their own claim.

It is claimed, however, that, without a physical seizure of the property in Lucas county, the magistrate had no jurisdiction to order the payment of the amount due from the garnishees into court, as no personal service was obtained upon the defendants in the action. A number of cases are cited in support of this proposition. But they are all cases where the defendant was a nonresident of the state in which the action was commenced. It may be conceded that the credits of a nonresident debtor, without personal service upon him, cannot be attached, in this state, by simply serving the process of garnishment upon his debtor residing within the jurisdiction of the court issuing the process. That would be to give to the laws an extraterritorial effect. In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. May, 25 Ohio St. 347, it was held that the indebtedness of the company to a person residing in this state could be attached in the courts of a sister state without personal service, but this seems opposed to the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538; Reno, Nonresidents, § 140. A number of the state courts take the same view. Id. § 216.

But as between citizens of the state, subject to its laws, the case is wholly different. While the situs of a credit is generally regarded as that of the creditor, it would be quite as reasonable to treat it as that of the debtor, for the debtor is the person from whom the money is derived that makes the credit available as a thing of value; so that there is nothing in the nature of things forbidding the place of the debtor being regarded as the situs of a credit. And hence it is competent for the legislature to enact, as has been done in this state, that the property and effects, of every kind, of a resident of one county, may be attached by his creditor in another, on the ground of his non-residence therein, by serving the process of garnishment upon a person having possession of his property, or being indebted to him, in the county, and giving notice by publication of the proceeding; and such was the proceeding in this case. Conceding, then, that the transfer of the mortgagor's interest in the goods by bill of sale to Root & McBride to secure a debt due to them was good as against creditors, which may be doubtful under section 4151, Rev. Stat., as it was not recorded as therein required, still, it was subsequent in time to the liens created by the proceedings in attachment, and hence did not entitle them to recover the property in replevin against Davis & Bros., who were bound by those proceedings to account to Luce & Co. and Shaw & Co. for its value over and above their own claim, the claim of the plaintiff being postponed to what might remain after payment of these claims and that of the defendant.

But it is further claimed that the attachments were void on the ground of irregularities in the proceedings had before the justice. In so far as this claim is based on the ground that there was no physical seizure of the property by the constable, it has been answered by what has been already said. The thing attached in this case was not tangible, but intangible, property,—a chose in action,—which, under our law, may be attached by process of garnishment served on the debtor, where the defendant is a nonresident of the county in which the suit is commenced, service being made on him by publication.

The other objections are, at most, based upon such irregularities as can only be taken advantage of by a proceeding in error, and are not available in a collateral proceeding, as the justice had jurisdiction of the subject of the action, and power to issue a writ of attachment upon the affidavit that was filed therefor. "The rules," says Longworth, J., in Scioto Valley R. Co. v. Cronin, 38 Ohio St. 122, "which govern pleading in courts of record at common law, and under the code of civil procedure, have never been strictly applied in proceedings before justices of the peace. From the earliest days, a very liberal practice has obtained, in this state, in reviewing proceedings had before these officers, when the question of their jurisdiction is not involved." Among the errors appearing, as claimed, upon the transcript of the justice, offered in evidence of the proceedings had before him, is its omission to show that he found, from the answer of the garnishees, that they had property in their possession belonging to the defendants, or that they were indebted to them. The transcript does, however, show that, on the day fixed for a hearing, by the publication of notice, the justice, after rendering judgment for the plaintiffs, made an order on the garnishees "to deliver the property of the defendants in their possession to the court, and to pay the money due from them to the defendants into court." This, we think, was sufficient. If a finding of the kind were necessary, the presumption from the order is that it was made, and an omission to enter such finding upon the docket cannot be taken advantage of in a collateral proceeding. The garnishees were served; and "the order of attachment binds the property attached from the time of service, and the garnishee stands liable to the plaintiff for all property, moneys, and credits in his hands, or due from him to the defendant, from the time he is served with the notice." White, J., in Carty v. Fenstermaker, supra. See also National Bank of New London v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 21 Ohio St. 221, 229.

Exception was also taken to the admission in evidence of papers in the case, not entered upon the transcript of the justice. These simply showed that the statute regulating the proceeding had been complied with. Their entry upon the docket is not required, nor usual. The transcript in evidence showed all that is material to the validity of the liens of the attaching creditors; and, while the papers offered and received might have been dispensed with, their admission in evidence was not prejudicial to the plaintiffs and cannot be well assigned as error.

Judgment affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Celia McMULLEN, Appt.,

v.

CARNEGIE BROS. & CO., Limited.

(158 Pa. 518.)

The rule applicable to railroad companies, requiring them to inspect cars of other companies used for transporting freight, before permitting their employes to handle them, is not applicable to companies or persons on whose sidings cars are delivered for the purpose of permitting them to load or unload freight.

(November 14, 1892.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Allegheny County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death, and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of McCLUNG, J., in the court below in refusing to take off the compulsory nonsuit which had been previously entered, as follows:

"There is no direct evidence in this case of actual notice to the defendants of the defective condition of the brake staff which probably caused the death of the plaintiff's husband. Nor does it appear that the car was in their possession for such length of time that a jury could be permitted to find that, in the ordinary course of affairs, they should have noticed it. Plaintiff's case then depends upon the existence of a duty on the part of defendants to ascertain by inspection that cars delivered to them by the railroad company for the purpose of being unloaded or loaded, or both, are in good and safe condition, before permitting its employes to handle them for the purposes for which they are so delivered. The cars used by a railroad company for the purpose of transporting freight are appliances, as to the condition of which the company owes a duty to its employes working upon them, which cannot be filled without proper inspection. This, doubtless, applies as to cars borrowed or hired by the railroad company from another company. It does not, however, apply to companies or persons on whose sidings loaded cars are delivered for the purpose of permitting the owner of the siding to unload the freight. It follows that the nonsuit in this case was properly granted, and the motion to take it off must be refused."

Messrs. John B. Chapman and M. A. Woodward for appellant.

Messrs. G. D. Packer, Edwin W. Smith, and Knox & Reed for appellees.

Per Curiam:

We are satisfied, from an examination of the testimony in this case, that there was no error in refusing to take off the judgment of nonsuit; and, for the reasons given in the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, the judgment should be affirmed.

NOTE.—The above case, though decided without discussion, seems worth reporting in this series as presenting a point which is apparently new.

In Coke upon Littleton, 4 b. it is stated that if a man has twenty acres of land and by deed grant to another and to his heirs vestura terræ and maketh livery of seisin secundum formam chartæ, the land itself shall not pass because he hath a particular right in the land and thereby he shall not have the houses, timber, trees, mines and other real things parcel of the inheritance, but he shall have the vesture of the land, that is the corn, grass, underwood, sweepage and the like, and he shall have an action of trespass quare clausum fregit.

This legal writer also states: "The same time if a man grant herbagerium terræ, he hath a like particular right in the land and shall have an action quare clausum fregit, but by grant thereof and livery made, the soil shall not pass as aforesaid. If a man let to B. the herbage of his woods, and after grant all his lands in the tenure, possession, or occupation of B., the woods shall pass, for B. hath a particular possession and occupation which is sufficient in this case."

The law makes a pointed distinction between those profits which are the spontaneous products of the earth or its permanent fruits, and corn and other growth of the earth which are produced annually by labor and industry, and hence are called fructus industriales, the latter being regarded for and cultivate peach trees in consideration of half the crop for any two years during a term of ten years, the trees to become the property of such owner, is not invalid because not signed by his wife as a conveyance of any homestead right or as an interruption of the possession of the homestead.

Growing crops when fructus industriales are personal property. Edwards v. Thompson, 85 Tenn. 720.

A sale of such crops is good inter partes and as against third parties, even without a change of possession. Bellows v. Wells, 36 Vt. 599.

Crops produced by annual cultivation, growing or standing fructus industriales, ready for harvest, are personal estate, and may be transferred as chattels. Willis v. Moore, 59 Tex. 628, 46 Am. Rep. 284; Silberberg v. Trilling, 82 Tex. 523; Cayce v. Stovall, 50 Miss. 896; Erskine v. Plummer, 7 Me. 447, 22 Am. Dec. 216.

They are no part of the realty. Silberberg v. Trilling, supra; Delaney v. Root, 99 Mass. 548, 97 Am. Dec. 53; Parsons v. Smith, 5 Allen, 578; Giles v. Simonds, 15 Gray, 441, 77 Am. Dec. 873. The law is well settled as to sales. Crine v. Tifts, 65 Ga. 644.

Grass in a condition to be cut was held to be the subject of a parol sale. Cutler v. Pope, 13 Me. 377. And a parol contract for the sale of such a crop passes a title valid as against the vendor and all subsequent claimants. Westbrook v. Eager, 16 N. J. L. 81; Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 556; Shepard v. Philbrick, 2 Denio, 176; Harris v. Frink, 49 N. Y. 24, 10 Am. Rep. 318.

So an interest in personal chattels may be created without a deed or conveyance in writing. Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 556.

A license to do a particular thing upon another's land is valid without deed or writing, not transferring an interest in land, and if for value is not countermandable. Clafin v. Carpenter, 4 Met. 580, 38 Am. Dec. 381; Taylor v. Waters, 7 Taunt. 374, 2 Marsh. 551; Liggins v. Inge, 7 Bing. 682, 5 Moore & P. 712; Mumford v. Whitney, 15 Wend. 380, 30 Am. Dec. 60; Whitmarsh v. Walker, 1 Met. 313; Woodbury v. Parshley, 7 N. H. 237, 26 Am. Dec. 739.

In Lewis v. McNatt, 65 N. C. 65, a crop of turpentine was held to be fructus industriales, not being a spontaneous product but produced by labor and cultivation.

Grass owned by one not the owner of the freehold is personal estate and salable as such and may be mortgaged. Smith v. Jenks, 1 Denio, 580.

A grant of crops to be thereafter grown by the owner upon his land is valid, and the title thereto passes as soon as they come into existence. Nestell v. Hewitt, 19 Abb. N. C. 287.

In Stambaugh v. Yeates, 2 Rawle, 161, the court held that grain growing was so far personal property that it could be sold either privately by the owner, or by judicial process against him, and that such sale was an implied severance, and the grain did not pass by a sale of the land.

Where under a parol contract for purchase, the purchaser was let into possession and sowed a crop of oats with the consent of the vendor, and subsequently refused to perform the contract and ejected the plaintiff, it was held that the plaintiff was a tenant at will entitled to the crop. Harris v. Frink, 49 N. Y. 24, 10 Am. Rep. 318.

Where the vendee of land entered and sowed plant and cultivate peach trees upon the land of another for a term of ten years and to receive half of the proceeds during any two years of such term which he may select, is not invalid in respect to the interest given in such crops as a mortgage of a thing having no potential existence, since the contract is executed by the setting out and delivery of title to the trees and the crops are the subject of sale or mortgage in the same manner as crops to be raised from seeds already planted.

3. A contract by which one person is to set out and cultivate for ten years peach trees upon the land of another and to have half of the crops for any two years of such term which he may select, makes him a tenant in crops under a parol contract for the purchase of the land with the consent of the vendor, the court held that the invalidity of the contract had no effect upon the purchaser's title to the crops which remained in him as personal chattels. Ibid.

b. Statute of frauds.

In Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 541, 79 Am. Dec. 147, the fifteenth section of the Statute of Frauds which declares that "every sale made by a vendor of goods and chattels in his possession or under his control, and every assignment of goods and chattels, unless the same be followed by an actual or continued change of possession of the things sold or assigned, shall be conclusive evidence of fraud as against the creditors of the vendor or the creditors of the persons making such assignment, or subsequent purchasers in good faith,"—was held not to apply to a case of growing crops, they not being goods and chattels within its meaning. Bours v. Webster, 6 Cal. 661; and Visser v. Webster, 13 Cal. 58, to the same effect.

Although growing crops are chattels and will pass by a verbal sale, yet they are not susceptible of manual delivery until harvested and therefore are not until harvested "in the possession or under control of the vendor within the meaning of the statute." Davis v. McFarlane, 37 Cal. 684, 99 Am. Dec. 840; Bours v. Webster and Visser v. Webster, supra; Pacheco v. Hunsacker, 14 Cal. 120; Bernal v. Hovious, supra; Robbins v. Oldham, 1 Duv. 28. Such a construction of the statute would make it an absolute interdiction upon the sale of growing crops, unless the vendor were willing to abandon the possession to the vendee at the same time. Davis v. McFarlane, supra.

There is nothing in the vegetable or fruit which has an interest in or concerning land when severed from the soil, whether trees, grass, or other spontaneous growth (præda vestura), or grain, vegetables, or any kind of crops (fructus industriales) the product of periodical planting and culture, they are alike, mere chattels, and the severance may be in fact as when they are cut and removed from the ground, or in law, as when they are growing, the owner in fee of the land by a valid conveyance sells them to another person or where he sells the land reserving them by expressed provisions. Purner v. Piercy, 40 Md. 212, 17 Am. Rep. 591.

As a general rule if the products of the earth are sold specifically, and by the terms of the contract to be separately delivered as chattels, the sale is not affected by the fourth section of the Statute of Frauds as amounting to a sale of an interest in land. Ibid.

If the contract when executed is to convey to the purchaser a mere chattel, though it may be in the interim a part of the realty, it is not affected by the statute. Ibid.

If, however, the contract is in the interim to confer upon the purchaser an exclusive right to the land for a time for the purpose of making a profit of the growing surface, it is affected by the statute and must be in writing, although the purchaser is at the last to take from the land only a chattel. Ibid.

When such is the character of the transaction, it matters not whether the product be trees, grass, and other spontaneous growth, or grain, vegetables, or other crops raised periodically by cultivation, and it is quite as immaterial whether the produce is fully grown or in the process of growing at the time of making the contract. Ibid.

The circumstances that the produce purchased may, or probably, or certainly will, derive nourishment from the soil, between the time of the contract and the time of the delivery, is not conclusive as to the operation of the statute. Ibid.

Such transactions take their character of realty or personality from the principal subject-matter of the contract and the interest of the parties, and therefore a sale of any growing produce of the earth in actual existence at the time of the contract, whether it be in a state of maturity or not, is not to be considered a sale of an interest in or concerning land. Ibid.

In Purner v. Piercy, supra, it was held to be a perversion of the object of the statute of frauds, to hold as invalid a sale, in other respects legal, of a growing crop of peaches without any intent of the parties to sell or purchase the soil, but conferring a mere license expressed or implied to the purchaser to go upon the land to gather the fruit and remove the same.

Where timber or other produce of the land, or any other thing annexed to the freehold, is specifically sold, whether it be severed from the soil by the vendor or to be taken by the vendee under a special license to enter for that purpose, it is still a sale of goods only and not within the statute. Purner v. Piercy, supra.

A sale of any growing produce of the earth in actual existence at the time of the contract, whether it be in a state of maturity or not, is not to be considered a sale of an interest in or concerning land. Ibid.

In Boetwick v. Leach, 3 Day, 476, a sale of property which would pass by a deed of land as such, without any other description, which is to be separated from the land, is not within the statute of frauds, where the subject-matter is capable of being separated.

A contract for the sale of growing crops raised by the industry of man and the cultivation of the earth is not within the statute. Bloom v. Welsh, 27 N. J. L. 177; Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 550; Davis v. McFarlane, 37 Cal. 684, 99 Am. Dec. 340; Flynt v. Conrad, 61 N. C. 190, 98 Am. Dec. 588; Brittain v. McKay, 28 N. C. 265, 85 Am. Dec. 738; Walton v. Jordan, 65 N. C. 172; Bond v. Coke, 71 N. C. 100; Cook v. Steel, 42 Tex. 58.

In Bank of Lansingburgh v. Crary, 1 Barb. 542, the court waived the consideration of the question, whether or not a valid mortgage upon the produce of land not in actual existence at the time could be made to hold that a mortgage of growing trees, fruit, and grass must be in writing within the statute.

In McIlvalne v. Harris, 20 Mo. 457, 64 Am. Dec. 196, it was held that growing wheat was an interest in land and a contract concerning it within the statute of frauds, and must be in writing, and that parol evidence of the sale of the wheat was inadmissible.

c. Mortgages.

A conveyance which simply secures an antecedent debt is effective only as a mortgage. Hamilton v. Maas, 77 Ala. 233.

common with the owner of the land of the peaches for the years which he may select.

(October 27, 1893.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Allegan County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of certain peaches which had been grown on defendant's land, but which plaintiff claimed under the terms of a certain contract. Affirmed.

The contract which was alleged to give plaintiffs their rights was as follows:

"Articles of agreement, made this 21st day

Under the Georgia Code, § 1955, no particular form is necessary to make a mortgage. Stephens v. Tucker, 55 Ga. 543.

The mortgage may be so drawn as to cover after-acquired property, if in existence at the time the mortgage was executed. Hughes v. Wheeler, 63 Iowa. 641.

A valid mortgage of personalty may be made by parol as under the common law. In the absence of statutory requirements and a contract and conveyance of personalty may be made without writing. Morrow v. Turney, 36 Ala. 131, 133.

This principle was distinctly recognized in May v. Eastin, 2 Port. (Ala.) 422.

And in Deshazo v. Lewis, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 94; Thrash v. Bennett, 57 Ala. 153.

Even of a crop afterwards to be planted. Stearns v. Gafford, 55 Ala. 544.

In Stewart v. Fry, 3 Ala. 573, it was held that the profits arising out of the use of a personal chattel might be made the subject of a mortgage.

Such a mortgage is valid at common law, however immature the crop may be. Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 236.

In Coster v. Bank of Georgia, 24 Ala. 49, the court went still further holding that a parol agreement to give a mortgage, money being advanced thereon, had the effect of a mortgage upon an estate consisting both of realty and personalty, the question of the statute of frauds not being noticed.

In Brooks v. Ruff, 37 Ala. 371, the court held such a mortgage good inter partes.

There must, however, be a debt, legal liability, or obligation actually existing or at the time proposed to be incurred, and afterwards actually incurred. Stearns v. Gafford, supra.

Where the liability on a note as surety, for which a mortgage of personal property had been given by way of indemnity, was extinguished and a new note given with a different surety, the court held that a verbal agreement between the mortgagor, mortgagee, and the new surety made upon the cancellation and substitution of such notes, providing that the mortgage should stand as security, created a valid mortgage inter partes. Brooks v. Ruff, supra.

A verbal mortgage for advances and supplies necessary to make a crop prior to the passing of section 1731 of the Alabama Code of 1886 (Acts 1884-85, p. 93), was held to be good as a mortgage on the property of that one of the mortgagors entering into such an agreement, each mortgagor having a right severally to bind his own property by enlarging the legal operation of the security, the above section of the code prohibiting mortgages by parol not bearing upon the case. Hill v. Nelms, 36 Ala. 442.

d. Upon sale of the land.

In Wilkinson v. Ketter, 60 Ala. 435, the court held a crop was considered as growing from the time the seed was sown, as it then became part of the land and passed by a sale thereof.

Growing crops pass by a sale of the land without any reserve. Crews v. Pendleton, 1 Leigh, 297, 19 Am. Dec. 750.

As between the vendor and vendee, the growing crop is part of the realty, and as a general rule, the sale and conveyance of the land by its owner carries the property in the crop to the purchaser. Turner v. Cool, 23 Ind. 56, 85 Am. Dec. 449.

A deed absolute upon its face, without any reservation whatever in respect to a then growing crop, will pass the whole of the grantor's interest both in the crop and in the land upon which it is grown. Gibbons v. Dillingham, 10 Ark. 9, 50 Am. Dec. 233.

Where the title to growing crops is not reserved, they pass by a transfer of the land, and a chattel mortgage thereof by the grantor in possession passes no title as against one claiming under his grantee. Coman v. Thompson, 47 Mich. 22, 41 Am. Rep. 703.

Grain not reserved passes by a conveyance of the land, and the fact that the vendor exercises some new acts showing an apparent ownership without objection, is not sufficient to show a reservation of the crops. Wilkins v. Vashbinder, 7 Watts, 373.

A growing crop laid by before maturity was held to pass on a sale of the land. Pitts v. Hendrix, 6 Ga. 452.

In Backenstoss v. Stahler, 33 Pa. 251, 75 Am. Dec. 532, it was held as settled law in that commonwealth, that growing crops were personal property, subject, however, to be parted with and as appurtenant to the realty in case of conveyance, unless severed by reservation or expectation. Bear v. Bitzer, 16 Pa. 173, 55 Am. Dec. 490, and Wilkins v. Vashbinder, 7 Watts, 373, to the same effect.

A crop of grain was held not to pass by a conveyance of the land, in Smith v. Johnston, 1 Penn. & W. 471, 21 Am. Dec. 404, but this decision would seem to be overruled by the later cases of Burnside v. Weightman, 9 Watts, 47, and Wilkins v. Vashbinder, supra.

After the crop has matured and been severed from the soil, it is personal estate, but while growing and not severed, unless expressly reserved, it will pass by a conveyance of the land. Creel v. Kirkham, 47 Ill. 344.

Where upon a contract for the sale of land, a crop of wheat was, as between the parties, specially reserved by the vendor, it was held that such crop passed by the conveyance of the land, the contract being executed upon the execution of the deed which was sole evidence, the prior contract having merged therein. Turner v. Cool, supra.

And in such a case parol evidence is not admissible to prove that the reservation of the grantor's interest in the crop was intended. Gibbons v. Dillingham, supra.

Parol evidence, however, was admitted in Flynt v. Conrad, 61 N. C. 190, 93 Am. Dec. 533, to prove that such crops did not pass by a conveyance of the land. In that case it was said that the deed did not purport to set out the agreement between the parties.

Such evidence is admissible to prove that the possession remains in the grantor. Bond v. Coke, 71 N. C. 100.

It was held admissible to prove a reservation of growing crops on a sale of realty. Backenstoss v. Stahler, 33 Pa. 251, 75 Am. Dec. 532.

Such reservation need not be by deed or in writing, for being goods and chattels, they may be conveyed by verbal contract. Hamblet v. Bliss, 55 Vt. 535.

If reserved by parol, they will not pass as part of the realty under an orphan's court sale. Backenstoss v. Stahler, supra.

of February, A. D. 1885, between John Schultz, of the township of Saugatuck, Allegan county, Michigan, of the first part, and John W. Dickey and Addison Lurvey, for Douglas, county, and state aforesaid, of the second part, witnesseth as follows: The said party of the first part is the owner of the west half of the east half of the southwest quarter of section twenty-five, township of Saugatuck, aforesaid, and desiring to set out to peach trees a piece just east of his house, and running back to his east line, and far enough south as the piece is suitable for peach trees, but not to exceed 1,500 trees, said first

Where, after a conveyance of the land, the crops not being reserved thereby, the vendor executed a chattel mortgage of the latter, it was held that such mortgage was void as against such purchaser's assignee, even though the mortgagor remained in possession. Coman v. Thompson, 47 Mich. 22, 41 Am. Rep. 706.

As between the executor and the heir, crops on the land at the time of the testator's death go to the executor, but as between them the vendor is entitled to them. Smith v. Barham, 17 N. C. 420, 25 Am. Dec. 721.

Until foreclosure or possession, the mortgagor is entitled to emblements, and when severed has an absolute right to them without liability to account, but if the land be sold before severance, the purchaser is entitled to the crops not only as against the mortgagor, but against all persons claiming in any manner under him subsequent to the mortgage. Rankin v. Kinsey, 7 Ill. App. 215.

Where land is sold for condition broken, before severance of the crop, the purchaser is entitled to it upon the sale. Harmon v. Fisher, 9 Ill. App. 22; Rankin v. Kinsey, supra.

In Jones v. Thomas, 8 Blackf. 423, it was held that the purchaser of mortgaged property at a foreclosure sale was entitled to the crops as against the mortgagor and those claiming under him. To the same effect, Aldrich v. Reynolds, 1 Barb. Ch. 613, 5 L. ed. 518.

The purchaser of lands of a decedent was held entitled to the growing crops until severed. Jewett v. Keenbolts, 16 Barb. 193.

They are the subject of mortgage and may be removed upon foreclosure sale of such a mortgage as between the parties. Wintermute v. Light, 46 Barb. 278.

A purchaser of such crops at a statutory foreclosure sale acquired a title thereto as against a purchaser under an execution. Shepard v. Philbrick, 2 Denio, 174.

In Cassidy v. Rhodes, 12 Ohio, 88, it was held that a sale under a foreclosure decree did not pass the tenant's crops.

And in Welsh v. Bekey, 1 Penr. & W. 57, grain in the ground was treated as a chattel.

Grain growing upon the debtor's land was held to pass as appurtenant thereto under a sheriff's sale, where it belonged to the debtor at the time of the execution of the conveyance. Bear v. Bitzer, 16 Pa. 175, 55 Am. Dec. 490.

In Richards v. Knight, 4 L. R. A. 453, 78 Iowa, 60, a standing crop fully matured at the time of the sale of the land under foreclosure proceedings, was held not to pass to the purchaser at such sale but to remain in the tenant.

It has been held that crops could not be reserved by a sheriff at an execution sale of lands, and passed by a foreclosure sale of the land as against a lessee holding subsequent to the mortgage. Howell v. Schenck, 24 N. J. L. 89.

II. General doctrine.

A mortgage has all the elements of an executed conditional sale, and like a sale requires a subject in existence and in the ownership and control of the mortgagor. Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Long Beach Imp. Co. 27 Hun, 89.

At common law a mortgage could only operate on property, actually in existence at the time, and 23 L. R. A.

actually belonging to the mortgagor. Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218; Williman v. Neber, 20 Barb. 37, 40; Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 484; Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 408; Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 206.

Although not good as a mortgage, such an instrument may be valid as an executory agreement for a mortgage which will authorize the contractee to take possession of the property as soon as it is acquired by the contractor, provided he does so before third parties acquire any rights. Ludlum v. Rothschild, supra. To the same effect, Stowell v. Bair, 5 Ill. App. 104.

If the purpose of planting is not the permanent enhancement of the land itself, but merely to secure a single crop which is to be the sole return of the labor expended, the product would naturally fall under the head of emblements, but if the tree, bush, or vine is one which requires to be planted but once, and will then bear successive crops for years, the planting would naturally be calculated to permanently enhance the value of the land itself, and the product of any one year could not be said to essentially date its existence to labor expended during that year, and hence it would be classed among fructus naturales. Sparrow v. Pond, 18 L. R. A. 103, 49 Minn. 412.

Any property which is capable of an absolute sale may be the subject of a mortgage. Jones v. Webster, 48 Ala. 109.

It is universally admitted and it is a mere truism, that a sale, grant, or mortgage of property, real or personal, in present, to which the vendor, grantor, or mortgagor has no title or which has no existence, is inoperative and void at law and in equity. Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 206.

In Bank of Lansingburgh v. Crary, 1 Barb. 542, Justice Paige was strongly of the opinion that a chattel mortgage could only operate on property in actual existence at the time of its execution, that it could not be given on the future products of real estate, and that if given one day or one week before the product of the land came into existence, it was as inoperative as if the chattel mortgage had been given on a crop of grass or grain one, two, or three years previous to its production, and relied upon the English cases of Waddington v. Bristol, 2 Bos. & P. 452, and Evans v. Roberts, 5 Barn. & C. 829, 8 Dowl. & R. 611.

To the same effect, Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 102, and Harder v. Plass, 57 Hun, 540, holding that if the mortgagor has no title at the time of the execution of the mortgage but intends to acquire in future, the mortgage is void. In the latter case, however, the mortgagor had acquired title at the time of the execution of the mortgage and the property was therefore properly subject to the mortgage.

There can be no sale or mortgage of a crop until it is planted. Redd v. Burrus, 68 Ga. 574; Crine v. Tifts, 65 Ga. 644.

A mortgage of after-acquired property is ineffectual. Hunt v. Bullock, 23 Ill. 320; Roy v. Goings, 6 Ill. App. 162.

In Apperson v. Moore, 30 Ark. 66, 21 Am. Rep. 170, which was a suit in equity on a mortgage of a future crop, it was stated that at law the action could not be maintained because there was no actual or potential existence in the subject granted.

In such cases the maxim qui non habet, alie non dat applies. Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 286.

party agrees to set out the trees, and care for and cultivate the same, in a good and workmanlike manner, for the period of ten years from the date hereof, and to allow said Dickey and Lurvey, parties of the second part, to have and take one half of the crop of peaches for any two years they may select during the aforesaid term of ten years. Said Schultz agrees that, if it shall come to his knowledge that any of the said trees are affected with the yellows, that he will immediately dig up and burn the same, root and branch. Said Dickey and Lurvey, parties of the second part, hereby agree, in considera-

There must be a right in case out of which the mortgagor's claim can arise. Puroell v. Mather, 35 Ala. 570, 76 Am. Dec. 307.

If the thing exists, as between the parties, possession being transferred, operation or effect may be given by sale or conveyance, but as against the party in whom the title resides it is without force. Booker v. Jones, 35 Ala. 233.

Such rule, however, will not obtain, where its effect would be to defeat the manifest intention of the parties as gathered from the language and aided by the circumstances of the case. Norris v. Hix, 74 Iowa, 524.

A chattel mortgage will not be deemed to cover after-acquired property, unless the intention that it should is clearly expressed. Lorner v. Allyn, 64 Iowa, 723; McArthur v. Garman, 71 Iowa, 34; Norris v. Hix, supra.

But the special lien for fertilizers, created by section 1978 of the Georgia Code, is not subject to the rule that a sale or mortgage cannot be made of an unplanted crop for the reason that it is necessary to fertilize before the crop is planted, and the statute would be robbed of its beneficial results if so construed. Hardwick v. Burtis, 59 Ga. 773.

The court will take judicial notice of the assignments and of the general course of agriculture, and also that at neither the date of execution, nor the recording of the mortgage, was the crop upon which it was intended to operate, planted or in being. Tomlinson v. Greenfield, 31 Ark. 557; Floyd v. Ricks, 14 Ark. 233, 58 Am. Dec. 374.

Such a mortgage must operate in present on property and pass the title to the mortgagee upon condition, and to be operative to pass such a title the thing must be in case in the same sense as in the case of a bargain and sale which vests the title in the buyer and with respect to things not in existence or not belonging to the vendor the law divided them into two classes, one of which may be sold, while the other can only be the subject of an agreement to sell, that is, it is the subject of an executory contract. Stowell v. Bair, 5 Ill. App. 104.

III. Necessity and effect of ratification.

Where the future acquisition is merely expected or contemplated such crops are not at common law the subject of sale, assignment, or mortgage, and the legal title to such property does not pass, unless, after it comes into existence, the vendor or mortgagor ratified or carries out such transaction. Hurst v. Bell, 72 Ala. 336; Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 233.

The mortgagor may ratify and confirm his contract and convert the equity into an alienation and transfer of the chattel. Columbus Iron Works Co. v. Renfro, 71 Ala. 577.

Some new act or the assent thereto on the mortgagor's part must be shown after the crops have come into existence to render such a mortgage valid. Roy v. Goings, 6 Ill. App. 132; Columbus Iron Works Co. v. Renfro, supra; Head v. Goodwin, 37 Me. 151.

At law such a mortgage is only a license until a new act intervenes. Cressey v. Sabre, 17 Hun, 120.

There must be a transfer of the product of the grantor's labor. Puroell v. Mather, 35 Ala. 570, 76 Am. Dec. 307.

The delivery clothes the mortgagee with the legal title in as full a manner as if the crops had been fully grown at the time of the execution of the mortgage, and the title thus acquired will prevail over subsequent mortgagees. Stern v. Simpson, 62 Ala. 194.

Its delivery to the agent of the railroad company for transportation to the mortgagee amounts to a ratification and confirmation of the mortgage and passes the legal title. Columbus Iron Works Co. v. Renfro, supra.

IV. Necessity and effect of possession.

It has been held that upon a sale of a growing crop where the conveyance shows a clear intention of a complete sale at the time, the title and possession pass at once to the vendee. Vaughn v. Owens, 21 Ill. App. 249.

In Alabama, delivery of possession is not necessary to the validity of a mortgage of personality. Morrow v. Turney, 35 Ala. 131.

Yet such a mortgage does not pass the legal title so as to enable the mortgagee to maintain a statutory claim, unless actual delivery of the gathered crop has taken place. Wetzler v. Kelly, 35 Ala. 440.

Though a conveyance of personal property to be subsequently acquired is per se ineffectual to transfer the legal title to the grantee, yet if the grantor delivers the property when acquired to the grantee or allows him to take possession under the conveyance, the property passes and vests both in law and in equity according to the terms of the conveyance. Cook v. Corthell, 11 R. I. 432, 23 Am. Rep. 513, following Williams v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 173, 22 Am. Rep. 553, 23 Am. Rep. 513, which held that possession must be acquired or taken by the mortgagee under the mortgage, but that such a mortgage in equity created a lien upon the crops when acquired. To the same effect Williams v. Winsor, 12 R. I. 9; Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 32, 46 Am. Dec. 706; Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 12, 37 Am. Rep. 724; Cressey v. Sabre, 17 Hun, 120; Moore v. Pyrum, 10 S. C. 452, 30 Am. Rep. 58; Stowell v. Bair, 5 Ill. App. 104; Bellows v. Wells, 36 Vt. 599.

Actual possession of the property must be obtained after it comes into existence and before it is sold. Lamson v. Moffat, 61 Wis. 153; Comstock v. Scales, 7 Wis. 159; Chynoweth v. Tenney, 10 Wis. 397, 407; Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Commercial Bank, 11 Wis. 203; Single v. Phelps, 20 Wis. 399; Mowry v. White, 21 Wis. 413; Hunter v. Bosworth, 43 Wis. 533; Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Fisher, 17 Wis. 114; Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Cary, 13 Wis. 110; Chapman v. Welmer, 4 Ohio St. 431, infra, Equitable doctrine.

In Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Commercial Bank, supra, the court approved of the above doctrine and held that such a mortgage amounted to no more than a license requiring some new act of the grantor, confirming the same after the property was acquired, in order to vest the title in the mortgagee.

And in Hunter v. Bosworth, supra, the doctrine stated in the cases cited supra, was adhered to, the court stating that it was not inclined to change the strict rule so long established there, merely because courts elsewhere had abandoned it.

In GitTINGS v. Nelson, 36 Ill. 561, it was held that a mortgage of a crop to be raised that year to secure the purchase of property was inoperative as such without possession being taken.

Such a mortgage, even though filed, would still tion of the agreements hereinbefore stated, to be performed upon the part of the said Schultz, to furnish what trees may be needed to set the aforesaid piece of land, not to exceed 1,500 trees, and take as pay therefor one half of the crop of peaches for any two years they may select. It is mutually agreed that said Dickey and Lurvey shall make their selection of the year when they will take the half of the crop on or before September 15th of that year. Each party hereto are to pick and care for their own share of the fruit and are to each take as near half of the crop as may be; but at the close of the season each be wholly inoperative as to creditors or subsequent purchasers unless, before their rights attached, there be such delivered or subsequent act. Merchants & M. Sav. Bank v. Lovejoy, 84 Wis. 601.

The want of actual and continued possession of the property will render the agreement absolutely void as to creditors, whether prior or subsequent to its date, or to the time when the crop was raised, under section 2313 of the Revised Statute of Wisconsin. Ibid.

The mere making and recording of the instrument without any further delivery by the mortgagor or act on the mortgagee's part, showing possession or the exercise of his rights of property is not sufficient. Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 17, 46 Am. Dec. 708.

Such new act is the taking of possession by the creditor under his contract. Cressey v. Sabre, 17 Hun, 120.

Possession obtained by him before the rights of third parties attached, would make this title good as against the world. Roy v. Golnga, 6 Ill. App. 162; Walker v. Vaughn, 38 Conn. 577; Tedford v. Wilson, 3 Head, 312; Polk v. Foster, 7 Baxt. 98.

His title is superior to that of attachment creditors of the mortgagor, even though the mortgagor resided upon the premises. Hamblet v. Bliss, 55 Vt. 535, where possession was taken and the crops out after condition broken.

Such executory agreement is a continuing one so that when the creditor does take possession under it, he acts lawfully under the agreement of one then having the disposing power and thus makes the lien good. Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 17, 46 Am. Dec. 708.

The lien ceases as against subsequent purchasers if the harvested crops are not delivered as in other cases of personal property. Quirilaque v. Dennis, 24 Cal. 154.

But it has been held that a mortgage upon growing crops executed, acknowledged, and recorded like mortgages upon real estate, is valid against third parties without delivery of possession. Ibid. See also Bellows v. Wells, 36 Vt. 599.

There being no change of possession, the mortgagee's claim is not superior to that of an execution creditor of the mortgagor, even though it be claimed that the mortgagor was in possession as the mortgagee's agent. Barr v. Cannon, 69 Iowa, 20.

So if, before taking possession or the doing of acts necessary to give vitality to the mortgage as to the subsequently acquired property, an attachment or assignment for the benefit of creditors takes place, the opportunity for completing the lien is lost and the mortgage or pledge not being completed or perfected the property will pass to the assignee and be held by him for the benefit of the creditors generally. Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 17, 46 Am. Dec. 708.

It is the settled law in Wisconsin that a chattel mortgage vests the legal title in the mortgagee before the debt is due, and that he may take possession thereof immediately, unless by express stipulation the mortgagor is permitted to retain possession, and that in such cases the mortgagor cannot, without proof of payment or other extinguishment of the mortgage, maintain an action of tort in the nature of trover for a conversion of the property. Hill v. Merriman, 73 Wis. 493.

In the above case, however, it was conceded that the mortgage was inoperative, as the crop was not sown or not in existence at the date of the filing of the mortgage.

The mortgagee of an expectant crop has no title which will entitle him, without possession, to maintain an action for trover, trespass, or detinue, his interest being merely that of an equitable lien. Collier v. Faulk, 69 Ala. 58; Wittleshofer v. Strauss, 83 Ala. 517.

A mortgage of a crop to be grown is good and when produced the mortgagee is entitled to the possession and may maintain an action for its recovery. Thrash v. Bennett, 57 Ala. 156; Doe v. McLoakey, 1 Ala. 708; Lehman v. Marshall, 47 Ala. 362; Adams v. Tanner, 5 Ala. 740.

When a mortgagee takes possession of the future acquired property under a stipulation to that effect in the mortgage, he then holds the property by way of pledge, but in the same manner as though the mortgage had been executed at the time he takes the possession of the property, and in the same manner as though he had taken the property under and by virtue of a chattel mortgage governing the property. Cameron v. Marvin, 28 Kan. 612.

A mortgagee taking possession and cutting the growing crops, converts them into personalty, as profits to be accounted for in settlement of the debt and interest, but when the creditor remains in possession he takes the same for his own use and benefit as consumable profits absolutely. Steele v. Farber, 37 Mo. 71.

It has been held, however, that such a mortgage does not amount to such an executory contract as will give the mortgagee a right to enter and hold contrary to the wish of the mortgagor. Chynoweth v. Tenney, 10 Wis. 398.

A provision in a lease that all the produce deposited on the land was to be at the disposal of the lessor who might enter and take it for payment of rent, was held not to be a sale or mortgage thereof, and of no avail against subsequent attachment creditors in the absence of actual delivery of the same to the lessor. Butterfield v. Baker, 5 Pick. 522.

The above case was followed in Munsell v. Carew, 2 Cush. 50, where a similar clause was taken as an executory agreement for license to dispose of the crop and produce.

Where the debtor gave his creditor "a mortgage of all my cotton, corn, and wheat that I may raise during the then next year, to secure the payment of the debt, and in default of payment by the first of November next then I authorize the said creditor to take all the crops raised by me," it was held a valid lien upon such crops, even though not planted at the time of the contract, the mortgagee having taken possession before the rights of others had attached. Moore v. Byrum, 10 S. C. 452, 30 Am. Rep. 58.

Section 9, chapter 107, Wis. Rev. Stat. 1858, provides that a mortgage of personal property shall not be valid, unless possession be delivered and obtained by the mortgagee, or a copy thereof be filed.

In Single v. Phelps, 20 Wis. 399, it was held under this section of the statute that such a mortgage upon a future property executed and filed was not valid as against a purchaser from the mortgagor.

shall show up their total shipments for the season, and, if it be found one party has taken more than the other, the net proceeds of such surplus shall be equally divided between the parties hereto. Said Shultz agrees to draw that half of the fruit belonging to said Dickey and Lurvey to the boat landing in Douglas, or railroad depot at Fennville, as they may direct. This agreement to be binding upon the legal representatives of the parties hereto. Said second party agrees to furnish a man to help set out the trees. Witness our hands and seals. John W. Dickey. [L. S.] John Schultz. [L. S.] A. Lurvey. [L. S.] even though there was a ratification subsequent to the mortgagor acquiring the property, which made the mortgage binding inter partes, of which fact the purchaser had notice, no fraud being shown.

A contract for the sale of sea-weed that may be landed on the town's beach gives the purchaser no right or possession in the beach, the same being a mere chattel and not the product of the land. Parsons v. Smith, 5 Allen, 580.

V. Potential interests.

Land is the mother and root of all fruit, therefore he that hath it may grant all fruits that may arise upon it after, and the property shall pass as soon as the fruits are extant. A person may grant all the tithe wool that he shall have in such a year, yet perhaps he shall have none, but a man cannot grant all the wool that he shall grow upon his sheep that he shall buy hereafter, for then he hath it neither actually nor potentially. Grantham v. Hawley, 1 Hob. 182.

Leases for years, be they present or future, wardships of tenants in capite or by knight service, trees, oxen, horses, plate, household stuff and the like, also trees, grass, and corn growing and standing upon ground, fruit upon the trees, wool upon the sheep's back, is grantable. 1 Shep. Touch. 241.

The general doctrine, however is founded upon a technical rule, and the courts invented the doctrine of potential existence so as to extend the operation of the mortgage to property potentially belonging to the mortgagor as an incident of other property then in existence and actually belonging to him. Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218.

A potential existence has been defined as applying to things which are the natural product or the expected increase of something already belonging to the vendor. Hutchinson v. Ford, 9 Bush, 818, 15 Am. Rep. 711; Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 286; Stowell v. Bair, 5 Ill. App. 104.

Property is said to belong to one potentially when it is the ordinary increase or growth of the very property which he has. Page v. Larrowe, 81 N. Y. S. R. 85.

Things not actually existing but having a potential existence may be the subject of a sale, grant, or mortgage. Booker v. Jones, supra; Hurst v. Bell, 72 Ala. 386; Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 288; Apperson v. Moore, 80 Ark. 56, 21 Am. Rep. 170; Grantham v. Hawley, Hob. 183; Arques v. Wasson, 61 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718; Stowell v. Bair, supra; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. 48 Minn. 404; McCown v. Mayer, 65 Miss. 537; Eversman v. Robb, 62 Miss. 653, 24 Am. Rep. 682; Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 408; Page v. Larrowe, supra; Brunswick Balke Collender Co. v. Stevenson, 21 N. Y. S. R. 862; VanHoozer v. Cory, 34 Barb. 9; Conderman v. Smith, 41 Barb. 404; Andrew v. Newcomb, 82 N. Y. 417; Nestell v. Hewitt, 19 Abb. N. C. 287; Fonville v. Casey, 5 N. C. 889, 4 Am. Dec. 559; Phelps v. Murray, 2 Tenn. Ch. 746; Merchants & M. Sav. Bank v. Lovejoy, 84 Wis. 601.

A possibility coupled with an interest being assignable. Cudworth v. Scott, 41 N. H. 456.

The same principles were recognized in Stadeker v. Loeb, 67 Miss. 200, even though section 1369 of the Code of 1880, which gave the right to execute deed of trust on future crops, was repealed by the Act of 1893, p. 166.

Such a property in the goods sold or mortgaged existing, the deed will be effectual as against an execution creditor. Looker v. Peckwell, 88 N. J. L. 263.

The subject-matter must have a potential existence as distinguished from a mere possibility or expectancy on the part of the contracting parties that it will come into existence. Paden v. Bellenger, 87 Ala. 577; Hurst v. Bell, 72 Ala. 386.

Otherwise no title passes to a purchaser. Hutchinson v. Ford, 9 Bush, 818, 15 Am. Rep. 711.

And nothing is conveyed. Orcutt v. Moore, 184 Mass. 48, 45 Am. Rep. 278; Low v. Pew, 108 Mass. 347, 11 Am. Rep. 367; Thrall v. Hill, 110 Mass. 323.

These principles were extended to the case of one having an equitable interest in the land, although the legal title was in another, as the former had the possession by consent and the rights of a legal owner to the crops to be produced. Stadeker v. Loeb, supra.

Crops being a creation or addition to land reasonably expected to be made, may be the proper subject of a mortgage. Jones v. Webster, 48 Ala. 109, where the mortgage was made by a lessee to secure the rent on a lease for three years.

The principle underlying the cases which hold that a potential existence is sufficient, is that the right to the property when it comes into actual existence is a present vested right. Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Long Beach Imp. Co. 27 Hun, 89.

While the thing itself need not have identity or separate entity, yet it must at least be the product or growth or increase of property which has at the time a corporal existence, and in which the mortgagor has a present interest and not a mere belief, hope, or expectation of a future acquired interest. Paden v. Bellenger, supra. To the same effect, Varnum v. State, 79 Ala. 30; Mayer v. Taylor, 60 Ala. 408, 44 Am. Rep. 522; Grant v. Steiner, 65 Ala. 499; Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 288; Low v. Pew, supra; Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 112; Pennock v. Coe, 64 U. S. 23 How. 117, 16 L. ed. 426; Hurst v. Bell, supra; Crinkley v. Egerton, 113 N. C. 444; Minnesota Linseed Oil Co. v. Maginnis, 82 Minn. 198; Conderman v. Smith, 41 Barb. 404; Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718; McCarty v. Blevins, 5 Yerg. 195, 26 Am. Dec. 262; Sanborn v. Benedict, 73 Ill. 809; Congreve v. Evetts, 26 Eng. L. & Eq. 498, 10 Exch. 298, 23 L. J. Exch. 273, 18 Jur. 655; Nestell v. Hewitt, and Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Long Beach Imp. Co. supra; Brunswick Balke Collender Co. v. Stevenson, 21 N. Y. S. R. 862; VanHoozer v. Cory, supra.

Therefore, where a mortgage was made by a party, of hay and growing crops upon a farm in which the mortgagor had not at the time any interest, he was not the potential owner and his mortgage created no lien upon such property. Page v. Larrowe, 81 N. Y. S. R. 85.

In Russell v. Stevens, 70 Miss. 685, it is stated that possession of the land and preparation for making a crop on it, makes the crop to be grown as much a subject of mortgage and sale as the next cast of the fisherman's net, or the wool to grow on the sheep of the party, and is therefore the subject of a valid mortgage having a potential existence.

No principle of law will allow a chattel mortgage operation on property not in existence either act-

In presence of May Belle Spencer, Dyer C. Putnam.

"State of Michigan, County of Allegan, ss.: On this third day of March, A. D. 1885, before me, a notary public in and for said county, personally came John W. Dickey, Addison Lurvey, and John Schultz, to me known to be the persons whose names are subscribed to the written instrument hereon; and each acknowledged that they executed the same for the purpose therein mentioned. Dyer C. Putnam, Notary Public."

The court finds the facts in said cause, as proved on the trial thereof, to be as follows:

ual or potential. Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Long Beach Imp. Co. supra.

The principles laid down and established in Minnesota Linseed Oil Co. v. Maginnis, supra, were followed and approved in Miller v. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. 35 Minn. 399.

It must also be specific or identified and capable of delivery, otherwise it is not strictly a contract of sale, but a special or executory agreement. Skipper v. Stokes, 42 Ala. 255, 94 Am. Dec. 646; Purcell v. Mather, 85 Ala. 570, 78 Am. Dec. 307.

Otherwise such a mortgage amounts to nothing more than a mere agreement to give a future mortgage and confers no specific lien on such after-acquired property. Burns v. Campbell, supra.

A mere possibility or expectancy not coupled with an interest in or growing out of property, cannot be made the subject of a valid sale. Skipper v. Stokes, supra. To the same effect, Purcell v. Mather, supra.

In Adams v. Tanner, 5 Ala. 740, it was held that a growing crop had such an existence as to be the subject of a sale, mortgage, or other contract, and passed an interest vesting any possession, either immediately or at some future time.

A tenant for life may sell the profits of his land for three or four years to come, and yet the profits are not then in esse. Fonville v. Casey, 5 N. C. 389, 4 Am. Dec. 559.

In Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718, where the lessee mortgaged a crop to be raised by him during the next ensuing season, being in possession at the time, a crop being afterwards produced, it was held to be a valid mortgage as against an attachment at the suit of another creditor of the mortgagor.

Where the seed, not having been planted, had not germinated at the time of the mortgage so as to constitute a possibility coupled with an interest, which might be the subject of a sale or transfer, it was held there was no potential interest. Merchants & M. Sav. Bank v. Lovejoy, 84 Wis. 601.

Annual crops raised from planted seed cannot be said to have even a potential existence before the seed is put in the ground. Rochester Distilling Co. v. Rasey, 65 Hun. 512.

A mortgage of such a crop as might be raised or sold on some indefinite place expected to be rented by the mortgagee, would be inoperative and void as an attempt at conveyance of a mere possibility or expectancy not coupled with an interest in or growing out of property. Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 288.

In Martin v. Thompson, 62 Cal. 618, 45 Am. Rep. 663, the court held that an action could not be maintained to recover the possession of grain sown and harvested upon lands to which the defendant claimed title and of which he had the actual, adverse, and exclusive possession, the grain being sown while defendant was in possession and not existing, even potentially, during the plaintiff's possession.

Where the owner of a farm leased it for a year under agreement that the lessee was to carry on the farm "at the halves," and was to leave on a given date as much hay as he found when he took the farm, and subsequently the lessor mortgaged the crops, the court held that he had not such a potential interest during the year as enabled him to make such mortgage. Orcutt v. Moore, 184 Mass. 48, 45 Am. Rep. 273.

A mortgaged property, "the wheat and other crops now growing on land described, sown prior to the mortgage" was held valid, there being a potential and substantial existence. Hansen v. Dennison, 7 Ill. App. 73.

Crops, the seed for which is not in the ground at the time of the mortgage, cannot be regarded as having a potential existence in the soil at the time of the mortgage, and cannot pass under such a mortgage without a bill in equity to subject them to the operation of the mortgage, brought after they had existence or the possession taken by the mortgagee. Stowell v. Bair, 5 Ill. App. 104, where the question was whether the mortgage purporting to cover future crops fructus industriales gave the mortgagee's paramount title as against the execution creditor, where the seed was sown long after the execution of the mortgage.

VI. Equitable doctrine.

An equitable lien is created by a mortgage or conveyance of crops not yet planted or not in esse where the thing mortgaged has a potential existence. Varnum v. State, 78 Ala. 80; Mayer v. Taylor, 69 Ala. 403, 44 Am. Rep. 522; Grant v. Steiner, 65 Ala. 499.

In Pennook v. Coe, 64 U. S. 23 How. 117, 16 L. ed. 436, the court held that whenever a party undertakes by deed or mortgage to grant property real or personal which does not belong to him or has no existence, the deed or mortgage is inoperative and void, and this either in a court of law or in equity; but this principle only applies where the mortgage is in present.

Courts of equity do not, like courts of law, confine themselves to the giving of effect to assignment of rights and interests which are absolutely fixed and in esse, but support assignments not only of choses in action, but of contingent interests and expectancies, and also, of things which have no present actual or potential existence but rest in mere possibility, the assignment of such interests only operating by way of present contract to take effect and attach to the things assigned when and as soon as they come in esse, and may be enforced as such a contract in rem, in equity. Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, C. C. 639.

The opinion in Mitchell v. Winslow, supra, was followed by the court in Ellett v. Butt, 1 Woods, C. C. 214, a case of a mortgage of a crop of cotton not then raised, affirmed in Butt v. Ellett, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 544, 22 L. ed. 123, the court holding that a mortgage clause in a lease contract could not operate as a mortgage prior to the crops to which it related coming into existence, but that the lien attached and was effectual from the time of the crops existing.

Invalidity at law imports nothing more than that a mortgage of property thereafter to be acquired is ineffectual as a grant to pass the legal title. A court of equity in giving effect to such a provision does not put itself in conflict with that principle. It does not hold that a conveyance of that which does not exist operates as a present transfer in equity any more than it does in law. But it construes the instrument as operating by way of present contract to give a lien which, as between the parties, takes effect and attaches to the subject of it as soon as it

"(1) That on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1885, John Schultz was the owner and in possession of the west half of the east half of the southwest quarter of section twenty-five, in the township of Saugatuck, in said Allegan county, and state aforesaid. (2) That on said day above named the said John

Schultz entered into a contract in writing with the said plaintiffs, which contract bore date the day and year aforesaid, and was introduced in evidence on the trial of said cause. (8) That, at the time said contract was entered into, said parcel of land described in said contract was the homestead of said comes into the ownership of the party. Kribbs v. Alford, 120 N. Y. 519, 524.

A party may mortgage property to be acquired after the execution of the mortgage, provided the deed is properly executed, acknowledged, and recorded, or possession taken of the property before any lien has attached, and equity will protect such a mortgage where the transaction is fair and honest. Gregg v. Sanford, 24 Ill. 17, 76 Am. Dec. 719.

No rule of law being infringed nor the rights of third parties prejudiced. Beall v. White, 94 U. S. 382, 24 L. ed. 173.

Whenever the parties by their contract, in clear terms express an intention to create a positive lien upon personal property not then owned, but to be subsequently acquired by the mortgagor, whether then in esse or not the mortgage attaches as a lien on the property as soon as the mortgagor acquires it, as against the mortgagor and all claiming under him, by voluntary transfer, or with notice, precisely as if the property had been in being and belonged to the mortgagor when the mortgage was executed. Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218.

The theory is, that the mortgage operates as an executory agreement attaching to the property when acquired, and transferring in equity the beneficial interest to the mortgagee, the mortgagor being the trustee of the legal title; equity considering that as done which ought to be done. Ibid.

As respects the subject-matter, such mortgage takes effect as of the time the crop comes into existence. Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Minneapolis & M. Elevator Co. 48 Minn. 404.

To the same effect Ambush v. Matthews, 41 Minn. 537, a case of a chattel mortgage on crops of grain to be raised during the season of a certain year.

To the same effect, Griffith v. Douglass, 78 Me. 532, 40 Am. Rep. 395; Edwards v. Peterson, 80 Me. 367; Williams v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 176, 22 Am. Rep. 653, 23 Am. Rep. 518; Williams v. Winsor, 12 R. I. 9; Moore v. Byrum, 108 C. 452, 30 Am. Rep. 558; Cressey v. Sabre, 17 Hun, 120; Quirique v. Dennis, 24 Cal. 154; Simmons v. Anderson, 44 Minn. 487; Kimball v. Sattley, 55 Vt. 285; Sillers v. Lester, 49 Miss. 513; Pitch v. Burk, 38 Vt. 663; Apperson v. Moore, 30 Ark. 56, 21 Am. Rep. 170; Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 461; Pennock v. Coe, 64 U. S. 23 How. 117, 16 L. ed. 436; Hurst v. Bell, 72 Ala. 336; Booker v. Jones, 65 Ala. 266; Gregg v. Sanford, 24 Ill. 17, 76 Am. Dec. 719; Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 408; Seymour v. Canandaigua & N. F. Co. 25 Barb. 284; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 22 Am. Rep. 644; Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191; Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, C. C. 630; Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112, 37 Am. Rep. 724.

It will prevail against creditors and purchasers with notice or without consideration, although the mortgagee has not taken possession. Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218.

Such a contract capable of being perfected by performance, is the subject of a valid mortgage or attachment in equity. Forman v. Proctor, 9 B. Mon. 124.

Under it the creditor with whom it is made may take the property into his possession when it comes into existence, and is the subject of transfer by his debtor, and hold it for his security, and whenever he does so take it into his possession before any attachment has been made of the same, or any alienation, such creditor under his executory agreement may hold the same, but until such an act is done by him he has no title to the same, and such act being done and the possession thus acquired, it then becomes holden by virtue of a valid lien or pledge. Chapman v. Welmer, 4 Ohio St. 481; Columbus Iron Works Co. v. Benno, 71 Ala. 577.

It is an executory contract attaching when the crops come into existence, with a license to enter upon the lands for the purpose of removal. White v. Foster, 102 Mass. 378.

The executory agreement is continuing and makes the possession of the creditor thereunder lawful and the lien good. Chapman v. Welmer, supra.

But in Chynoweth v. Tenney, 10 Wis. 336, it was held that such a mortgage did not amount to an executory contract which would give the mortgagee a right to enter and hold the property contrary to the wish of the mortgagor, and that such a mortgage was not effectual as an equitable lien, the court denying the position taken in Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, C. C. 630.

An owner may mortgage a crop not in esse and to be planted and grown in futuro, but such conveyance creates only an equitable title as distinguished from a legal one. Burns v. Campbell, 75 Ala. 238; Grant v. Steiner, 65 Ala. 499; Mayer v. Taylor, 69 Ala. 403, 44 Am. Rep. 522.

It vests an equitable interest but no legal title. Seay v. McCormick, 68 Ala. 549.

The lien of such a mortgagee will be enforceable against the mortgagor and those holding under him with record notice thereof. Apperson v. Moore, 30 Ark. 56, 21 Am. Rep. 170; Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 461; Pennock v. Coe, 64 U. S. 23 How. 117, 16 L. ed. 436; Hurst v. Bell, 72 Ala. 336; Booker v. Jones, 65 Ala. 266; Columbus Iron Works Co. v. Renfro, 71 Ala. 577; Gregg v. Sanford, 24 Ill. 17, 76 Am. Dec. 719; Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218; Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 408; Stevens v. Watson, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 302; Seymour v. Canandaigua & N. F. Co. 25 Barb. 284; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 22 Am. Rep. 644; Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191; Mitchell v. Winslow, supra; Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112, 37 Am. Rep. 724, where the mortgagee was held entitled to recover as against the sheriff seizing property on behalf of a prior creditor.

Equity will enforce them without question whenever there is anything for the mortgage to take hold of. Beard v. State, 43 Ark. 284; Apperson v. Moore, supra.

In any foreclosure proceedings. Apperson v. Moore, supra.

A mortgage of future crops, or crops to be grown, is valid in Arkansas, and the lien attaches when the crops are produced, under Act of February 11, 1875. Senter v. Mitchell, 16 Fed. Rep. 206.

The lien follows the grain after severance and removal, and the money after sale. Keel v. Levy, 19 Or. 450; Muse v. Lehman, 30 Kan. 514; Rider v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 127.

Such lien is rightly enforced by a judgment. Kribbs v. Alford, 120 N. Y. 519, 524.

But can only attach to chattels to which the mortgagor has acquired either title or possession. Ibid.

It would be valid in equity as a contract to as-

John Schultz and Deborah Schultz, his wife. (4) That the plaintiffs, in the spring of 1885, furnished the peach trees required in and by the terms of said contract, and set them on the land described in said contract, and in all things performed the agreements by them to be performed, according to the terms of said contract. (5) That on or about the 28d day of April, A. D. 1887, the said John Schultz and wife conveyed the premises described in said contract to the defendant by warranty deed, with covenants of title, and against incumbrances. (6) That, before and at the time of the execution and delivery of sign the property when acquired, and enforceable in that court as a right under a contract, and not as a trust attaching to the property. Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 102.

And as such enforceable as a right under the contract. Ibid.

Such a mortgage has been held a valid license to enter and seize the property if it should be in existence at the time of default, after which entry and seizure, the title vests. McCaffrey v. Woodin, 45 N. Y. 450, 22 Am. Rep. 644.

And such mortgagee has no right of action for the recovery thereof after maturity, until delivered under the mortgage, his interest being only an equitable lien. Wilkinson v. Ketter, 69 Ala. 435.

After in the case of a planted crop. Mayer v. Taylor, 69 Ala. 403, 44 Am. Rep. 522.

If the attachment or assignment takes place prior to the taking of such possession, the lien is lost. Chapman v. Welmer, 4 Ohio St. 481.

When the mortgage was not of a growing crop, the mortgagors not having entered upon the premises having no right to do so for two months after the execution of the mortgage, the cotton not being planted for more than two months after the right of entry accrued, the mortgage operating on cotton not planted but intended to be planted in proper season after entry, and cultivated to maturity during the term, the court held that if any other relation existed between the parties than that of mortgagor and mortgagee, the mortgage was invalid at law as a conveyance of things not in existence unless ratified by some act done by the mortgagor after their acquisition, but would in equity attach to the crop as it came into existence, transferring the beneficial interest against the mortgagor and all others than bona fide purchasers without notice. Booker v. Jones, 53 Ala. 286.

See "Special state doctrines and laws," infra, XXI.

VII. Description.

a. General rules.

Generality and indefiniteness of description will not avoid a conveyance. Ellis v. Martin, 60 Ala. 304.

Personal property can seldom be so described in any instrument as to enable a stranger to select it from other property of a like kind, without the aid of other facts than those mentioned in the instrument itself. Mills v. Kansas Lumber Co., 26 Kan. 574, 578.

A chattel mortgage ought not to be a drag net covering a whole act in general terms. Muir v. Blake, 57 Iowa, 662.

It is uncertainty that will not be removed when the conveyance is read in the light of the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time, their manifest design being considered. Ellis v. Martin, supra.

When such a debt, liability, or obligation exists, then any agreement or language by which property is sufficiently identified and designated as a security for its payment, will amount to a mortgage. Stearns v. Gafford, 56 Ala. 544.

Descriptions do not identify of themselves, but only furnish the means of identification, giving certain marks or characteristics which aid to single out the thing intended. Willey v. Snyder, 34 Mich. 40.

The property must be definitely pointed out so as to be distinguishable or capable of identification. Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co., 43 Minn. 404.

The description must be sufficiently specific to enable parties examining the record to identify the property. Winter v. Landphere, 42 Iowa, 471.

In order to affect purchasers or others acquiring rights in the crop with notice of the mortgage lien, there must be a description in the mortgage by which it can be identified. Dodds v. Neal, 41 Ark. 70; Krone v. Phelps, 43 Ark. 350.

It must be such as will enable third persons clearly to identify the property when aided by inquiries which the instrument itself indicates and directs. Strolberg v. Brandenburg, 39 Minn. 348; Griffiths v. Wheeler, 81 Kan. 17; Mills v. Kansas Lumber Co., 26 Kan. 574, 578.

Otherwise the mortgage is void for uncertainty. Souders v. Voorhees, 36 Kan. 138; Tootle v. Lyster, 26 Kan. 589; Parsons Sav. Bank v. Sargent, 20 Kan. 576; Golden v. Cockril, 1 Kan. 259, 81 Am. Dec. 510; Richardson v. Alpena Lumber Co., 40 Mich. 203; Hires v. Hurff, 39 N. J. L. 4; Fowler v. Hunt, 43 Wis. 345; Muir v. Blake, 57 Iowa, 662; Williamson v. Steele, 3 Lea, 527, 31 Am. Rep. 632.

It must be either general or special, so as to enable any one to take the deed and from its face designate the property described. Overton v. Holinshead, 5 Heisk. 683. To the same effect, Williamson v. Steele, supra.

The property must come within its descriptive words. Curtis v. Wilcox, 49 Mich. 427.

Yet it is not necessary that the full description given should apply to each article. Fordyce v. Neal, 40 Mich. 705.

So it is not necessary that the description of the property should be such that it may be identified by a written recital; it need not be such as would entitle a stranger to select the property, but must point out the subject-matter so that a third party by its aid together with the aid of such inquiries as the instrument suggests, may identify the property. Kimball v. Sattley, 55 Vt. 235, 45 Am. Rep. 614; Jones, Chat. Morag. §§ 53, 55.

A description is sufficient when in its terms, or by reasonable implication arising from the facts stated in respect to its circumstances, relations, and connections, it designates the property so that it can be certainly seen or ascertained. State v. Logan, 100 N. C. 454.

Resort must be had, in nearly all cases, to other evidence than that furnished by the mortgage itself, to enable third persons to identify mortgaged property, and generally where there is a description of the property mortgaged and the description is true, and by the aid of such description and the surrounding circumstances the third person would in the ordinary course of things know the property that was mortgaged, the description will be held to be sufficient. Mills v. Kansas Lumber Co., 26 Kan. 574, 578.

In Wiley v. Snyder, 34 Mich. 40, it was held that written descriptions of property were to be interpreted in the light of the facts known to, and in the minds of the parties at the time, and that a subsequent purchaser or mortgagor was supposed to acquire a knowledge of all the facts so far as it is needful for his protection and purchase in view of that knowledge.

said deed by said John Schultz and wife to said defendant, he, the said defendant, had actual notice and knowledge of the existence and terms of said contract between said Schultz and said plaintiffs, and that, before and at the time of the execution and delivery of said deed, it was agreed between said

Schultz and said defendant that said defendant should pay said Schultz $1,850 for said land, instead of $3,000, the full purchase price thereof, and that, as part of the consideration for the sale of said land, said defendant should settle with said plaintiffs for their interest in the peach trees on said land; said

A plaintiff in all such cases must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of the defendant's. Eggert v. White, 50 Iowa, 464.

In Estes v. Springer, 47 Mo. App. 99, the failure of a chattel mortgage to locate the property and state who is the owner was cured by other portions of the instrument showing the mortgagor's residence and his possession of the property.

The sufficiency of the description as submitted to the jury as a question of fact, was held error in Austin v. French, 36 Mich. 199, the question of the sufficiency being for the court.

Where the corn was green and growing when the mortgage was made and in the mortgagor's possession until levied upon, there being no identification of the corn at the time of the mortgage and no portion was ever designated or set apart as that which was mortgaged or intended to be, there being considerable more corn on the tract described than the quantity mentioned in the mortgage, not uniform in quantity and value, the court held the description insufficient and the mortgage void for uncertainty. Souders v. Voorhes, 36 Kan. 138.

b. Sufficient.

In Floyd v. Morrow, 26 Ala. 353, the mortgage deed conveyed inter alia the hire of certain slaves "or the use of them the present year, and whatever negroes, I [the mortgagor], may hire next year to make a crop with and the entire crop I may make this year and next," and was held not void.

Where there was a verbal agreement for the payment of a debt and of supplies to be furnished "out of the first cotton that may be gathered" the court held there was a sufficient description of the property to support a valid mortgage. Stearns v. Gafford, 56 Ala. 544.

A description as follows "my entire crop of cotton, and corn of the present year," was held not to be void for uncertainty, although very general and indefinite, still it was capable of being rendered certain by evidence showing the lands cultivated in that year, and the quantity of corn and cotton raised thereon. Ellis v. Martin, 60 Ala. 394. To the same effect, Seay v. McCormick, 68 Ala. 549.

Where the language of the descriptive clause was "all of the crops of corn and cotton and cotton seed and crops of every other name and description to be grown this year 1882 in this county," the court held it a valid pledge of the crop to be grown that year. Hamilton v. Maas, 77 Ala. 233.

Where the description of the property in a mortgage was "my entire crop of cotton and corn," the court held that though such description was general yet it was sufficient to put a party purchasing from the mortgagor upon inquiry, whether such cotton was the same as that conveyed by the mortgage. Smith v. Fields, 79 Ala. 335.

A description as "all my crop of corn, cotton, or other produce that I may raise, or in which I may in any manner have an interest for the year 1884" in a certain county and state, was held not void as to third parties for uncertainty, the mortgage being recorded and constructive notice, intrinsic evidence being admissible to specify or make clear the description. Johnson v. Grisard, 3 L. R. A. 736, 41 Ark. 410.

So a description as "all my entire crop of cotton and corn to be raised by me the present year or contracted by me," reciting the mortgagee's name, was held to be sufficient and not void for uncertainty. Henderson v. Gates, 62 Ark. 371.

And a description as "eight bales of cotton weighing 500 pounds each of the crop" which the mortgagor should raise in a designated locality was held not to be void for uncertainty where the whole crop did not show such a number of bales. Watson v. Pugh, 51 Ark. 213.

Again a description covering the crops to be grown upon certain lands "during the years A. D. 1888, 1889, and for each and every succeeding year until the debt hereby secured is fully paid" was held not to be void as to the crops raised by the mortgagor on the land two years after the date of the mortgage, by reason of uncertainty as to time for the growing of the crops. Merchants Nat. Bank of Devils Lake v. Mann, 3 N. Dak. 453.

A description in a mortgage as follows "an undivided two-thirds interest, the same being the entire interest of [the party named] in and to sixty acres of wheat now in and growing" on a specified portion of a certain section in a given township, range, etc., was held not to be void for uncertainty, the property being capable of identification by inquiry. Nichols v. Barnes, 3 Dak. 143.

So a description as follows "as an advance on my crops of cotton, corn, oats, etc., growing and to be grown in the year 1879, the same being now planted, to enable me to make my said crop, and I do hereby give them a mortgage on all my said crops to take effect as soon as my said crops are planted" was not too vague, uncertain, or contradictory, and not such a description as would entitle the owner to have an execution thereon quashed and the levy dismissed. Crine v. Tifts, 65 Ga. 644.

Again a mortgage describing the property conveyed as "all crops growing and to be grown" was held valid as to the crops growing at the time of the mortgage, although the year was not specified, but void as to the crops to be grown. Luce v. Moorehead, 73 Iowa, 493.

Where a mortgage was made of crops grown during the year 1880, the court held that the mortgage included crops raised in that year after the execution of such mortgage. In that case the mortgage was executed in the early part of the year 1880, so that no crops could previously have been gathered or grown in that year. Norris v. Hix, 74 Iowa, 524.

So where a mortgage described the property as inter alia "all crops to be grown or raised" by the mortgagor in a certain year on certain lands, described according to congressional surveys, the court held the description sufficient. Wheeler v. Becker, 68 Iowa, 733.

Again, where the description in the mortgage was as follows, thirty-five acres of winter wheat now standing and growing on the southeast quarter of section No. 29, township No. 24, of range 1 east, in Harvey county, state of Kansas, the court held the description sufficient and the mortgage not void for uncertainty. Muse v. Lehman, 30 Kan. 514.

And where the description was "twenty acres of wheat now sown and growing on the ground, and still to be sown on the twenty acres this present season," the court held it was not void for uncertainty, indicating the plain intention to cover the defendant at that time supposing that said plaintiffs would take for their interest in said trees the value of said trees at the time of setting, and interest thereon. (7) That the plaintiffs duly selected the year 1891 as one of the years when they would take one half of the crop, according to the terms of said contract; that said defendant was orally informed by said plaintiffs of such selection July 4, 1891, and that on or about August 22, 1891, the said plaintiffs gave said defendant written notice of such selection, and afterwards, and on or about the 26th day of August, 1891, offered and attempted to pick their share of the fruit, but defendant refused to permit them to do so, and denied that they first twenty acres of wheat sown, and that subsequent purchasers or incumbrancers should make inquiry as to which portion was sown. Wade v. Strachan, 71 Mich. 459.

Where the description was one half of all the crop growing, the court held it meant one undivided half of such crop, and as a description was sufficiently definite. Melin v. Reynolds, 32 Minn. 62.

A description as follows, "The N. W. one fourth of N. W. one fourth, and S. W. one fourth of N. W. one fourth, in section 11, township number one hundred thirty-four (134) north, of range thirty-eight (38), eightie, (39) aekers in crop, (38) aekers in wheat and (6) aekers ods, all of said property," it was held that the mortgagor's then growing crop of thirty-nine acres was intended and passed by the mortgage. Strolberg v. Brandenburg, 39 Minn. 348.

A description in a chattel mortgage upon all the crops growing upon "the northeast quarter - 17 - 106 - 44" then in the possession of the mortgagor in a certain town and county in the state "consisting of 64 acres of wheat, 15 acres of oats, 5 acres of corn, and 8 acres of flax" sown and raised by the mortgagor thereon, the mortgagor residing on and cultivating the land that year, the mortgage being duly filed, was held sufficient and the record constructive notice of which a purchaser from the mortgagor was bound to take notice, and therefore bought subject to the mortgage. Close v. Hodges, 44 Minn. 204.

So a description as "the entire crops of corn and other agricultural products to be raised and gathered by the grantor, his family, or employees under him during the year 1891, on land cultivated or controlled by him" in a certain county in the state, was held sufficiently definite. Russell v. Stevens, 70 Miss. 635.

Where a mortgage described the property as "now growing and standing" in a certain field, it was held that such description only applied to the cereals when nourished and supported by the earth, and did not include grain and corn cut or thrashed as against an execution creditor. Ford v. Sutherland, 2 Mont. 440.

A description as follows, "on a certain field or farm in the possession of," and, "on lands owned or rented by me during the present year," was held sufficient. Gwathney v. Etheridge, 99 N. C. 571; Atkinson v. Graves, 91 N. C. 99.

A description giving, "alien on all crops raised on lands owned or rented by me during the year 1883," was held sufficient it being found that the mortgagor was the owner of the premises upon which the crop was raised. Woodlief v. Harris, 95 N. C. 211.

So a description as follows: "My tobacco crop to be grown this year on my own land, and to contain eight acres, including one third in the crop of [a specified person] to contain not less than three acres and my one-third interest in [another's] crop not less than two acres, all on my own land to be grown this year,"—was held, in an indictment for violating section 1089 of the North Carolina Code, sufficient for the purpose of conveying tobacco cultivated in the year of the mortgage upon lands, for which the mortgagor had only a bond title to what he claimed as his own, and that the purchaser of the tobacco from the mortgagor was 23 L. R. A.

properly convicted under the above section. State v. Logan, 100 N. C. 454.

Again a description as follows, "entire crop of cotton to be raised by me or my tenants, on all my lands during the year 1880," was held sufficient, identifying the lands and the cotton embraced by it, with such definiteness that the same could be ascertained and known. Brown v. Miller, 106 N. C. 385.

Such a description was held good, even where the lands were recovered from the mortgagor by one having a superior title. Ibid.

A description as follows, "all my entire crop now growing or to be grown the present year, on my own land" was held a sufficient designation of the property. Well v. Flowers, 109 N. C. 212.

Where the description was, "all the grass, oats, and corn now growing on 230 acres of said farm," the court held such description sufficient. Kimball v. Sattley, 55 Vt. 285, 45 Am. Rep. 614.

In Crinkley v. Egerton, 113 N. C. 444, it was held: that a mortgage upon the crops to be raised on the farm described and "on any other lands he may cultivate during the present year" was valid as to the crops on the lands described, though void as to those raised on "any other lands," following Woodlief v. Harris, supra; Gwathney v. Etheridge, 99 N. C. 571.

c. Insufficient.

A description of "all of a crop of ten acres of cotton to be grown" by the mortgagor upon a field of forty acres of cotton, was held to be void for uncertainty, the court refusing parol evidence to mark out the particular ten acres intended. Krone v. Phelps, 43 Ark. 350.

In Darr v. Kempe, 54 Ark. 91, a description as follows: "All the crop of cotton which I may raise, or any which I may in any manner have an interest in for the year 1888, on five acres of land situated on and in the south portion of the west field on my own farm," was held not to cover five acres of cotton grown in the northern part of the field, although it was the only crop grown.

Where the mortgages described the property as "an advance on my crops of cotton, corn, oats," etc., "growing and to be grown in the year 1873, the same being now planted," . . . and . . . a mortgage of all my said crops to take effect as soon as my said crops are planted," it was held the description was too vague, uncertain, and contradictory, the mortgages being executed in April and May and no crops, except a small portion, being planted at the time of the mortgage. Crine v. Tifts, 65 Ga. 644.

A chattel mortgage ought not to be a drag-net covering a whole act in general terms. Muir v. Blake, 57 Iowa. 662.

Where the description was, "all the grain, oats, wheat, flax and corn raised" the mortgage not stating the year or time, the court held the description insufficient to raise an inquiry which would lead to the identification or discovery of the property conveyed, and held the mortgage void for uncertainty. Barr v. Cannon, 59 Iowa. 30.

Where the description was all and the entire crop of flax and wheat, and other grain or produce raised on the east half, etc., the mortgage not describing or referring to crops growing at the time had any share of the fruit; and that defendant took and converted to his own use the entire crop of fruit grown on said trees during that year. (8) That the value of the peaches grown during the year 1891 on the trees set by said plaintiffs on said land, under said contract, amounted to the sum of $1,541.07 at the time of the conversion of the same by said defendant to his own use, and that the value of one half of the peaches, at the time when they were so converted by said defendant to his own use, was the sum of $770.53. (9) That the value of one half of the peaches converted to his own use by said defendant before August 23, 1891, was the sum of $160, as near as the same can be now but to crops raised, the court held the description indefinite and uncertain as not showing when the crops were raised, and refused parol evidence to identify the property mortgaged. Eggert v. White, 59 Iowa, 464.

So where the description was, "all the cut and growing and having grown," it was held insufficient as not showing that it meant all the crops out, growing, and grown on the land. Cray v. Currier, 62 Iowa, 638.

Where a mortgage was executed upon crops to be sown and planted and described as "about fifty acres of wheat; twenty acres of oats; also twelve acres of barley and twenty acres of corn; also two acres of buckwheat to be sown and raised on the land leased . . . upon . . . lying and being in section 17" in a certain township and county, the court held such description indefinite and uncertain and further that in order that such a mortgage should be valid as against third persons, it should state the year and term in which the crop was to be grown. Pennington v. Jones, 57 Iowa, 37.

So where the crop was described as "all the crops raised by me in any part of Jones county for the term of three years" the court held it a roving description with nothing in the way of identification to suggest inquiry where the crops might be found, except the body of the county, and that third parties could not be charged with notice of such mortgage. Muir v. Blake, supra.

And a description as follows, 400 bushels of corn now growing and being on the west half of section 36, town 8, south of range 8, east of the 6 P. M., was held void for uncertainty, as giving no clue by which third parties might know what part was mortgaged and what reserved. Clark v. Voorhees, 36 Kan. 144, following Souders v. Voorhees, Id. 138, wherein the description was, 600 bushels of corn growing, located, and being upon the west half of section 36, town 8, south of range 8 east, if said corn matures before the maturity of the note secured in this mortgage, the said Burnside to shuck the same and put in cribs on the premises above described. Tootle v. Lyster, 36 Kan. 589; Parsons Sav. Bank v. Sargent, 20 Kan. 577; Golden v. Cockril, 1 Kan. 259, 81 Am. Dec. 510, to the same effect.

Where a husband and wife by duly recorded deed, executed a trust to secure a debt upon the "entire interest of grantees in twenty-five bales of cotton to be raised by them, or any hands they may employ during the year 1892, on lands belonging to them, or any other lands they may cultivate during the year," and subsequently the husband by deed recorded conveyed the same to secure another debt, it was held that such first mortgage was void for uncertainty in the description. Redfield v. Montgomery (Mss.) Oct. 30, 1893, overruling and disapproving of Draper v. Perkins, 57 Mss. 277.

In Well v. Flowers, 109 N. C. 212, it was held that a description as follows, "or any other land," was too indefinite, pointing out no particular lands. The lands of the maker at the time of execution of the deed could be seen and known, while those he might cultivate could not.

A description, "all our crop of cotton, corn, and cottonseed to be raised by either of us in the 38 L. R. A.

year 1893, on the place of," a person therein named was held insufficient as not showing that they were to be raised by the mortgagor upon lands sufficiently described in the deed, or by reference therein for identification, and as not showing that it was confined to crops grown on land next thereafter to be cultivated, and not extended to future successive use. State v. Garriss, 98 N. C. 733.

In Rountree v. Britt, 94 N. C. 104, the court followed the principles laid down in the prior cases, but held a description inter alia, "and my entire crop of every description," was too vague and uncertain to pass any title, that such a mortgage must designate the place of products in such a manner that it can be identified.

A description as follows "one bale of good middling cotton that I may make or cause to be made or grown during this year, to weigh not less than 400 pounds" was held defective as not designating and identifying the piece sought to be conveyed, so that it could be separated from other property of a like kind, and the mortgage void for uncertainty. Atkinson v. Graves, 91 N. C. 92.

See also Crinkley v. Egerton, 113 N. C. 444, et supra, heading, "Sufficient."

VIII. Parol evidence to identify.

Such just interpretation must be given to the description as will effectuate the intention of the parties, if this can be done consistently with the rules of law. State v. Logan, 100 N. C. 454.

Parol evidence would be admissible in the case of a description as one horse, for the purpose of identifying it, providing the mortgagor had only one such animal, but in case of his having several of the same kind there is a patent ambiguity, and such evidence would not be admissible. Spivey v. Grant, 96 N. C. 214.

In Nichols v. Barnes, 3 Dak. 148, it is said to be impossible to describe personal property so well as to preclude the necessity of parol evidence to identify it.

It is well settled that parol evidence is admissible to show the identity of property the subject of a chattel mortgage. Duke v. Strickland, 43 Ind. 494; Chapin v. Crane, 40 Me. 561; Skowhegan Bank v. Farrar, 46 Me. 293; Elder v. Miller, 60 Me. 118; Brooks v. Aldrich, 17 N. H. 443; Harding v. Coburn, 12 Met. 333, 46 Am. Dec. 680; Comins v. Newton, 10 Allen, 513; Putnam v. Cushing, 10 Gray, 334; Crosby v. Baker, 6 Allen, 295; Morrill v. Keyes, 14 Allen, 222; Lawrence v. Everts, 7 Ohio St. 194; Morse v. Pike, 15 N. H. 529; Burditt v. Hunt, 23 Me. 419, 43 Am. Dec. 239; Wolfe v. Dorr, 24 Me. 104; Winslow v. Merchants Ins. Co. 4 Met. 306, 38 Am. Dec. 369; Welch v. Sackett, 13 Wis. 243; Smith v. Jenks, 1 Denio, 580.

In Stephens v. Tucker, 55 Ga. 543, it is held that parol evidence was admissible for the purpose of identification of the part of the crop so mortgaged, the question being one for the jury.

Proof of extrinsic circumstances may be given by parol to apply a description to its subject-matter, and if it appear that the description is in some respects erroneous, those parts may be rejected, and what is left, if sufficient of itself, alone be regarded. Dodge v. Potter, 13 Barb. 201; Fish v. Hubbard, 21 Wend. 651; Dunning v. Stearns, 9 Barb. 630; Doe v. Roe, 1 Wend. 541; Loomis v. Jack- determined. From the foregoing facts, I find the following conclusions of law: (1) The plaintiffs are entitled to maintain this action, and the contract offered in evidence between said Schultz and said plaintiffs was admissible in evidence. (2) Said contract did not convey to the plaintiffs any interest in the land described in said contract, except the right to said plaintiffs to take therefrom one half of the crop of peaches for any two years they might select during the period of ten years from the date of said contract. (3) The homestead right of John Schultz and wife was in no way affected by said contract, and the question of the homestead right of said Schultz and wife cannot be raised by son, 19 Johns. 449; Jackson v. Clark, 7 Johns. 218; Atkinson v. Cummins, 50 U. S. 9 How. 479, 13 L. ed. 223; Pierce v. Parker, 4 Met. 80; Johns v. Church, 12 Pick. 557, 23 Am. Dec. 651.

Parol evidence may be admitted to apply the description to the subject-matter intended to be conveyed. Rountree v. Britt, 94 N. C. 104.

When applied the identification is complete. Carling v. Richmond, 28 Hun, 26; Robinson v. Holt, 30 N. H. 557, 75 Am. Dec. 233.

The description in the mortgage must, however, be sufficient for the purpose of identification or connection, even though evidence altrandi may be received to apply or continue the description therein with the property claimed to be mortgaged. Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. 48 Minn. 404.

In Curtis v. Martz, 14 Mich. 506, the court allowed extrinsic evidence for the purpose of identifying the property the subject of the mortgage.

Parol evidence of attending circumstances will be admissible to remove an uncertainty in the description of a mortgaged crop as "my entire crop of cotton and corn," manifesting an intention to cover the entire crop of cotton and corn raised by the mortgagor in the given year. Smith v. Fields, 79 Ala. 335, following Connally v. Spragins, 66 Ala. 258; Ellis v. Martin, 60 Ala. 394; Varnum v. State, 78 Ala. 23.

Although parol evidence is admissible to identify the property and its description, yet such conveyance will not be admitted in the case of unplanted crops. State v. Garra, 98 N. C. 753.

Where the description was, "190 acres of wheat; 136 acres of corn; 25 acres of rye; 60 acres of barley and oats, all of said crops growing upon" a specified section of a certain township and range, there being no other description of the property, the township and range being incorrectly stated, the court held that evidence of a mistake in the drawing of the mortgage was not admissible in an action by the mortgagee to recover possession against an execution creditor, the latter not being chargeable with notice of the mortgage. Adams v. Commercial Nat. Bank of Dubuque, 53 Iowa, 491.

Where the mortgage was "on all crops to be cultivated and made" during a given year according to the Act of the General Assembly of North Carolina entitled "An Act to Secure Advances for Agricultural Purposes" it was objected that the description was insufficient, and that while it purported to create an agricultural lien it lacked the statutory requirements. It was held that the objections did not lie to the introduction of the instrument as evidence, but to its legal efficacy as a conveyance. Spivey v. Grant, 96 N. C. 214.

IX. Notice.

a. General.

Purchasers of after-acquired property, having notice that the same is covered by a mortgage, stand in no better position than the mortgagor. American Cigar Co. v. Foster, 36 Mich. 366; Robson v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 37 Mich. 70.

The equitable lien of such mortgagee will entitle him to an action against a stranger having notice who removes, destroys, or conceals the crop. Collier v. Faulk, 69 Ala. 58.

When the mortgage is on an unplanted crop, 23 L. R. A.

any person who converts it to his own use after it is gathered, with actual or constructive notice of the lien, is liable to the mortgagee in an action on the case. Smith v. Fields, 79 Ala. 335, following Rees v. Coats, 65 Ala. 258.

And as against one receiving and selling the crop with actual or constructive notice of the mortgage. Leslie v. Hinson, 83 Ala. 263.

Section 1745 of the Dakota Civil Code makes the filing of a mortgage of personal property in conformity with law operate as notice to all subsequent purchasers. Nichols v. Barnes, 3 Dak. 148.

Yet such a mortgage would be void as to purchasers for a valuable consideration, mortgagees, and judgment creditors, without notice under section 1288 of the Alabama Code. Brooks v. Ruff, 87 Ala. 371.

A purchaser with notice has been held responsible for cotton received and sold by him before foreclosure proceedings were commenced, as well as for cotton then in his possession, even though liable at law for its conversion. Comer v. Lehman, 87 Ala. 362.

So trover will lie against a factor or commission merchant, who receives and sells the crop of a mortgagor without actual notice of the mortgage, provided the instrument is recorded. Marks v. Robinson, 82 Ala. 69.

An action on the case will lie against the landlord seizing and selling the entire crop with notice of the mortgage, the proceeds of the sale exceeding the amount due the landlord. Hamilton v. Maas, 77 Ala. 283.

A second mortgagee was held not chargeable with notice of an unrecorded prior mortgage, merely from the fact that he had been informed by the mortgagor that a prior mortgage existed, but only upon other property. Simpson v. Hinson, 88 Ala. 528.

Where a mortgage, executed upon a future crop to secure advances, was assigned and transferred, and subsequently the mortgagor, without notice of the assignment, delivered a portion of the crop to the original mortgagee who shipped the same in his own name to warehouse men for sale; in an action by the transferee for the proceeds of the sale, it was held that the defendants had a right to presume that the money paid to them belonged to the prior mortgagee and that having acted bona fide and without notice, the plaintiff's action must fail. Rice v. Jones, 71 Ala. 561.

See, also, Dodds v. Noel, 41 Ark. 70; Krone v. Phelps, 43 Ark. 350, head, "Description."

b. Constructive.

Chattel mortgages properly executed and recorded in the county where the property is situated are constructive liens, both in and out of the county, of the vendee's lien; and although the property is movable in its nature and may be carried into other counties than where the mortgage is recorded, yet the vendee's lien is assertable against subsequent purchasers, upon the idea that the legal title is in him and the mortgage of record is constructive notice to those who buy. Hutchinson v. Ford, 9 Bush, 818, 15 Am. Rep. 711.

Where a copy of a chattel mortgage of after-acquired property was duly filed, the court held it constructive notice to a purchaser from the mort-said defendant in this action. (4) Whether said contract was entitled to record or not, or whether such record would be constructive notice to defendant or not, is immaterial, inasmuch as defendant had actual notice of such contract before he purchased said land. (5) The contract relation between Schultz and Plaintiffs was not technically a sale of the peaches thereafter to be grown on said trees by said Schultz to plaintiffs, but was more in the nature of a sale of the trees by plaintiffs to Schultz; plaintiffs reserving, in writing, one half of the products of said trees for any two years they might select during the period of ten years. (6) The defendant, having notice of said contract before his purchase gator, and no defense in foreclosure proceedings. Kribbs v. Alford, 120 N. Y. 519, 524.

In Duke v. Strickland, 43 Ind. 494, ten acres of growing wheat were mortgaged by deed duly recorded, and subsequently harvested and sold by the mortgagor without the mortgagee's authority, and converted by the purchaser. The court held the purchaser liable for the value of the wheat upon identification thereof having constructive notice.

Notice of the existence of a debt is not constructive notice of a secret lien secured by the unrecorded mortgage. So held in Bell v. Tyson, 74 Ala. 253, an action for damages for conversion of a crop of cotton, although it was shown that the defendant had knowledge of the plaintiff's claim for purchase money. Wilkinson v. Ketler, 69 Ala. 435, to the same effect.

In an action to recover certain growing corn mortgaged to the plaintiff, a portion of which was gathered and sold to the defendants, the plaintiff claiming a chattel mortgage upon growing grain the mortgage being duly filed and recorded, it was held not constructive notice as to the grain when placed in a crib or bin as against a bona fide purchaser of such grain from the mortgagor in open market. Gillilan v. Kendall, 26 Neb. 82.

A recorded mortgage is constructive notice after severance in law, that is after condition broken. Kimball v. Sattley, 55 Vt. 235, 45 Am. Rep. 614; Fitch v. Burk, 38 Vt. 632.

X. Necessity and effect of recording.

The registration of such a conveyance by way of mortgage or deed of trust is sufficient notice as against subsequent purchasers. Butler v. Hill, 1 Bext. 375; Rankin v. Kinsey, 7 Ill. App. 215; Kimball v. Sattley, 55 Vt. 235, 45 Am. Rep. 614; Fitch v. Burk, 38 Vt. 632; Williamson v. Steele, 3 Lea, 527.

The recording of a deed under section 10 of the Indiana Statute of Frauds, does away with the necessity of actual delivery of the property to the mortgagee and is constructive notice of the mortgage. Duke v. Strickland, 43 Ind. 494.

In Johnson v. Crofoot, 37 How. Pr. 59, the court held that a chattel mortgage interest was defeated for want of filing.

A chattel mortgage is valid as against subsequent mortgagees when filed; aliter if not filed. Betsinger v. Schuyler, 46 Hun. 349.

In Fry v. Martin, 83 Ark. 203, it was held that as against subsequent purchasers from the mortgagor, the deed was invalid unless recorded.

The land upon which the crops are to be raised need not be specified, the instrument itself being recorded. Griel v. Lehman, 69 Ala. 419.

If the written instrument purports to secure the note given for advances, and conveys the crop, although not in words, which would constitute a statutory lien under section 1853 of the Alabama Revised Code, it is still valid as a mortgage of personal property as against subsequent purchasers, from the date of recording. Dawson v. Higgins, 50 Ala. 49.

The effect of recording such a mortgage is, that if such notice shows a general and leading purpose to retain a lien upon the crop for all supplies, although an inadequate sum be mentioned, and if the excess of supplies be furnished at the request of the subsequent mortgagee of the crop, the latter's lien will be postponed. Franklin v. Meyer, 36 Ark. 96; Bell v. Radcliff, 32 Ark. 645.

Under section 2 of the Arkansas Act of March 10, 1877, every mortgage indorsed to be filed, but not recorded and filed, is void as against the creditors of a mortgagor or against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees in good faith, after the expiration of one year from the filing thereof, unless within thirty days next preceding the expiration of one year from such filing, and each year thereafter, the mortgagee, his agent or attorney makes affidavit exhibiting the interest of the mortgagee at the time last aforesaid, claimed by virtue of the mortgage, and if the mortgage secures payment of money the amount yet due and unpaid, such affidavit to be attached to and filed with the instrument or copy to which it relates. McKennon v. May, 30 Ark. 442.

Where the agreement was entered into, and assigned "all said crops now harvested and growing or to be raised hereafter, and the entire avails of said farm and the stock thereon, and the increase of said stock, reserving enough thereof to pay the expenses of raising and harvesting the same . . . and carrying on said farm generally," the court held it was not a chattel mortgage so as to require filing to preserve the parties' rights. Haynes v. Ledyard, 33 Mich. 319.

In Thomas v. Bacon, 34 Hun. 88, it was held that a lease of a farm reserving a lien on all crops sold as security for the performance of the lease, with an agreement to execute a chattel mortgage of the same when requested, was good as between the parties, not only as to the wheat growing at the time but also as to that subsequently sold, attaching when the latter was put in, but inasmuch as the instrument was not filed nor followed by an actual and continued possession, it was void as against the subsequent mortgagee without notice.

As between the parties, the registration of the agreement as provided for in section 1739 of the North Carolina Code, is not essential to the validity of the lien. Reese v. Cole, 83 N. C. 87.

An unrecorded chattel mortgage upon all and every portion "of the cotton, corn, peas, small grain, fodder, and other crops which I may produce on said farm the present year, or so much thereof as may be necessary to fully pay and satisfy the amounts advanced to me," was held invalid as against a subsequent purchaser without notice and for valuable consideration. Sternberger v. Mo-Sween, 14 S. C. 35.

Under section 2830 of the Tennessee Code, all agreements and bonds for the conveyance of real or personal estate must be registered, and the court held that an agreement for the conveyance of a crop to be raised and gathered, is such an agreement for the conveyance of personal estate as would be void as against creditors or subsequent purchasers for value without registration. Jones v. Chamberlin, 5 Heisk. 210.

Being registered it is good as against the prior verbal lien of the landowner. Ibid.

Such mortgage being duly recorded, a contract by which a party is to have possession of another's farm and put in crops on shares, makes them tenants in common of the crops, and each may sell or mortgage his share in the crop. Ibid.

of said land, and having agreed, for a valuable consideration, to recognize the rights of plaintiffs under said contract, cannot now claim that said contract was void, or that it was not binding upon him. (7) The defendant and plaintiffs were the owners in common of the crop of peaches grown on said trees during the season of 1891, and the defendant having refused to allow plaintiffs to pick their share of said crop, and denied that plaintiffs had any right to any part of said crop, plaintiffs were entitled to their action of trover without and before any accounting as to the amount of said crop, or the share of each of the others therein. (8) Plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action, and a judg-

The contract, however, is valid and binding inter partes when properly executed and signed, and as against creditors or purchasers with notice, even without registration. Polk v. Foster, 7 Baxt. 98; Tedford v. Wilson, 3 Head, 812.

A growing crop may be sold or mortgaged, yet it has been held that future crops cannot be mortgaged in such a way as to make the registration of such mortgage effectual as against creditors or subsequent purchasers without notice. Polk v. Foster, supra; Milliman v. Neher, 20 Barb. 37.

In Polk v. Foster, supra, a registered lien on future crops of the purchase money was retained by the vendor with the understanding that the purchaser's title should not be absolute, except upon conditions performed. The court held that the vendor's right was prior to that of beneficiaries under a deed of trust executed after registration of the lien.

In Hicks v. Ross, 71 Tex. 353, it was held that a chattel mortgage was valid without the acknowledgment of record, the depositing of the instrument with the county clerk being a further compliance with sections 1, 2, and 4 of the Act of April 22, 1889, Revised Statutes, appendix 15, 16.

See also, Merchants & M. Sav. Bank v. Lovejoy, 34 Wis. 601, supra, head, "Necessity and effect of possession."

As to registration and filing of chattel mortgages, see note to Dempsey v. Pforzheimer (Mich.) 13 L. R. A. 388.

XI. To what crop or part of crop it extends.

Such a lien can only affect the crop of that year, and does not affect those of any ensuing year. Boswell v. Carlisle, 55 Ala. 564.

When creditors of the mortgagor or others dealing with the property, have acquired adverse rights, the mortgage of a specified number of articles out of a larger number will not be allowed to prevail, unless it furnishes the data for separating the property intended to be mortgaged from the mass. Dodds v. Neel, 41 Ark. 70; Krone v. Phelps, 43 Ark. 350.

In Rankin v. Kinsey, 7 Ill. App. 215, it was held that crops growing on mortgaged land are covered by the mortgage, whether planted before or after its execution, until they are severed, and the lien of the mortgagee attaches as well to the crops as to the land.

When the parties entered into an agreement for the sale and purchase of lands in installments, the contract providing that the vendor should have "and is hereby granted control . . . of and over, any fifty acres of wheat and five acres of sugarcane . . . that he may select as security for the payment of the sums" due, the court held that no lien attached to any specific portion of the crop until the vendor made his selection. Prentice v. Nutter, 25 Minn. 435.

A mortgage upon "one half undivided interest in and to all the oats, wheat, barley, and potatoes now growing and standing," comprises only such crops as are nourished and supported by the earth, and not, as against an execution creditor, crops out and standing in the field. Ford v. Sutherland, 3 Mont. 440.

In Wooten v. Hill, 96 N. C. 52, it is stated that the prior authorities in that state do not warrant the 23 L. R. A.

conveyance of an indefinitely prospective unplanted crop, and that it should be limited to crops planted or about to be planted, as the crop next following the conveyance. To the same effect, State v. Garris, 96 N. C. 733; Perry v. White, 111 N. C. 197; Lottin v. Hines, 10 L. R. A. 490, 107 N. C. 300; Taylor v. Hodges, 108 N. C. 344; Smith v. Coor, 104 N. C. 139, holding that the crop affected must be that planted or about to be planted in the year following the execution of the conveyance.

Where a purchase money mortgage covered "all crops of any kind raised on said land, to be security for the annual payment of each year, and shall not be removed from said land until the note due that year is paid in full," the same doctrine was applied, and therefore, the mortgage being dated four years prior, the mortgagor was not indictable for its unlawful removal. Smith v. Coor, supra.

A description, "all of my entire crop to be made on my lands" in a certain township, county, and state, passed the crops of the year of the date of the mortgage. Taylor v. Hodges, supra.

Atkinson v. Graves, 91 N. C. 99, also follows the doctrine established in Robinson v. Ezell, 72 N. C. 231; Cotten v. Willoughby, 88 N. C. 75, 35 Am. Rep. 564, and Harris v. Jones, 88 N. C. 317, but holds that it was never extended to the products of the soil to be raised without designating the place where they are to be produced.

Where a mortgage was upon crops thereafter to be raised upon certain described premises, and also "upon any other lands we may cultivate in said county," it was held that such last mentioned crops did not pass under the mortgage, the land upon which they were to be raised not being identified at the time of the mortgage. Gwathney v. Etheridge, 99 N. C. 571.

Where no definite or particular aliquot part of the crop was reserved, but merely so much as would make a certain number of bales of cotton, each weighing not less than a given number of pounds, it was held that no title passed in such crops which would be good as against an execution creditor. Williamson v. Steel, 3 Lea. 537.

Where a mortgage was of "the entire crop of corn, cotton, fodder, cotton seed, and all other crops of every kind or description which may be made and grown during the present year on said lands to the extent of 100 bales of cotton which is to be the first cotton picked," which provides that the mortgagor, "may mortgage to other parties any balances after such 100 bales," the court held that the italic words conveyed the other crops as well as the 100 bales, as security for the delivery of such bales. Comer v. Lehman, 37 Ala. 363.

XII. Title of a mortgage.

Crops to be raised are an exception to the general rule that title to property not in existence cannot be affected so as to vest the title when it comes into being. Andrew v. Newcomb, 33 N. Y. 417.

In the case of crops to be sown, it vests potentially from the time of the executory bargain, and actually as soon as the subject arises. Ibid.

A mortgage of an unplanted crop conveys no legal title to the mortgagee, but it conveys an equity, and if after the crop is grown it is delivered to the mortgagee in pursuance of the mortgage, this clothes him with the legal title and right to the ment should be rendered in their favor, and against said defendant, for the said sum of $770.53, with interest on the same from October 15, 1891,—$23.12,—making a total of $793.65, with costs of suit to be taxed. Geo. M. Buck, Circuit Judge. April 15th, 1892."

possession which will prevail over the right of any third person acquired from the mortgagor after such delivery. Marks v. Robinson, 82 Ala. 69.

Such a mortgage gives the mortgagee no interest in or lien upon the land, and attaches only as a lien on the interest which the mortgagor has in the crops when they are in esse. Simmons v. Anderson, 44 Minn. 487.

To the same effect are the cases, Rees v. Costa, 65 Ala. 256; Collier v. Faulk, 60 Ala. 53; Hurst v. Bell, 72 Ala. 336; Thompson v. Powell, 77 Ala. 361; Mayer v. Taylor, 60 Ala. 403, 44 Am. Rep. 522; Stern v. Simpson, 62 Ala. 194.

The title conveyed not being such as would support an action in trover, detinue, or trespass only being an equitable one. Grant v. Steiner, 66 Ala. 499. To the same effect, Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 268; Abraham v. Carter, 59 Ala. 8; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 22 Am. Rep. 644; Williams v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 176, 23 Am. Rep. 518, 22 Am. Rep. 653; Fonville v. Casey, 5 N. C. 389, 4 Am. Dec. 561; Apperson v. Moore, 30 Ark. 58, 21 Am. Rep. 170; Wetzler v. Kelly, 68 Ala. 440; Columbus Iron Works v. Renfro, 71 Ala. 577; Marks v. Robinson, supra; Jackson v. Baln, 74 Ala. 823.

So he is not entitled to a statutory claim suit for recovery thereof as against a creditor of the mortgagor seizing the same under legal process. Columbus Iron Works Co. v. Renfro, supra.

But the equitable title clothes the mortgagee with the right to maintain an action on the case in his own name against any one who sells the crop thus mortgaged and receives and converts the proceeds. Leslie v. Hinson, 53 Ala. 286; Thompson v. Powell, 77 Ala. 391; Kelly v. Longshore, 78 Ala. 203; Thorn-ton v. Strauss, 79 Ala. 164; Barnett v. Warren, 82 Ala. 557.

The mortgagee of a growing crop has a legal title thereto after the crop is gathered that will support an action of detinue. Wilkinson v. Ketler, 69 Ala. 425.

And his lien exists after severance of the crop in the mortgagor's hands against attaching creditors. Rider v. Edgar, 54 Cal. 127.

In Kellogg v. Olson, 84 Minn. 103, it was held that the legal title to the property the subject of a chattel mortgage, passed by the mortgage, and upon default the mortgagee was entitled to the possession without foreclosure, unless otherwise stipulated, subject, however, to the mortgagor's right to redemption. To the same effect, Fletcher v. Neudeck, 30 Minn. 125.

Where at the time of the execution of the mortgage the mortgagor was the owner and possessor of the crop, it was held that the mortgagee's title was prior to that of one claiming the crop under a parol agreement to apply the same in payment of the purchase money. Wetzel v. Webb (Cal.) Aug. 14, 1893.

Upon a contract for the delivery of one third of a certain crop of wheat, it was held that the right of the assignee to the one third was assignable and passed under a chattel mortgage of "all the right, title, and interest in and to that certain crop of wheat," such crop then having been out and standing in the shock on the land, the crop becoming the property of the mortgagee the moment it was set apart. Potts v. Newell, 22 Minn. 551.

The property will not pass where the only proof of delivery is a conversation such as, "You have a mortgage, all that is yours, you can have it."—23 L. R. A.

Mr. Hannibal Hart, with Messrs. W. B. Williams & Son, for plaintiff in error:

If the contract in this case conveyed or gave the plaintiffs any interest in the land, the contract itself was void because the wife of Schultz did not sign it.

had with an agent of the mortgagee. Wetzler v. Kelly, 63 Ala. 440.

XIII. Effect of.

a. As against creditors.

A parol sale of growing crops is valid as against creditors. Graff v. Fitch, 58 Ill. 373, 11 Am. Rep. 85.

Such a mortgagee could not hold such crops in the absence of such proceedings or possession, as against an execution creditor. Stowell v. Blair, 5 Ill. App. 104.

The equity of redemption of such a mortgage is liable to sale on execution, but the mortgagee is valid as against an execution creditor. Headrick v. Brattain, 68 Ind. 438.

One taking a chattel mortgage impliedly assents to an interruption of his possession by the mortgagor's creditors, for the purpose of realizing the equity of redemption. Hackleman v. Goodman, 75 Ind. 202.

In Headrick v. Brattain, supra, a mortgage upon future crops was held valid as against execution creditors, following the decision of the supreme court in Butt v. Ellett, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 544, 22 L. ed. 183.

A mortgagee takes his mortgage subject to the provisions of the statute (Indiana), and as long as the equity of redemption exists, though he may have possession of the goods, such possession is subject to his right in favor of the mortgagor's creditors and his possession may be temporarily interrupted for the purpose of disposing of the equity. Hackleman v. Goodman, supra.

In Mauldin v. Armistead, 14 Ala. 702, the proceeds of a crop planted or to be planted were held to be the subject of a valid trust for payment of debts, vesting the legal title in the trustees when the crop was gathered, even as against creditors of the mortgagor into whose hands the property had fallen, for the purpose of trade.

Where a debt was secured by a deed of lands, and the debtor subsequently contracted with his creditor to cultivate the land for a specified period, giving the creditor half the crop raised, the same to be credited on promissory notes, and a lien was created upon the whole crop for such payment, the court held, the mortgagor, debtor, having died, that the creditor was entitled to an equitable lien upon such crop enforceable in equity, and that such lien was superior to that of the debtor's other creditors. Kirksey v. Means, 42 Ala. 426.

In such a case the court declared and enforced the lien, although specific performance of the contract was prayed for and could have been enforced. Ibid.

Where a deed of trust given to secure a sum of money owing by the grantor together with further advances, conveyed the mortgagor's "entire interest in any and all crops of cotton, corn, and other agricultural products raised by him and hands he may employ" during a given year, with an understanding that the deed was to secure any advance on account of the crop made after the maturity thereof and not mentioned therein, the deed being duly recorded, the court held it valid as against creditors covering all advances made prior to its maturity and also those directly made with reference to the growing and harvesting of the crops. Gray v. Helm, 60 Miss. 131.

b. As against purchasers.

Corn growing upon the land was held to be chat-

Standing timber is part of the realty. Jacobs & Chaney, Dig. Real Prop. § 2; Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 550.

Growing crops, in fructus naturales, are a part of the soil before severance.

Benjamin, Sales, Bennett's 1st ed. p. 120;

4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 894; Green v. Armstrong, supra.

A contract to convey a crop of peaches, fructus naturales, to be grown in the future, is a contract that affects an interest in land.

The husband cannot sell, mortgage, or other-tel property which the mortgagor had a right to sell, and to which the purchaser acquired a good title, and the fact that the mortgage debt was due, the mortgagor being in default, did not divest him such right. Caldwell v. Alsop, 17 L. R. A. 732, 48 Kan. 571.

A mortgage of a crop to be raised on a farm during a certain term, but which is not yet sown, passes no title and the mortgagee has no claim against a purchaser for the crop or its value. Hutchinson v. Ford, 9 Bush, 318, 15 Am. Rep. 711; Comstock v. Scales, 7 Wis. 159; Cudworth v. Scott, 41 N. H. 456.

The purchaser of such a crop has a right to leave the same upon the ground until maturity, and to enter and gather and remove it after maturity. Bloom v. Welsh, 27 N. J. L. 177.

In Griffith v. Douglass, 73 Me. 532, 40 Am. Rep. 306, a mortgage upon after-acquired property was held void as against subsequent judgment purchasers attaching the same, though it might be valid as between the parties. To the same effect, Morrill v. Noyes, 56 Me. 453, 96 Am. Dec. 496; Emerson v. European & N. A. R. Co. 67 Me. 391, 24 Am. Rep. 39; Allen v. Goodnow, 71 Me. 420.

Where a chattel mortgage on the crops to be raised the ensuing season had been given to secure purchase money and duly filed, the purchaser selling the land before sowing the crops, the sub-purchaser assuming by parol the payment of the mortgage and that the same should be a lien as if no change in ownership had taken place, the court held that the mortgagee had no right as against such subsequent purchaser or his creditors to the crop, even though they had knowledge of the mortgage prior to the judgment, such an understanding between the original and the sub-purchaser being held to be an agreement to mortgage and not a mortgage. Bouton v. Haggart, 6 Dak. 32.

In Second Nat. Bank of Grand Forks v. Swan, 2 N. Dak. 225, it was held that a contract by the owner of the fee conveying a crop raised and harvested upon the land during the year of redemption, to the person holding the sale certificate of the land under foreclosure proceedings either as security or absolutely, had no precedence over a prior mortgage of such crop, nor could it prevail against a subsequent mortgagee having no notice of the contract, whose mortgage was created while the landowner was in possession.

Where a lease was executed subsequent to a mortgage, the crops upon the land at the time of a sale under the mortgage were held to pass to the purchaser, the mortgagee being entitled thereto. Lane v. King, 8 Wend. 584.

In Sherman v. Willett, 43 N. Y. 148, a crop sown by the mortgagor after the date of the mortgage and subsequent to default, was held to pass to a purchaser at the administrator's sale of the effects of the deceased mortgagor, the crop being reserved upon the foreclosure sale.

A mortgage of land binds the crops, and a purchaser at a foreclosure sale holds the same as against a purchaser at a subsequent sale by the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor. Gillet v. Balcom, 6 Barb. 370.

In Gardner v. Finley, 19 Barb. 320, it was held that a mortgagee was entitled to a crop as against a lessee subsequent to the mortgaged property and foreclosure sale.

Where a mortgage was, three acres of wheat four acres of potatoes, and twenty of oats, the potatoes not being in existence at the time, and subsequently sold by the mortgagor's executor with full knowledge of the mortgage, the court held in an action by the executor to recover the balance due on the sale of such products, that they did not pass by the mortgage and therefore the executor was entitled to recover their value. Creasey v. Sabre, 17 Hun, 120; Corderman v. Smith, 41 Barb. 404; Van Hoover v. Cory, 84 Barb. 9; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 23 Am. Rep. 644.

Where a mortgage was given to secure the purchase money of a farm, and stipulated for the delivery, by the mortgagor, of all the wood he might cut upon a certain line upon the mortgaged premises and for the mortgagee's lien upon the same, and also for a lien upon the crops of every kind for which the mortgagor was upon demand to execute and deliver such chattel mortgage as might be necessary until the purchase money was paid, the court held, the mortgagor having sold the crops to a judgment creditor, the latter having no notice or knowledge of the lien, that the purchase was that of a bona fide purchaser who was entitled to hold free from the lien. Wood v. Lester, 29 Barb. 145.

In Millman v. Neher, 20 Barb. 37, where a lien upon the crops as security for rent was stipulated for in the lease, and the lessee sold a portion of the crop, it was held, in an action for its value against the purchaser, that the latter had a right thereto as against the plaintiff. In that case the court was of opinion that the words "lien on the crops as security" did not import a sale or mortgage, as the clause contained no words of sale nor any from which a sale could be implied.

The mortgagor, while the grain was growing, assigned his property for the benefit of creditors, and the court held that the grain passed to the assignees and not to the purchaser of the land on a judgment on a mortgage, as the assignment amounted to a severance and vested the right in the trustees. Myers v. White, 1 Rawle, 333.

A purchaser of mortgaged lands as against the mortgagor or any person claiming under him by a purchase of the crops, was held not entitled to such crops as were standing ungathered on the land at the time of the purchase. Wills v. Moore, 59 Tex. 623, 46 Am. Rep. 234.

c. As between husband and wife.

Where a husband mortgaged lands of his wife for advances on a crop prior to the statute of February the 28th, 1887, the court held that his subsequent promise made to the wife to let her have the crop did not affect the mortgagee, and further that the wife's abandonment of the crop in consideration of a release of her property from a debt incurred for household articles did not work an accord and satisfaction. Ernst Bros. v. Hollis, 86 Ala. 511.

d. Judgment against.

Where growing crops were mortgaged during the pendency of an action in ejectment, the court held the mortgagee bound by the judgment against the mortgagor, such crops passing with the realty. Huerstal v. Muir, 64 Cal. 450.

And where a mortgage conveyed, inter alia, "forty acres of corn to be planted; fifty acres of broom corn to be planted, attended and delivered pany across a homestead by the husband without the wife's signature was void.

Evans v. Grand Rapids L. & D. R. Co. 68 Mich. 602.

The defendant can take advantage of the invalidity of this contract.

Dye v. Mann, 10 Mich. 291.

The contract, if affecting an interest in land, is absolutely void, and therefore not capable of enforcement.

The contract is purely a personal one bein Juniata . . . now in my possession, on section 1, township 7, range 11 W. Adams county, Nebraska," the court held such mortgage conveyed no title or lien to the corn raised by the mortgagor upon the land described and levied upon as the mortgagor's property as against the judgment creditor of the mortgagor. Cole v. Kerr, 19 Neb. 553.

In Crews v. Pendleton, 1 Leigh, 297, 19 Am. Dec. 750, it was held that a mortgagee purchasing at a foreclosure sale was entitled to the growing crops as against an execution creditor of the mortgagor in possession, and entitled to protection by way of injunction.

A judgment debtor redeeming, is entitled to the crop as against a purchaser at a sheriff's sale. Cartwright v. Savage, 5 Or. 397.

XIV. Severance of the property.

In a contest between the mortgagee and one having acquired a right adverse to the mortgage, a description in the instrument of a given number of articles out of a larger number is no description, where the means are not given for ascertaining what is intended. Dodds v. Neel, 41 Ark. 70; Krone v. Phelps, 43 Ark. 260; Watson v. Pugh, 51 Ark. 218.

Where, however, the number specified is more than the whole number of such articles, there is no other property of the same kind from which a selection is to be made and therefore no uncertainty in description. Watson v. Pugh, supra; Washington v. Love, 34 Ark. 98; Croswell v. Allis, 25 Conn. 301; Kelly v. Reid, 57 Miss. 89; Draper v. Perkins, Id. 277.

When only a certain quantity of articles of the same character, such as cattle, grain in bulk, or a particular crop, is undertaken to be conveyed, no title can pass until the quantity is selected and set apart. Dodds v. Neel, supra.

Until selection is made the latter property will be subject to execution by the grantor's creditor, the portion sold not being separated from that not sold, and the grantee having no title in any particular property of which he could bring action. Ibid.

In Dodds v. Neel, supra, the deed reserved a lien upon the land and on certain bales of cotton of a certain weight each, out of a crop to be raised each year upon the premises. The court held that such a mortgage would not be valid as against creditors or subsequent mortgagees, or others acquiring adverse rights, unless it furnished the dates for separating the specified articles from the mass.

Where land was conveyed, the consideration money being payable in installments, the purchaser conveying the land and a certain portion of each annual crop of cotton to be produced for six years to secure the purchase money, with power to take possession and of sale in default, it was held, the vendor having taken possession of the bales of cotton including some owned by a tenant of the vendee, to pay a certain yearly installment, and the tenant having mortgaged his crop for supplies, that the first mortgage was void as against the second mortgage for uncertainty, and the replevin could not be maintained against the vendor 23 L. R. A.

for the bales so taken. Dodds v. Neel, supra. See also, Rinehart v. Olive, 5 Watts & S. 163; Ream v. Harnish, 45 Pa. 376, infra, "Landlord and tenant."

XV. Application of proceeds.

Where two distinct debts were secured one by a mortgage upon land or real estate, the other by mortgage of a growing crop, the court held that the proceeds of the latter must be applied to the debt secured by the mortgage, and that no specific appropriation was required, the mortgage showing how the proceeds were to be disposed of and no change could be made without mutual consent. Greer v. Turner, 47 Ark. 17.

Where the mortgage embraced a crop of cotton to be raised during a certain year, to secure promissory notes, it was held that the mortgagee or creditor had a right to appropriate the proceeds of the crop when delivered, in payment of the secured debt, but to no other without express consent of the debtor, and such delivery operated eo instanti as a satisfaction pro tanto of the secured debt. Ogden v. Harrison, 56 Miss. 748.

Where the mortgage included "the rents, issues, and profits thereof," it was held under a decree of foreclosure and sale of the lands, the receiver appointed having harvested and sold the crop, that the lien of the mortgage existed against the proceeds of the sale of the crop for the deficiency, the amount realized from the land not being sufficient to cover the mortgage. Montgomery v. Merrill, 65 Cal. 432.

XVI. To secure crop advances.

A mortgage for advances to make a crop, properly executed and recorded, is valid and enforceable under the Georgia Code, § 3371. Stephens v. Tucker, 55 Ga. 543.

In Stallings v. Harrold, 60 Ga. 478, the crop lien was not created until shortly before the crop had matured in the fall. The court held it operative upon the year's crop and had precedence over a judgment rendered in the spring of the year.

So in Watkins v. Wyatt, 9 Baxt. 250, 40 Am. Rep. 90, 30 Am. Rep. 63, the court upheld a mortgage of a future crop of cotton to be planted, to secure supplies furnished and to be furnished for the purpose of making the crop.

Where an intended mortgage was to secure money loaned for the purpose of raising a crop of cotton, and bound the mortgagor "to deliver to him or his order so much of said cotton, when made, as will be sufficient to fully reimburse him for the money so advanced to him," the court held that although a mortgage of future crops might be made, yet that the present instrument was merely an executory agreement for the delivery of so much cotton as would satisfy the debt specifying no particular cotton, and not a mortgage, and that the mortgagee had no legal or equitable right to the property which he could enforce as against an attaching creditor. Thurman v. Jenkins, 2 Baxt. 426.

Where a tenant gave "a special lien and mortgage" upon the crop to be raised, specially binding between plaintiffs and Schultz. If there is any remedy for plaintiffs it is against Schultz for breach of contract, and not against defendant.

3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 907.

In this enterprise, plaintiffs furnished the trees, Schultz furnished the land, both assisted in setting out the trees and after the peaches were picked and shipped, there was to be an accounting between them and the proceeds should be divided equally.

This would make contract of partnership. 17 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 826.

the crop for payment of advances for making the same, it was held that such instrument was binding even though not in the ordinary form of a mortgage. McGee v. Fitzer, 37 Tex. 27.

See further, hereon, "Special state laws," infra.

XVII. Crops raised upon shares.

A cropper's share only falls due when the crop is harvested. Lamberton v. Stouffer, 55 Pa. 284.

Where the tenant of land rented for the purpose of cultivation upon shares, agreed with the landlord "that everything he had and the crop to be made should be bound for the amount" furnished him for supplies, the court held there was a valid parol mortgage against which the exemption was inoperative. Brown v. Coats, 56 Ala. 439.

A mere cropper has not such an interest in the crop that he can either sell or mortgage. Ponder v. Rhea, 32 Ark. 435.

When one let another have land to cultivate and raise a crop, furnishing part of the team, provender, and supplies for making the same which was to be his property, and after a certain portion had been reserved for the use of the land and certain indebtedness paid, the raiser of the crop was to have what remained, it was held that such raiser had no interest which he could sell or mortgage. Ibid.; Sentell v. Moore, 34 Ark. 687.

There is neither at common law nor by statute any lien in favor of a merchant who supplies for advances to make a crop, although reasonable for such purpose. No one is legally or morally bound or can have other than a speculative interest in assisting another to make a crop. Franklin v. Meyer, 36 Ark. 96.

But it has been held that a cropper may mortgage or alienate his interest in the crop without consent of the landlord, notwithstanding section 4452 of the Act (Mansf. Dig.) which does not place an absolute restriction upon the alienation by a cropper or tenant of his share of the crop. Parks v. Webb, 48 Ark. 236.

In Beard v. State, 43 Ark. 234, it was held that the interest of a cropper in a future crop might be the subject of such a mortgage, and that after such mortgage duly recorded he would be guilty of felony for a sale of the mortgaged property without proof of felonious intent to deprive the mortgagee of his debt.

A share cropper has such an interest in the crop as will entitle him to mortgage it, and under the Act of March 11, 1875, the legal title would vest in the mortgagee upon the cropper's right to his share being perfected, and an action for conversion of the same was maintainable. Parks v. Webb, supra.

The legal title vests in the mortgagee as soon as his share becomes perfect, so as to enable him to maintain an action for conversion under the Arkansas Act of the 11th of May, 1875. Ibid.

In Emerson v. Hedrick, 43 Ark. 263, it was stated that while prairie grass was not hay, when cut or made and raked it became hay, the drying and cutting or curing occurring between the former and latter process, and that therefore it might be said to be the production of the laborer who cuts and makes it, and that such laborer had a lien thereon for the value of his labor.

In Burgie v. Davis, 34 Ark. 179, the contract was to work during the year for the plaintiff "to help him make a crop of corn and cotton on the plantation," the plaintiff agreeing to pay by bales of cotton to be shipped to market, the proceeds collected and paid over to defendant. The court held that the defendant was a cropper and not a tenant, and had a lien for the amount due, and that a laborer under such cropper had also a lien, enforceable as against the landowner having the crop.

In Jewell v. Woodman, 59 N. H. 520, it was held that a mortgage of a tenant of a farm worked upon shares of the crops which were taken in lieu of rent, with an understanding that the whole were to be consumed upon the premises, acquired no rights which would entitle him to remove the same.

Where land was agreed to be worked on shares, a joint action of trespass is the proper remedy in cases between the landlord and the tenant, there being a joint property in the crop. Foote v. Colvin, 3 Johns. 216, 3 Am. Dec. 478.

Where land is let on shares, replevin is not the proper remedy in case of disseisin, where the grain has been cut and removed by the other tenant. De Mott v. Hagerman, 8 Cow. 220, 18 Am. Dec. 442.

Land let upon shares for the purpose of raising a crop was held not a lease to place the parties in the condition of tenants in common. Ibid.

Where the defendant, at the time the growing crop was levied upon, was a cropper and subsequently the crop was divided, it was held that at the day of sale the share was liable to be sold, even though it remained upon the land. Hare v. Pearson, 26 N. C. 76.

XVIII. Upon whom binding.

A contract to apply the profits from mortgaged chattels towards satisfaction of the debt will bind the personal representatives of the mortgagor. Stewart v. Fry, 3 Ala. 573.

The personal representatives of a mortgagor in possession are not bound to account with the mortgagee for sums received by the mortgagor in his lifetime, from the profits of the mortgaged chattels. Ibid.

Even though a specific contract to apply such profits in extinguishment of the debt existed. Ibid.

XIX. Landlord and tenant.

As between landlord and tenant growing crops are personal property and may be sold by parol contract. Nuernberger v. Von Der Heide, 39 Ill. App. 404.

In Wintermute v. Light, 46 Barb. 273, wine plants were held personal estate as between the landlord and tenant.

Growing grass may be the subject of a personal mortgage as the property of a tenant. Jencks v. Smith, 1 N. Y. 90.

The mere fact of a landlord taking a mortgage upon a crop does not displace his lien for rent. Franklin v. Meyer, 36 Ark. 96.

Such a landlord has the power at his option to enforce a statutory lien during its existence. Ibid.

In McCombs v. Becker, 3 Hun. 343, the court held that it was competent for a tenant, instead of mortgaging his crop as security for rent, to agree that the crop should be the landowner's until the rent was paid.

A tenant under a lease reserving a crop as rent, has no title whereby he can sell the same. Cooper v. McGrew, 3 Or. 327.

Such a tenant holds as a cotenant with the landlord. Ibid.

Legal representatives mean ordinarily executors and administrators.

18 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 221.

It cannot be claimed that the contract is one that runs with the land. In such a case there must be a privity of estate between a covenantor and a covenantee.

Under section 3469 of the Alabama Code, Sessions Act of 1878-79, p. 72, a landlord's lien for advances is equal to the rent lien, and entitles him to an action against a purchaser with notice. Thompson v. Powell, 77 Ala. 391.

The lien of a landlord under section 3467 of the Code of 1876, was held to be independent of the remedy by way of attachment and such as would pass by an assignment of a rent note, and entitled the assignee to an action against the purchaser of the crop. Westmoreland v. Foster, 60 Ala. 448.

The property of the crop is in the tenant as between himself and the landlord, where such relationship exists, until the crop is harvested, and such crop is not liable to be levied upon as the landlord's property until divided. Hansen v. Dennison, 7 Ill. App. 73.

Otherwise if the relationship of tenants in common existed between the parties. Ibid.

In Nestell v. Hewitt, 19 Abb. N. C. 232, the court stated that mother earth was the natural producer of all vegetation grown in the soil and had within herself the vital agencies of production, and it would seem to be reasonable and just to hold that the owner in leasing his land might legally and properly reserve to himself a valid lien upon all crops that should be raised thereon during the term, as security for his rent.

In this case the court distinguished the cases of Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 102; Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 123; Milliman v. Neher, 20 Barb. 37, and reversed the decision in the principle case in the court below reported, McCaffrey v. Wooden, 62 Barb. 316.

The owner of land acquires no property in part of a crop reserved for rent, until it is set apart to him by the tenant, the ownership of the tenant continuing until that time. Townsend v. Isenberger, 45 Iowa, 670.

In Kelley v. Weston, 20 Me. 232, where the tenant had contracted to cultivate and bag a crop of hops as payment of the rent, it was held that such hops were the landlord's property, the tenant having no title thereto.

Where the rent of a lease was secured by mortgage of the crop, it was held that such mortgage covered the part of the land under-leased by the lessee and attached pro tanto to the crop raised thereon. Harris v. Frank, 52 Miss. 156.

In Wentworth v. Portsmouth & D. Railroad, 55 N. H. 540, it was held that the relation of landlord and tenant existed where land was let upon shares, so that no right of action of trespass would lie by the landlord, he not being in actual possession.

A parol agreement between a landlord and tenant for the working of a farm on shares void under the statute of frauds as to the meadow land, will not be treated as valid with respect to the crops of grain and vegetables, and was at the most a mere revocable license. Hobbs v. Wetherway, 38 How. Pr. 385.

In Smith v. Taber, 46 Hun, 313, the court upheld an agreement in a lease to the effect that personal property of the lessee on the said land or thereafter brought onto it, and the crop raised and to be raised on the said land, should vest as collateral security for the rent, and upheld the same against such subsequent crops even as against a subsequent purchaser with notice, the lease being properly filed.

This contract was a contract of sale. A mere executory contract of sale of fruit not in

Where a farm lease contained a provision for the payment of the consideration upon or sooner than a given day in each year, as the products of the farm could be marketed, the produce and products to remain the property of the lessor until the rent paid, the lessee to have no right to sell or dispose of the products without the lessor's consent, the court held that such future products having a potential existence were the subject of a grant, and that the lessor's title was absolute and perfect vesting the same in him as soon as they came into existence, and that he had a right to possession both as against the lessee and those claiming under him. Van Hoozer v. Cory, 34 Barb. 9. To the same effect is the case of Conderman v. Smith, 41 Barb. 404, where the mortgage was of inter alia, "all the grain growing on the land rented; all the corn and potatoes now planted thereon; all the hay growing on the ground."

Where the landlord was entitled to a share of the grain in the ground as rent, such grain to be delivered by the bushel, it was held no title passed till it was severed and delivered, and that the same might be secured by the tenant. Rinehart v. Olwine, 5 Watts & S. 164; Ream v. Harnish, 45 Pa. 376, to the same effect.

In Everman v. Robb, 52 Miss. 653, 24 Am. Rep. 682, it was held that a lien reserved in a recorded lease on the "crops grown annually on the land as security for the rent" was valid and prevailed over a subsequent mortgage. To the same effect, Sillers v. Lester, 43 Miss. 513.

Where in a lease part of the crop is reserved as rent, it is a reservation and constitutes such part of the property of the landlord so that he may bring trespass for severance, either in his own name or jointly with the tenant. Moulton v. Robinson, Ladd v. Robinson, 27 N. H. 560.

In Steffin v. Steffin, 4 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 179, it was held that such a lease with a security clause not filed as a chattel mortgage, was inoperative as against judgment creditors. Stewart v. Beale, 7 Hun, 406, to the same effect.

Where a landlord having a prior lien became surety on a replevin bond, the court held he was estopped from denying the validity of the attachment and could not bring action for conversion of the crop. Brown v. Hamill, 76 Ala. 506.

Where a mortgage was executed to secure a year's rent upon, inter alia, "all the crops of cotton and corn to be raised on said Asia plantation during the year 1870," it was held that the future acquired property became subject to the mortgage as soon as acquired, and that such mortgage was good as against subsequent mortgagees having notice by record thereof. Sillers v. Lester, supra. To the same effect is Cayce v. Stovall, 50 Miss. 396.

Where the mortgage conveyed to a trustee all the crops of corn and cotton to be grown on the plantation in a certain year, or to secure the payment of advances for supplies for the purpose of making the crop, it was held that the landlord, the mortgagee having failed to make the advances, could not, after notice of the trust, supply or make the supplies himself and take the crop in payment, without first notifying the mortgagee to fulfill his contract, and in default he would perform the same himself. Paxton v. Meyer, 58 Miss. 445.

Where a lease provided that the amount due

Such a contract of sale was void because the subject of sale, viz., the peaches, was not in existence and therefore there could be no subject-matter of the contract.

Benjamin, Sales, §§ 76-78.

for rent should be a lien upon the crop, and subsequently the lessee executed a chattel mortgage upon such crop, the mortgagee having no notice of the condition, and the lease not being recorded the court held his lien superior to that of the lessor. Gandy v. Dewey, 23 Neb. 175.

Where a lease contained a covenant or proviso that the rent should be a perpetual lien upon all crops, no matter whether exempt from execution or otherwise, the court held it created a lien or equitable charge, and that the rights of a party to execute it and its validity depended upon the same principle as a mortgage. Fejvary v. Broesch, 52 Iowa, 83, 35 Am. Rep. 281.

Where there is an agreement between the landlord and tenant, that the former shall have part of the crop as rented with possession of the whole crop until the rent is paid, the tenant cannot pass the title by a sale of such crop. Wentworth v. Miller, 53 Cal. 4.

Where a crop was planted under an agreement that the landlord should have a portion thereof, and the tenant subsequently mortgaged it, it was held that the mortgagee taking possession, and refusing to deliver plaintiff's share and converting the whole crop, was liable for the landlord's share, such mortgage only extending to the mortgagor's interest. Sunol v. Molloy, 63 Cal. 369.

An execution issued to enforce a crop lien for supplies is invalid where the affidavit foreclosing the lien as fatally defective is known, but a landlord is entitled to such a lien without a special contract in writing, under section 1978 of the Code of Georgia, Acts 1875, p. 20. Eve v. Crowder, 59 Ga. 799, where the affidavit neither affirmed a special contract nor the relation of landlord, and merely stated that the supplies were furnished, but did not disclose how or under whom the defendant held the land.

Where property was leased, the rent for the same being one half of all of the crops, no crops to be sold or removed until rent, advances, and loans were paid, it was held that advances made bona fide by provisions or by pledge or mortgage, could be secured and that an estoppel in pais was created by a verbal assurance that such moneys should be repaid. Brown v. Thomas, 14 Ill. App. 428.

In Frout v. Hardin, 56 Ind. 135, 28 Am. Rep. 18, where the landlord was to receive a portion of the crop for rent, it was held that he was liable to an action of damages for the trespass of his animals upon the tenant's premises, prior to the severance and division of the crop.

In an action trespass quare clausum fregit, it was held that the lessor of land for the purpose of raising a crop on shares, receiving his share of the products standing on the land, would not be a trespasser by entering upon that part of the close upon which his share was given, and was to be regarded as the exclusive proprietor of the crop. Woodruff v. Adams, 5 Blackf. 317, 36 Am. Dec. 122.

A chattel mortgage upon future crops of the next season was executed by a tenant at will to whose wife the landlord subsequently leased the property with the tenant's approval, and it was held that neither the tenant nor the mortgagee had any title to the crop. Gammon v. Buel (Iowa) Oct. 24, 1892.

Where a farm lease stipulated that the lessor (the plaintiff) should have a lien as security for
§3 L. R. A.

Potentially means possibility; not in act; not positively; in efficacy, not in actuality. With this definition in view, it cannot be said that the mere ownership or possession of the soil carries with it the production of crops potentially.

Cole v. Kerr, 19 Neb. 553.

rent upon inter alia other personal property which might be put upon the said premises, the court held in an action for converting farm produce by the lessor's agent after default in payment of the rent, that the instrument was in effect a chattel mortgage in so far as it created a lien upon property not then in existence or acquired, and although no title would pass at law yet that such instrument gave the lessor a license to seize the property and that after seizure a title would pass; and the court further held that in equity the instrument transferred a beneficial interest without any new act intervening, upon such future property coming into existence, such a clause would cover crops subsequently raised upon the farm. McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 22 Am. Rep. 644.

Where a lease providing that the lessee should raise and handle a crop and deliver half as rent, was subsequently modified by a parol contract for the furnishing of supplies by the landlord who was to retain possession and control and sell the crop, the court held in a suit by a mortgagee of the tenant without notice of the latter contract that the modifications were valid, and that the mortgagee had no greater interest than the mortgagor or tenant under the subsequent agreement. Meacham v. Herndon, 86 Tenn. 366.

The mortgage of future crops as security for rent of the land is valid. Phelps v. Murray, 2 Tenn. Ch. 748, 753.

Where a mortgagee has notice of a contract with the owner of the land for the making of advances for the raising of a crop, it was held that the mortgagee's lien was subject to the claim of the owner for the advances and was not affected by the non-recording of such contract. McGee v. Fitzer, 37 Tex. 27.

Such a mortgage created by a tenant or lessee cannot affect the title of the landlord or lessor to his share of the crop, where the lease reserved a certain proportion of the crops as rent. Ibid.

In such a case the mortgagee's lien only extended to that portion of the crop which remained in him after paying the owner's advances. Ibid.

A lease reserving the crops as security for rent is valid and binds the crops as against the creditors of the lessee. Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 465.

Where a lessee conveyed the future crops to the lessor, to be held by him till the rent was paid, it was held to have the same effect as though such crops were reserved to the lessor in the lease. Bellows v. Wells, 36 Vt. 539.

Where a lessee planted corn and subsequently made a sale of it upon the expiration of the term, the court held that the corn being planted was a chattel and the subject of sale, the title being reserved to the lessee, even though the term expired before severance, the lease limiting and qualifying the reversion of the lessor. Booker v. Jones, 55 Ala. 266; Grantham v. Hawley, Hob. 133.

Where a lease provided that the lessor should have a lien on after-acquired produce, it was held valid as a chattel mortgage if duly filed, and was not a mere executory agreement for an equitable lien. Nestell v. Hewitt, 19 Abb. N. C. 287.

To hold that the owner of land may hold a secret lien on the crop being raised by his tenant, for advances to be made to such tenant, would put it in the power of the tenant to practice innumerable frauds on innocent parties dealing with him, on Things have a potential existence which are the natural product, or expected increase, of something already belonging to the vendor.

Hutchinson v. Ford, 9 Bush, 818, 15 Am. Rep. 711.

A chattel mortgage can have no valid operation upon a crop of grain, given at or about the faith of the products of their labor. Jones v. Chamberlin, 9 Heisk. 210.

XX. Conversion.

The vendee of a growing crop acquires such an exclusive right to the possession of the land whereon it grows as to make that land his close until the crop is gathered and removed, and therefore he may maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against any who enter thereon without his leave. Stewart v. Doughty, 9 Johns. 108; Austin v. Sawyer, 9 Cow. 39.

A purchaser of such a crop has a remedy against those disturbing him in the enjoyment thereof, by way of action of trespass. Brittain v. McKay, 23 N. C. 265, 36 Am. Dec. 738.

In Miller v. Baker, 1 Met. 27, trees and shrubs, part of a nursery stock, were held personal chattels and as independent of realty for the wrongful taking and conversion of which an action of trespass ut vultis asportatis would lie.

A mortgagee of a crop not in esse but to be produced in futuro, has not such a legal title in the crop as will support an action of trover, detinue, or trespass, an equitable title being all he has. Elmore v. Simon, 67 Ala. 526. To the same effect, Grant v. Steiner, 66 Ala. 499; Rees v. Coats, Id. 256.

In Rees v. Coats, supra, the dictum of the court in Brown v. Coats, 56 Ala. 439, was held erroneous and it was declared that a parol mortgage on a future crop, which might be valid inter partes, did not operate to convey such a title in the mortgagee not in possession, as would entitle him to maintain an action of trover or detinue against third parties, but that as against third parties with notice such a mortgagee would be entitled to a special action on the case in case of conversion.

In an action for conversion of cotton upon which the plaintiffs claimed a prior mortgage, where the evidence was conflicting as to whether or not the cotton claimed was part of the mortgagor's crop, the court held an instruction was proper, making it incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove to the jury that the cotton was part of the mortgagor's crop. Woolsey v. Jones, 34 Ala. 88.

In Robinson v. Kruse, 29 Ark. 575, it was held that trover might be maintained against the owner of the land by a mortgagee of a crop which had been converted by the land owner into his own possession for rent.

Where a purchaser of wheat from a mortgagor of a duly recorded mortgage mixed the wheat with his own and dealt with the same in the ordinary way of trade, he was held liable for conversion, having constructive notice of the mortgagee's title. Nichols v. Barnes, 3 Dak. 143.

An instrument executed as security for a loan of money to be made by advances towards the cultivation of a growing crop, there being provisions inconsistent with the mortgagee's ownership, was held to be a mere mortgage and did not entitle him to an action in trover for recovery of the crop. Stokes v. Hollis, 43 Ga. 282.

In an action in trover to recover a wrongful conversion of corn, the possession of which was retained by the mortgagor under the terms of the mortgage and remortgaged by him, the corn being gathered by the mortgagor and handed over to the first mortgagee who sold to defendants, which was paid for by them and sold and shipped by them to other parties, after which second mortgagee assigned to the plaintiff, who brought suit insisting that the first mortgage was void.—the court held that the assignment passed the mortgagee's right, except the right to sue the parties through whose hands the property passed, for injuries prior to assignment, and that it was necessary for the assignee, in order to maintain such an action, to be the owner or entitled to the possession of the property at the time of the wrong committed. Bowers v. Bodley, 4 Ill. App. 279.

Constock v. Scoles, 7 Wis. 159; Chynoweth v. Tenney, 10 Wis. 397; Wade v. Strachan, 71 Mich. 459; Bates v. Smith, 83 Mich. 349.

Where a mortgage was given by a tenant who worked the farm on shares and described the property as "two thirds of all the wheat that should be sown the then coming fall on the farm," the mortgage being filed, and subsequently the land was sold, and yielded a crop of three hundred and five bushels, and during the growth of the wheat the mortgagor inserted a clause in the mortgage making it a lien upon all the property the same for the subsequent as for the present year, and later surrendered possession and removed from the premises,—the court held that the mortgage and subsequent stipulation inserted therein, created as between the first and second mortgagee, the second mortgage being executed after the possession taken by the first mortgage, but one mortgage, and a sale by such first mortgagee created no liability in trover, the second mortgagee taking with notice of the prior mortgage. Grimes v. Rose, 24 Mich. 416.

After condition broken, the mortgagee's title becomes vested with an immediate right of possession, and the purchaser of the crop from the mortgagor will become liable as for conversion upon refusal to deliver up the property. Close v. Hodges, 44 Minn. 204.

In Stamps v. Gilman, 43 Miss. 456, it is held that a mortgagee of chattels could maintain trover for a conversion by a stranger while in the possession of the mortgagor, after condition broken. He is purchaser sub modo, holding the double relation of creditor and purchaser.

Where the deed described the property as "all the hay and grain of every kind that grows on the farm on which I now live the present year," and part of the crop was sown in the fall of the year previous to the execution of the deed, and other productions were sown in the spring of the same year in which the mortgage was executed, it was held in an action of trover for carrying away the products of the year in which the mortgage was executed, that no part of the crop sown in the spring of the year passed under the mortgage, but that the action could be maintained to recover the value of hay and the winter rye, the same being in esse at the time of the mortgage. Cudworth v. Scott, 41 N. H. 456.

In the above case the reliance was placed upon section 1, chapter 138, of the Compiled Laws, making personal property and crops of every description, whether the same have or have not come to maturity, subject to mortgage agreeably to the provisions of such chapter.

After foreclosure and sale of the premises in possession of the mortgagor's lessee under a lease subsequent to the mortgage, the lessee is a wrongdoer and liable to action for taking and carrying away the crops. Simers v. Sattys, 3 Denio, 219. To the same effect, Lane v. King, 8 Wend. 584, 24 Am. Dec. 105.

The mortgagee of one of two tenants in common

Where the subject-matter has neither an actual nor potential existence such an agreement is usually denominated an executory contract, and for its violation the remedy of the party injured is by an action to recover damages.

of an interest in a fallow for the purpose of raising wheat is a co-tenant with the landowner provided such tenancy existed with respect to the crop, and therefore the sale of the wheat by the latter without the assent of the plaintiff and assignor of the mortgage and with the assent of the defendant, who claimed title to the half covered by the mortgage and the receipt by him of the produce of that half was held, as to the plaintiff, a conversion. Shuart v. Taylor, 7 How. Pr. 251.

In Wood v. Dudley, 8 Vt. 420, it was held that an action for trover could not be maintained by a mortgagor against the mortgagee prior to redemption of the chattels.

In Malone v. Hill, 68 Ala. 225, a mortgagor of crops having died, the same was sold by a commission merchant and the proceeds paid to a distributee of the estate, who had not qualified as administrator for the purpose of furnishing a future crop. The court held that such merchant paid over the same at his peril in allowing any one but the regularly appointed administrator to draw the fund.

XXI. Special state doctrines and laws. Alabama.

Under section 1800 of the Alabama Revised Code, any person having a lien upon the crop for advances to assist in making a crop, has the same rights and remedies to enforce such lien as landlords have for collection of rents. McKinney v. Benagh, 48 Ala. 358.

Such a lien is not dissolved by the death of the defendant and the insolvency of his estate, and is enforceable by sale. Ibid.

In Dawson v. Higgins, 50 Ala. 49, it was held that the language of section 1858 of the Alabama Revised Code must be strictly pursued in order to create a statutory lien for crop advances. See also Comer v. Daniel, 60 Ala. 424.

Its form and spirit must be complied with in every essential particular. Griel v. Lehman, 50 Ala. 419.

It is necessary that the articles should be such as are enumerated in the above section. Watson v. Auerbach, 57 Ala. 353.

A case must be shown conforming in every respect with the sections. Ibid.

Thus a mere statement that the "advances were made to me to enable me to make a crop the present year" is insufficient, not showing in writing the person to whom the advance is made, and that the same was obtained bona fide for such purpose. Dawson v. Higgins, supra.

Where, however, such mortgage is in the form and for the consideration prescribed by the statute the lien attaches to a mortgage or assignment of crops not planted. Stewart v. Fry, 3 Ala. 573; Robinson v. Mauldin, 11 Ala. 977; Abraham v. Carter, 53 Ala. 8; Boswell v. Carlisle, 55 Ala. 554, wherein it was held that a third party might show the same to be false and for an antecedent debt.

If the sections of the code are strictly followed, the mortgagee has a preferential lien upon the crop raised, as against all except the landlord. Flexner v. Dickerson, 65 Ala. 129.

Unless it is sufficient to operate as a mortgage the mortgagee will not have such an interest as will entitle him to maintain an action for a trial of the right of property. Boswell v. Carlisle, supra.

The contract in this case could be but an agreement to sell.

Boulton v. Haggart (S. Dak.) Feb. Term, 1888.

A mortgage on crops to be grown, which fails to state the year or time when the crops are to be raised, is void.

If the advance is bona fide for the statutory purposes, the lender's lien will not be affected by any misapplication on the borrower's part. Watson v. Auerbach, 57 Ala. 353.

It is not the subject of extension as between the parties. Ibid.

Such lien is not destroyed or impaired by the fact that the same instrument contains a mortgage of the same property to secure the same debt, but the resort to one security would render it improper to resort to the other at the same time. Grady v. Hall, 59 Ala. 341.

The requirements of section 3236 of the Code of 1876 being complied with, the mortgagee has a lien on the crop and upon the stock furnished with the money so advanced and a right to sue out attachment to enforce this lien co-extensive with the rights of landlords to sue to such process for the collection of rent under sections 3238, 3472, of the same Code. Ibid.

Where a note was given for advances for the purpose of making a crop and recited that the advance was made in provisions and a horse, the court held it was fatally defective for uncertainty as a lien upon the crop under the above sections. Schuessler v. Gains, 68 Ala. 554.

A mortgage under the above section of the Revised Code which states the consideration as a present debt "to enable them to make a crop the present year, and without which advance it would not be in their power to procure the necessary teams, provisions, farming implements and other materials essential to make such crop,"—was held not to create a statutory lien, but might be valid as a mortgage and allowed to stand as a security for the advances. Tison v. People's Sav. & Loan Assn. 57 Ala. 323.

An instrument which shows as a consideration "necessary advances and horses, mules, oxen and necessary provisions, farming tools and implements, and money to procure the same obtained by me bona fide for the purpose of making a crop the present year," and also stating, "without such advances it would not be in my power to procure the necessary teams, provisions, money, implements, etc., to make a crop the present year,"—the court held there was a substantial compliance with section 3236 of the Code, and to create a statutory lien upon the crop. Connor v. Jackson, 74 Ala. 464.

Where a mortgage was given to secure a promissory note, the consideration being described as "an advance for the purpose of making a crop," the note conforming to the requirements of section 3236 of the Code and showing a contemplated future advance for the purpose of making a crop during the then current year, the court held that only such articles as came within the express provisions of the statute could be secured by such a mortgage not exceeding the amount of the note. Marcus v. Robinson, 76 Ala. 550.

Where a mortgage declared that "this mortgage is made a lien on the crop of cotton made on the place" to the extent of the annual payment due for each succeeding year, it was held that this was not a mortgage, but a mere lien created by contract or a right to charge the cotton with the payment of the debt; a mere equitable lien in the nature of a mortgage conferring no legal estate or interest in the cotton such as is necessary to support an action of trover. Bush v. Garner, 73 Ala. 162.

Barr v. Cannon, 69 Iowa, 20; Pennington v. Jones, 57 Iowa, 37; Eggert v. White, 59 Iowa, 464.

Under section 3467 of the Alabama Code, a landlord has a prior lien for rent and advances on his tenant's crops to that of a merchant advancing, under sections 3236, 3237, of the Code. Brown v. Hamil, 76 Ala. 506.

Arkansas.

Prior to the Act of February 11, 1875, making valid mortgages on crops to be planted, a mortgage on such a crop was invalid. Tomlinson v. Greenfield, 31 Ark. 557.

The Act of February 11, 1875, put an end to the conflict between law and equity in respect to mortgages of unplanted or immature crops, by making such mortgages good at law as well as in equity. Jarrett v. McDaniel, 34 Ark. 598; Beard v. State, 43 Ark. 284.

Section 4749 of the Arkansas Digest of Statutes (ed. 1884) provides, all mortgages executed on crops already planted, or to be planted, shall have the same force and effect to bind such crops and their products as other mortgages now have to bind property already in being (Act Feb. 11, 1875).

Under this Act the court held in Jarrett v. McDaniel, supra, that a mortgage executed subsequent to the date of the act, upon an unplanted crop, was valid so as to enable the mortgagee to replevin the mortgaged property.

California.

Section 2972 of the California Code provides that the lien of a mortgage on the growing crop continues on the crop after severance, whether remaining in its original state or converted into another product, so long as the same remains on the land of the mortgagor, and it has been held that there is nothing in the language of the section under which the lien could be lost through the tortious removal of the crop by a third person. Wilson v. Prouty, 70 Cal. 196, following Martin v. Thompson, 68 Cal. 4. In such a case the mortgagee has the right to maintain an action for conversion in his own name.

A mortgage upon growing crops executed, acknowledged, and recorded like mortgages upon real estate, is valid against third parties without delivery of possession, but the lien of such mortgage ceases as against subsequent purchasers, unless the crops when harvested be delivered to the mortgagee as required in other cases of mortgages of personal property. Wood's Cal. Dig. 107; Quirique v. Dennis, 24 Cal. 154; Stat. 1856, p. 87, section 17, of the Act of May 19, 1850, as amended by the Act of April 9, 1856.

In Goodyear v. Williston, 43 Cal. 11, it was held that the above section was to protect the mortgagee's lien without delivery of possession until the property is harvested, but afterwards the continuance of the lien depended upon the actual delivery and retention of the crop by the mortgagee.

Where such crops after being cut were sold and delivered by the mortgagor to a bona fide purchaser for value, it was held that the mortgagee's lien only extended to the severance from the land, and did not extend to the purchaser. Goodyear v. Williston, supra.

Section 2972 of the California Civil Code keeps the lien alive so long as the same remains on the land of the mortgagor. Waterman v. Green, 60 Cal. 142.

In Graninger's Business Assn. v. Clark, 84 Cal. 201, it was held that section 2922 of the Civil Code, which provides that a mortgage can be created, renewed, or extended only by writing, executed with the formalities required in the case of a grant of real property, did not affect a verbal agreement to divert the grain from the satisfaction of the debt for which it was secured by chattel mortgage, and converting into a pledge to secure subsequent indebtedness and that such verbal agreement does not create a mortgage.

Florida.

In Weed v. Standley, 12 Fla. 166, it was held a written instrument providing that the crop should not be removed until the rent was paid, operated as a mortgage under the provisions of the Laws of 1865-66, p. 61, an act for the relief of landlords, and was a security for the payment of the money, such instrument being duly recorded.

Georgia.

The Georgia Code, § 1954, embraces all property in possession or "to which the mortgagor has the right of possession at the time," and § 1955 of the same Code declares that the mortgage "must specify the deed to secure which it is given and the property upon which it is to take effect."

The crops coming into existence under a law rendering them to be bound at any time for the payment of the debts, but the lien thus created must be enforced in the manner prescribed by section 1991 of the Georgia Code. Stallings v. Harold, 60 Ga. 478.

But a lien for fertilizers on such crop is good. Crine v. Tifts, 65 Ga. 644.

Idaho.

Where lands, leased for a term of years, at a rent of one third of a crop to be raised during the term, were sown and a chattel mortgage executed and recorded upon "the crop of wheat which may be sown and grown for the year 1890 upon said lands" the lessee subsequently sub-letting for a short term, the court held in an action by the sub-lessee against the sheriff under foreclosure of the chattel mortgage, that under the statute of Idaho such chattel mortgage was a valid lien upon the said crop, and any rights acquired thereto from the lessee subsequent to the recording thereof were subject to such mortgage. Pierce v. Langdon, 2 Idaho, 578.

Illinois.

The doctrine in this state is against such crops passing under a mortgage upon future crops not in esse, aliter if growing. Stowell v. Bair, 5 Ill. App. 104; Hansen v. Dennison, 7 Ill. App. 73.

A mortgage of after-acquired property is ineffectual. Hunt v. Bullock, 28 Ill. 320; Roy v. Goings, 6 Ill. App. 162.

Possession must be taken. Gittings v. Nelson, 66 Ill. 561.

Indiana.

Growing crops raised annually by labor are the subject of sale as personal property being as readily delivered as any other article of commerce. 2 Rev. Stat. § 123, p. 54; Matlock v. Fry, 15 Ind. 483.

In Matlock v. Fry, supra, it was held that the statute relating to the recovery of personal property applied to ripe standing corn not severed from the land.

Iowa.

In Wheeler v. Becker, 68 Iowa, 723, a chattel mortgage providing that after-acquired property unacquainted with any different technical significance which it may have in law.

Rivenett v. Bourquin, 58 Mich. 10.

Undoubtedly the parties to this instrument understood the words "legal representatives" to mean and to include assignees and heirs as well as executors and administrators.

Hammond v. Mason & Hamlin Organ Co. 92 U. S. 724, 23 L. ed. 767; Duncan v. Wal- ker, 2 Dall. 205; Com. v. Bryan, 6 Serg. & R. 88.

This contract between Schultz and the plaintiffs was not a sale of peaches at all, and therefore was no sale of things in expectation or sale of things which had no potential existence.

The property sold had a "potential existence."

Louisiana.

should be transferred thereby, was held valid, such property upon its acquisition becoming subject thereto, following Scharfenburg v. Bishop, 35 Iowa, 60; Brown v. Allen, 35 Iowa, 306; Stephens v. Pence, 36 Iowa, 258.

In Norris v. Hix, 74 Iowa, 534, the court held that a valid mortgage of crops not yet grown may be made.

A chattel mortgage of property not in the possession of the mortgagor at the time of making the mortgage is valid and entitles the mortgagee to hold such property against an attaching creditor. Brown v. Allen, 35 Iowa, 306, 310, following Scharfenburg v. Bishop, 35 Iowa, 61. To the same effect, Stephens v. Pence, 36 Iowa, 267.

There must, however, be a clear intention to pass them. McArthur v. Garman, 71 Iowa, 84; Lormer v. Allyn, 64 Iowa, 725.

But in Muir v. Blake, 57 Iowa, 662, the court questioned, whether a chattel mortgage upon future crops could be valid so far as the creditors of the mortgagor were concerned.

Kansas.

In Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612, it was held that property afterwards to be created, purchased, or procured was not the subject of mortgage, and that only property which at the time was in existence, and to which the mortgagor had a title, would pass.

Contracts may be made with reference to future acquired property, which will be legal and upheld, but such contracts will not constitute chattel mortgages, they are simply executory contracts to be performed in futuro, and though binding upon the parties they are void as to third parties without notice, and cannot be treated as chattel mortgages affecting such parties. Cameron v. Marvin, supra.

Such contracts, however, will be held valid as though they were chattel mortgages as against third persons who had not in the meantime obtained any specific interest in the property, when the mortgagee has obtained possession of the property under the contract. Ibid.

A mortgage of goods or other personal property, which the mortgagor does not, at the time of making or recording, own, though he may afterwards acquire them, is void in respect to such goods or property as against a subsequent purchaser or attaching creditors. Long v. Hines, 40 Kan. 220, where the above rule was applied to a case of an unplanted crop of corn.

Kentucky.

In the case of Hutchinson v. Ford, 9 Bush, 318, 15 Am. Rep. 711, the court held it would be carrying the doctrine to too great an extent to permit liens to be created by mortgage upon property not in esse.

A mortgage on all the crop that might be raised on the farm during the term was held to pass no title or claim to the crop or its value, the crop not being sown at the time of the execution of the mortgage, as against the purchaser of the crop. Hutchinson v. Ford, supra.

The crop must be sown when the mortgage was executed. So held in Hutchinson v. Ford, supra. 23 L. R. A.

The Louisiana Act of 1874 authorizes the pledge or pawn of a growing crop, which cannot, until it is gathered, be delivered to the creditor, and requires the agreement to be recorded in the office of the recorder of mortgages in the parish in which the crop is produced, in order to supply the want of actual delivery. The act does not specify however, any time for recording and such a mortgage might be good as against creditors acquiring rights and privileges after recording.

In Benton v. Mahan, 30 La. Ann. 1401, it was held that money and goods advanced and used in paying laborers who make the crop are privileged under the Act of 1874 as much so as provisions consumed by them, and constitute a privileged debt upon the crop.

Under the first section of the Louisiana Act, any planter may pledge or pawn his growing crop for advances in money, goods, and necessary supplies that he may require for the production of the same, by written agreement to pledge, recorded, and such recorded contract confers a right of pledge upon the crop the same as if the crop had been in the pledgee's possession. Gay v. Diagre, 30 La. Ann. 1007.

Article 3274 of the Revised Civil Code of this state declares that no privilege can confer a preference over creditors having acquired a mortgage, unless it be recorded as prescribed by that article, and it would therefore require a positive legislative act to withdraw the contract authorized by the Act of 1874 from the control of such article. Ibid.

In Lalofre v. Wiltz, 31 La. Ann. 428, the pledge of a crop under the Act of 1874 duly recorded was held to give the pledgee a preference to that of a judgment creditor under a f. fa. and such a pledge covers all moneys advanced and necessary supplies furnished for the purposes of a crop.

Such privileged debt or pledge of the party furnishing supplies on a growing crop extended only to the merchantable part of the crop, and not to such portion as would be of necessity reserved for seed for a subsequent crop. Citizens Bank v. Wiltz, 31 La. Ann. 244.

And the privilege could only be enforced against the crop upon which the advances were made. Re Roger's Succession, 41 La. Ann. 400.

Maine.

In Maine all courts have ruled that at law property not existing, but to be acquired at a future time, is not assignable, while in equity it is so assignable. Hamlin v. Jerrard, 72 Me. 77; Morrill v. Noyes, 56 Me. 453, 36 Am. Dec. 433; Griffith v. Douglass, 73 Me. 532, 40 Am. Rep. 386; Edwards v. Peterson, 80 Me. 387.

In Head v. Goodwin, 37 Me. 181, it was held that a grant of goods which did not belong to the grantor at the time of the grant was void, but after the grantee had acquired a title thereto the grant might be made effectual to pass the property by a new act.

In Bryant v. Pennell, 61 Me. 103, 14 Am. Rep. 550, where a mortgage covered nursery stock consisting of plants, shrubs, and trees, the court held that such mortgage covered plants grown from the cuttings of the plants mortgaged.

McCarty v. Blevins, 5 Yerg. 195, 26 Am. Dec. 262; Forsythe v. Casey, 5 N. C. 389, 4 Am. Dec. 559; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 22 Am. Rep. 644; Wyatt v. Watkins, 30 Am. Rep. 63, 40 Am. Massachusetts.

In Clafin v. Carpenter, 4 Met. 580, 38 Am. Dec. 381, a contract for the sale of wood or timber to be cut and severed from the freehold by the vendee, conveys no interest in land within the meaning of the statute of frauds.

And a mortgage thereof is a mortgage of personal chattels to take effect as soon as the property is severed from the freehold. Ibid.

In Barnard v. Eaton, 2 Cush. 294, it was stated that a mortgage being an executed contract, a present transfer of title although conditional and feasible, could only bind and affect property existing and capable of being identified at the time it is made, and that whatever the agreement of the parties might be it could not bind property afterwards acquired by the mortgagor. To the same effect, Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 431; Winslow v. Merchants Ins. Co. 4 Met. 306, 38 Am. Dec. 368.

Michigan.

A mortgage may be made to cover after-acquired property. Curtis v. Wilcox, 49 Mich. 427.

Minnesota.

Mortgages of potential interests are valid in this state. Minnesota Linseed Oil Co. v. Maginnis, 32 Minn. 133; Ludlum v. Rothschild, 41 Minn. 218; Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Mach. Co. v. Minneapolis & N. Elevator Co. 43 Minn. 404; Ambuehl v. Matthews, 41 Minn. 537.

The Minnesota Statutes (ed. 1888, vol. 2, p. 438), section 14a, provide, the mortgaging of crops before the seed thereof shall have been sown or planted, for more than one year in advance, is hereby forbidden, and all securities or mortgages hereafter executed on such crops are declared void and of no effect; provided, this act shall not apply to mortgages given upon crops to secure part or all of the purchase price of lands upon which said crops may be sown or planted. (1887, chap. 176.)

Section 2 of chapter 99 of the Minnesota General Statutes 1878, as amended by section 1, chapter 38, of the Laws of 1888 (ed. of 1888, vol. 2, p. 435), is applicable to a mortgage of future crops, the seed of which had not been sown when the mortgage was executed, so far as they relate to the filing of chattel mortgages. Miller v. McCormick Harvesting Mach. Co. 35 Minn. 399.

When filed as so provided it is full and sufficient notice to all parties interested, of the existence and conditions thereof. Ibid.

Mississippi.

Such a mortgage may be authorized by act of legislature. Betts v. Ratliff, 50 Miss. 551.

Section 7 of the Mississippi Act of 1867, for the encouragement of agricultural produce, provides "that it shall be lawful to convey by way of mortgage or deed of trust, any crop of cotton, corn, or agricultural products being produced or to be produced within fifteen months from the date of such mortgage." McCown v. Mayer, 65 Miss. 537; Everman v. Robb, 52 Miss. 553, 24 Am. Rep. 682.

It was held in Betts v. Ratliff, supra, that under this act the mortgage had preference from its date, whether the crop be then planted or not, the prospective crop, before the seed was sown, being such potential interest or expectancy in property that may be conveyed, and when the crop grows the subject comes in case and the mortgage takes effect.

And in White v. Thomas, 52 Miss. 49, it was held that the above-mentioned statute was designed to render invalid any lien or mortgage which was valid before, and that therefore a mortgage by a tenant to his landlord to secure rent on personal property not in existence at the time was good inter partes.

Section 1359 of the Code of this State of 1880, giving the right to execute a deed of trust on future crops, was repealed by the Act of 1886, page 154.

But the doctrine of potential interests was upheld in Stadeker v. Loeb, 67 Miss. 200. See this case supra, head, V.

Missouri.

In Boyer v. Williams, 5 Mo. 335, 32 Am. Dec. 324, it was held that the purchaser of lands from the United States acquired by the purchase the same title to the land and to everything growing upon the land, which the United States had before the sale, and that the doctrine of emblements did not apply.

Where a debtor made a conveyance of his property as security, with a condition that it should be void if the debts were paid, giving power of sale in case of default, the deed was held a mortgage valid as against an execution creditor. Steele v. Farber, 37 Mo. 71.

Nebraska.

Under section 14, chapter 32, Compiled Statutes of Nebraska, ed. 1891, page 439, such mortgages are void unless recorded as therein provided.

By section 11 of the same there must be a delivery of the goods and chattels, otherwise they are presumed to be fraudulent and void as against creditors.

There must be a seizure of the crop when it comes into existence, in order to constitute a valid lien at law. Cole v. Kerr, 19 Neb. 553.

New Hampshire.

Section 1, chapter 140, Public Statutes of New Hampshire, ed. 1891, provides that crops of every description whether matured or not may be mortgaged. And by section 2, possession must be either taken by the mortgagee or the mortgage must be recorded.

In Norris v. Watson, 23 N. H. 384, 55 Am. Dec. 160, the court stated that it did not think the provisions of the revised statutes authorizing the mortgage of growing crops as personal property and the attachment of personal property subject to mortgage, were intended to make any change in the law relating to the attachment of growing crops.

The statute names "grain unthrashed, hay or potatoes" etc., but makes no mention of growing crops which would fall peculiarly within the reason of the enactment, and would hardly have been omitted if it had been understood that they were liable to attachment. Norris v. Watson, supra.

The fifteenth section of chapter 184, which provides for the attachment of personal property subject to mortgage, is limited in its operation by the terms of the statute to "property not exempt from attachment." Ibid.

A possibility coupled with an interest is assignable. Cudworth v. Scott, 41 N. H. 456.

New York.

The mortgage of subsequently acquired property can only be regarded as a contract to give a further mortgage on such property binding upon the mortgagors personally, and the mortgagee's only remedy, upon such a contract, is as a general creditor. Winslow v. Merchants Ins. Co. 4 Met. 318, 38 Am. Dec. 368; Otis v. Sill, 8 Barb. 102, 118.

Where a party having an interest in a fallow for the raising of wheat executed a chattel mortgage, the court held it bound his interest in the fallow and the wheat subsequently put in, pursuant to the contract. Shuart v. Taylor, 7 How. Pr. 261.

In Ludwig v. Kipp, 20 Hun. 265, it was held that as between the parties, a chattel mortgage of after-acquired property is valid.

As against subsequent purchasers and attaching creditors, a chattel mortgage cannot be given for property not in existence, so as to vest the title when it comes into being in the mortgagee. Rochester Distilling Co. v. Rasey, 65 Hun. 512.

They may be mortgaged by one out of possession of the premises. Harris v. Frink, 49 N. Y. 24, 10 Am. Rep. 818.

It can have no validity where neither the property nor the agent of its production is in possession. Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Long Beach Imp. Co. 27 Hun. 80.

North Carolina.

Annual crops are fructus industriales, personal estate. Walton v. Jordan, 65 N. C. 172.

A mortgage of a crop to be grown, either not planted or immature, is a chattel mortgage. Robinson v. Ezzell, 72 N. C. 231.

The term "growing" imports that it has not come to maturity, that is, green and not made; but the North Carolina Act of 1844, chapter 35, denies crops standing when ripe. Shannon v. Jones, 34 N. C. 206.

In Hawlings v. Hunt, 90 N. C. 270, it is stated to be settled that a contemplated unplanted crop to be made by a mortgagor on his own land, or land let to him, as well as one planted and in process of cultivation, might be the subject of a valid mortgage. Cotten v. Willoughby, 88 N. C. 75, 36 Am. Rep. 564; Harris v. Jones, 83 N. C. 317.

It was also held that an instrument intended by the parties to operate as an agricultural lien, and which purported to be one, must take effect as such or not at all, and would not be permitted to prevail as a mortgage. Rawlings v. Hunt, supra; following Clark v. Farrar, 74 N. C. 686; Patapeco Guano Co. v. Magee, 86 N. C. 350.

Section 1739 of the North Carolina Code provides that any person advancing money or supplies to another engaged or about to engage in the cultivation of the soil, should be entitled to a preferential lien in the crops made during the year upon such land, upon which crops the money has been expended, provided an agreement as prescribed thereby shall be executed.

Under the above section an agreement in writing shall be entered into before any advance is made, specifying the amount advanced, all the limits of such advances to be made from time to time, and the agreement must be recorded as therein provided.

The term "legal representatives" is to be

Public policy is opposed to such limitations, and the Agricultural Lien Law, section 1739 of the Code, limits the advances for the current year's crop. Loftin v. Hines, 10 L. R. A. 490, 107 N. C. 360.

The advance must be in money or supplies to the person engaged or about to engage in the cultivation of the soil, after the agreement is made, to be expended in the crop made that year, and the lien must be on the crop of that year. Clark v. Farrar, supra.

The furnishing of supplies and the making of the securing instrument are contemporaneous, constituting one transaction of which the acts are part, and it is not material which precede in actual time, both being done at the same time in contemplation of law. Reese v. Cole, 38 N. C. 87; Patapeco Guano Co. v. Magee, 86 N. C. 350; Wombly v. Leach, 88 N. C. 84.

In such a mortgage there must be a provision for taking possession of crops in case of default, since the lien may be enforced through the courts, and possession is only required to enable the mortgagee to enforce it himself, and without judicial assistance. Woodlief v. Harris, 96 N. C. 211.

The possession of the mortgagor is not adverse as against an assignee of the mortgage. Murray v. Blackledge, 71 N. C. 492.

An instrument intended as an agricultural statutory lien, which is wanting in essential matter in order to make it valid as such, may yet take effect as a mortgage at common law, provided its form be sufficient for that purpose. Spivey v. Grant, 96 N. C. 214.

Rhode Island.

Possession must be acquired or taken, but in equity it creates a lien upon the crop when acquired. Williams v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 178, 23 Am. Rep. 518, 23 Am. Rep. 658; Cook v. Corthell, 11 R. I. 482, 23 Am. Rep. 518; Williams v. Winsor, 12 R. I. 9.

South Carolina.

Under section 92 of the Code of South Carolina, the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of all such actions in suit, are abolished, and one form of action established. Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112, 37 Am. Rep. 724.

In Warren v. Lawton, 14 S. C. 474, it was held that the advances must be made for the purposes of the crop, otherwise the creditor was not entitled to the remedy prescribed by the Act of March 4, 1873, 16 Stat. at L. 410.

The South Carolina statute only applies to the lien of an owner of a crop, as landlord or tenant cultivating the soil on his own account. Carpenter v. Strickland, 20 S. C. L. To the same effect, Richey v. Dupre, Id. 6.

The agreement or lien must be in writing and signed, in order that the crop may be seized under a warrant. Carpenter v. Strickland, supra.

Tennessee.

Section 3542a, of the Tennessee Code (Act 1870, chap. 121, Thompson & Steger), provides that any debt by note, account, or otherwise, contracted for supplies, implements of industry, or work stock furnished by the owners of lands to lessees, or by lessees to sub-tenants, and used in the cultivation of the crop, shall be and constitute a lien upon the crops growing or made during the year upon the premises, in as full and perfect a manner as now provided in sections 3539-3542 of the Tennessee Code with regard to rents, provided the lien is expressly contracted for on the face of the note, etc., between the owner of the land and lessees, or between the lessees and sub-tenants, and provided that such contract shall not have priority over the landowner's lien for rent.

The lien created by the above section of the code is not intended or authorized in favor of other parties. Whitmore v. Polindexter, 7 Baxt. 242.

Texas.

Where the instrument did not fully comply with the provisions of the statute, but substantially followed it in most of its material requisitions, it was held that it was good as a mortgage at common law subject to a prior lien existing at the time of the execution of the mortgage under an agreement of making advances. McGee v. Fitzer, 37 Tex. 37, the agreement being specially binding on the corn and cotton.

Where cotton was planted before the date of the contract, its growth towards maturity at the time of the contract was held not to be a material question as affecting the right to dispose of it by the mortgage. Cook v. Steel, 42 Tex. 58.

Growing crops are subject to mortgage as personal property. Cook v. Steel, and McGee v. Fitzer, supra; Willis v. Moore, 56 Tex. 623, 45 Am. Rep. 224; Silberberg v. Trillina, 52 Tex. 523.

In Texas the courts hold that a mortgage is part security for a debt, that the title to property mortgaged remains in the mortgagor and with it the right to possession, which is one of the ordinary incidents of title, and therefore the foundation upon which the rights of mortgage is based in England and in some of the states, does not hold in that state. Willis v. Moore, supra.

Vermont.

In Wood v. Dudley, 8 Vt. 435, a distinction is made between a mortgage and a pledge, the former passing the general property to the mortgagee subject to redemption, according to the terms of the contract, and to become absolute if not redeemed within the time stated, giving the mortgagee power to sell or dispose of the chattel immediately, the latter passing no property, the former retaining the same and the pawnee having only a special property or lien, the pledge retaining its character although not redeemed at the time specified.

In Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 455, it is said that it is without doubt true that the sale of a thing not in existence is upon general principles inoperative, being merely executory and conferring no title, but that when the thing thereafter to be produced

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The contract and the finding of facts in this case are found in the margin. This contract and the judgment should be sustained, unless there are some inexorable rules of law which stand in the way. Two rules are invoked to defeat the plaintiffs' action: (1) That the land upon which the peach trees were planted is a homestead; that Schultz's wife did not sign the contract; that it in-

is the product of land or other thing, the owner of the principle thing may retain the general property of the thing produced in the absence of fraud.

Growing grass, although realty, may be mortgaged as a chattel, such mortgage being valid inter partes, and when the mortgage becomes absolute by a non-performance of the conditions before actual severance of the grass, a severance in law takes place changing the grass into personal property, and a recorded mortgage is constructive notice to third parties after such severance, and a valid lien is then constituted as against an attachment. Kimball v. Sattley, 55 Vt. 285, 45 Am. Rep. 614; Fitch v. Burk, 33 Vt. 683.

If an absolute sale operates as a severance in contemplation of law, then a chattel mortgage executed, must after a condition broken have the same effect, the rule in that state being that after condition broken, the interest of the mortgagor becomes absolutely vested at law in the mortgagee who is entitled to an immediate possession, the mortgagor being only tenant at severance with right of redemption in equity. Kimball v. Sattley, supra; Hager v. Brainerd, 44 Vt. 294, to the same effect.

Washington.

Mortgages may be made upon all kinds of personal property and upon growing crops. Gen. Stat. title xix, chap. 1, § 1646, ed. 1891, p. 577.

Wisconsin.

In Comstock v. Scates, 7 Wis. 159, a chattel mortgage upon a crop of grain executed about the time of the planting thereof was held invalid, the property not being in esse and there being nothing for such mortgage to operate upon.

The same principles were applied in First Nat. Bank of Stevens Point v. Knowles, 67 Wis. 373, in the case of a deed of trust of future acquired property given to secure a bond.

Wyoming.

The prior laws of this state would seem to have been repealed by those of 1891, chapter 7, p. 95.

interferes with the homestead right, and the contract is therefore void. (2) That the crop which the plaintiffs agreed to take in payment for the trees was not in esse at the time, and therefore not the subject of sale.

1. We think there is no force in the first proposition. Schultz's land consisted of forty acres. The trees were planted upon only a portion of it. The occupation and possession of the buildings and land were not interfered with. During the growth of the trees, the land could be cultivated, and crops raised. If the trees proved valueless, neither Schultz nor his wife had suffered. If they proved valuable, which was the fact, then the homestead itself was increased in value. Under these circumstances, we see no reason in holding that either Schultz or his wife had parted with any homestead right, or that their possession was in any manner interrupted.

2. Such contracts are reasonable, and beneficial to both the vendor and the vendee. They are especially beneficial to the vendee. He avoids all expense except his labor, runs no risk and, if in indigent circumstances, he may obtain gains which would otherwise be beyond his reach. Such contracts are of common occurrence, and, if the rigid rules of law are against their validity, there is a necessity of legislative action to render them valid. The rule of law is well established that things having no potential existence cannot be the subject of mortgage and sale. There are, however, exceptions to this rule, as where a merchant mortgages his stock of goods, and all future additions thereto. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to this proposition. The difficulty seems to arise in determining what comes within the definition of the term "potential existence." The definition of the word "potential" is: "Having latent power; endowed with energy adequate to a result; efficacious; existing in possibility, not in act." Sir W. Hamilton said: "Potential existence means merely that the thing may be at some time; actual existence, that it now is." In the legal sense, things are said to have a potential existence when they are the natural product or expected increase of something already belonging to the vendor. When one possesses a thing from which a certain product, in the very nature of things, may be expected, such product, we think, has a potential existence. The following rule appears to be well established both by reason and authority, viz.: That, while one owns property from which such product naturally arises, such product may be the subject of sale and mortgage. The authorities which thus hold also recognize the other rule above stated. The authorities are by no means uniform, but we think the conflict in them has arisen from a failure to make a proper distinction. In Grantham v. Hawley, Hob. 132, it was held that a grant of that which the grantor has potentially, though not actually, is good, as a grant by the lessee of all the corn that shall be growing on the land at the end of the term. It was there said: "Though the lessor had it [the corn] not actually in him, nor certain, yet he had it potentially, for the land is the mother and root of all fruits. Therefore, he that hath it may grant all fruits that may arise upon it after, and the property shall pass as soon as the fruits are extant. A person may grant all the tithe wool that he shall have in such a year, yet perhaps he shall have none; but a man cannot grant all the wool that shall grow upon his sheep that he shall buy hereafter, for there he hath it neither actually nor potentially." Powell, in his Treatise on Contracts, says: "Although it be uncertain whether the thing granted will ever exist, and it consequently cannot be actually in the grantor, or certain, yet it is in him potentially, as being a thing accessory to something which he actually has in him, for such potential property may be the subject of a contract executed, as a grant, or the like. . . . So a tenant for life may sell the profits of his lands for three or four years to come, and yet the profits are not then in esse." It is held that a lease of land, reserving rent, and which provides that all the crops raised on the land during the term are to be the property of the lessor until the rent is paid, is valid, and will entitle the lessor to hold such crops against the creditors of the lessee. Smith v. Atkins, 18 Vt. 461. Justice Redfield, in delivering the opinion, said: "It is, without doubt, true that the sale of a thing not in existence is upon general principles, inoperative, being merely executory; that is, it confers no title in the thing bargained. But when the thing thereafter to be produced is the produce of land, or other thing, the owner of the principal thing may retain the general property of the thing produced, unless there be fraud in the contract, and it be entered into merely to defeat creditors." In Jones v. Webster, 48 Ala. 112, it is said: "If the mortgagors had undertaken to convey the future crops they might make, without possessing any land upon which to make them, and especially without the contemplation of the immediate acquisition of some, then, certainly, their conveyance would be without operation. In this case they had the land, and the crops conveyed were to be grown upon it during their possessory interest. The crops were an accretion or addition to the land which might very reasonably be expected to be made. They were therefore proper subjects of mortgage." In McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 464, 22 Am. Rep. 644, it is said: "It is well settled that a grant of the future produce of land actually in possession of the grantor at the time of the grant passes an interest in such future crop as soon as it comes into existence." It was held in Andrew v. Newcomb, 32 N. Y. 417, —Chief Justice Denio rendering the opinion, —that crops to be raised by the owner of the land are an exception to the general rule that the "title to property not in existence cannot be affected so as to vest the title when it comes into existence," and that "the owner of land may lawfully contract for its cultivation, and may provide in whom the ownership of the product shall vest." In Watkins v. Wyatt, 9 Baxt. 250, 40 Am. Rep. 90, Wyatt agreed to furnish one McCain with supplies on condition that McCain, who was a farmer, should execute to him a mortgage of his cotton crop for the then current year as security for the supplies so furnished "to enable him (McCain) to make said crop." The crop was not then sown. This case cites many of the above authorities, and others. It recognizes that there is a seeming conflict in the adjudged cases upon the subject, but sustains the validity of the mortgage. It is there said: "The right in the proprietor of the soil to plant, cultivate, and gather his crops, to the exclusion of all others, is an absolute legal right, and an incorporeal property, and incorporeal property is as well the subject of valid sale and mortgage as any other kind of property. The mortgagor, in this case, was the proprietor of the land on which he proposed to raise the crop in controversy. The crop had a potential existence, because it was to be the natural product and expected increase of the land then owned and occupied by him." The like contract was sustained in Butt v. Ellett, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 544, 22 L. ed. 183. This doctrine is also sustained by the following authorities: Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718; Conderman v. Smith, 41 Barb. 404; Van Hoozer v. Cory, 84 Barb. 10; Senter v. Mitchell, 16 Fed. Rep. 206. In Robbins v. McKnight, 5 N. J. Eq. 642, 45 Am. Dec. 406, the contract was in all essential features identical with the one here involved, and it was sustained by the court.

In the present case the trees were in existence at the time of the contract, were transferred to and became the property of Schultz, the vendee, subject to a share of the crops for the years specified; the contract was executed by the plaintiffs, and operated to the great benefit of Schultz and his grantee, the defendant. This contract is one that the law ought to delight in sustaining. If it cannot be sustained, then no executed contract can be, where a party furnishes seed, and puts in the crop upon shares. The same reason that would defeat the right to recovery for the crop of peaches in this case would defeat the right to recovery for a crop of corn, wheat, or other grain, or strawberries and other fruits of like character. The defendant purchased with notice, and the purchase price was reduced on account of the plaintiffs' rights in the crop. We think that under the authorities above cited, as well as in reason and justice, plaintiffs and Schultz became tenants in common of the peaches for the years which they should select, and that defendant, having purchased with notice, stood in the same relation to plaintiffs that did his grantor. Defendant's counsel cite Bates v. Smith, 83 Mich. 347, and insist that it controls this case in their favor. The language of that case is broad, and, if strictly followed, would seem to include the present one; but we think the authorities above cited make a clear distinction between the natural products of the soil, wool from sheep, milk from cows, and the like, from the case that was then under consideration, and we are disposed to follow them. The language of that case must be construed in connection with its facts.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

K. T. MEADE

v.

William CLARK et al., Appts.

(159 Pa. 159.)

The insufficiency of a deed of her real estate by a married woman to convey title because not duly acknowledged by her, cannot be asserted by a creditor who obtains judgment against her and sells the property thereunder four months after the delivery of the deed and of possession of the property, where she subsequently joins her husband in a proper acknowledgment of the deed.

(December 30, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas Number 2, for Allegheny County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

On June 10, 1891, Harriet E. Oates, a married woman, executed and delivered a deed of certain land to Albert Davies. Her husband joined in the deed. The purchase money was paid to her. The deed was not acknowledged at the time, but on January 4, 1892, it was acknowledged by both husband and wife and subsequently recorded. In the meantime a judgment had been obtained against Mrs. Oates and her husband and the land in question sold at sheriff's sale to plaintiff. Davies rented to defendants, who were in possession. At the trial defendants asked leave to set up by way of amendment that the judgment under which the sale was had was fraudulent and void, because the purchaser of the land had been acting as Mrs. Oates' attorney and permitted the judgment to be fraudulently taken against her, and a defense on the merits was willfully neglected. The amendment was refused.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. James S. Young and S. U. Trent for appellants.

Messrs. K. T. Mead and James C. Doty for appellee.

NOTE.—The principle which denies the right of other persons to assert a disability like that of coverture is usually presented in respect to defenses, but is here applied to a direct attack by a plaintiff in ejectment. In this respect it is unusual but not 23 L. R. A.

reason is apparent for restricting the application of the rules to defenses. On the other hand, if proper as to defenses, it would seem to apply a fortiori to affirmative claims.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Rules of court are devised and enforced by the courts to facilitate the administration of justice. This is accomplished by requiring the parties litigant to disclose to each other the nature of their demand or defense, and narrowing the range of inquiry to questions that are subjects of actual controversy. Their enforcement should not be insisted on, when such a course will defeat the purposes they are intended to serve. For this reason it is usual to allow an omission made in the preparation of an abstract or a notice of special matter to be supplied by amendment, upon such terms, as to continuance or costs, as shall be fair to the other party. As this case appears to us, on the printed pages of the paper books, it would seem that the motion for leave to amend the defendants' abstract should have been allowed. The omitted line of defense was held by the learned judge to be relevant and material. Without it, justice could not be reached; and, for want of it, a verdict was directed in favor of the plaintiff.

But we prefer to rest our judgment in this case on a more important question. It was raised on the following facts: Mrs. Oates was the owner of the property in controversy prior to June, 1891. On the 10th day of June, 1891, she sold it to Alfred Davies, and delivered possession to him. The price was a fair one. The sale was made in good faith. A deed was prepared and executed by both husband and wife on the same day the sale was made, and it was delivered to Davies, at his request, to show to his mother. It was acknowledged in due form some six months later, and put upon record. Meantime, in October, 1891, a judgment was obtained in the common pleas of Allegheny county against Mr. Oates and his wife, upon which a sheriff's sale took place in July, 1892. The plaintiff K. T. Meade, was the purchaser, and, upon his title acquired under the sheriff's deed, he brings this action of ejectment against Davies and his tenants or vendees. On the trial the defendants asked the court to charge the jury that if the sale by Mrs. Oates to Davies was made in good faith, and for an adequate price, on the 10th day of June, the judgment entered in October was not a lien upon the land, and that the sale by the sheriff conferred no title. The learned judge refused this prayer for instructions. If Mrs. Oates had been seeking to avoid her unacknowledged deed, the rule laid down in Kirk v. Clark, 59 Pa. 479, on which the learned judge relied, would have been applicable. It was applied in Glidden v. Strupler, 52 Pa. 400, where the married woman repudiated her own agreement; in Kirk v. Clark, where her heirs-at-law asserted her title against her vendee. But I have been able to find no case in which her creditors have been allowed to assert it for her, and against her will. Let it be conceded that the judgment against her was a lien upon real estate owned by her at the date of its rendition. Let it be conceded further that her unacknowledged deed did not bind her, and that she might have recovered the land conveyed by it from her vendee without returning to him the purchase money she had received. The question still remains, Can a creditor compel her to be unjust to her vendee, against her own will? As matter of fact, she had sold her property in June, received the purchase money, and delivered possession to the purchaser. As matter of law, she was not bound by her bargain until her deed was duly acknowledged. She had the right to repudiate the sale, or to perfect it by joining her husband in a proper acknowledgment of her deed. Which she would do, she had the power to determine. She decided to be honest, and accordingly acknowledged the deed. She is bound by her decision. Her deed vests her title irrevocably in her vendee, and all claiming under her are bound, as she is, by it. A creditor, who obtains a judgment four months after she parted with her property and delivered possession to the purchaser, claims the right to set up her disability to defeat a conveyance made in good faith, and perfected in a manner which the law declares to be binding upon her. This cannot be done. Disability, whether arising from infancy or coverture or lunacy, is declared for the protection of the person on whom the disability rests. An infant can ratify after reaching a proper age. A lunatic can ratify after the return of sanity. A married woman may ratify after the coverture terminates, but, as her disability results from the unity of husband and wife, she may bind herself at any time during coverture by complying with the requisite legal formalities. In Grim's App., 105 Pa. 375, it was held that a married woman was bound to the same measure of good faith as other persons in like cases, except where her disability rendered her act void. In such a case she is not bound by the rules relating to estoppel, but is at liberty to use her disability as a shield against the remedies applicable to other persons. Whether she will keep faith in that class of cases, she alone must determine, or those on whom the law casts her right at her death.

The nearest case to this, in the question raised, is Freiler v. Kear, 126 Pa. 470, 3 L. R. A. 889. The wife in that case owned a brewery. She leased it to a firm, of which her husband was a member. They were in arrears for rent. She brought suit in the name of her husband and herself for her use against F. G. Kear and Freiler, her husband, trading as F. G. Kear & Co. The court below held that the action could not be maintained, and that Kear could avail himself of the objection that the plaintiff was the wife of his partner and codefendant. This court reversed the judgment, holding that the husband alone could raise the question, and "that the objection of coverture could not be insisted on by a stranger to invalidate such proceedings and judgment, when waived by the husband." He might have been heard to deny his wife's right of action against him, but he did not choose to deny it. His partner could not compel him to do so. Mrs. Oates might have repudiated her deed at any time before its acknowledgment, but she did not choose to do so. No one else could do it for her, or compel her to do it. She had sold her property, and had its price. She had delivered possession and her deed to the purchaser, but the statutory proof of its execution was not made when the judgment was obtained against her. This proof she soon after supplied, and the deed was then binding, according to its terms. The title of the purchaser related to its date, and, as against a creditor who had no lien at that time, it went without incumbrance. Under this view of the case, it is unnecessary to consider the effect of the Act of 1887 on the form of the acknowledgment by a married woman.

The fourth assignment of error is sustained, and the judgment is reversed. As this is conclusive of the case, a venire will not be awarded.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE of the State of New York, as rel.
John COPCUTT, Appl.,

v.

Board of Health of the City of YONKERS, Resp't.

(140 N. Y. L.)

1. A hearing of a property owner before the condemnation of his land as a nuisance by a board of health is not necessary to constitute due process of law, where the question of nuisance remains open to trial in the courts, notwithstanding the decision of the board of health.

2. Whoever abates an alleged nuisance and thus destroys and injures private property, or interferes with private rights, whether he be a public officer or private person, unless he acts under the judgment or order of a court having jurisdiction, does it at his peril, and when his act is challenged in the regular judicial tribunals, to protect him it must appear that the thing abated was in fact a nuisance.

3. Boards of health in summary proceedings, without hearing the owner of the property, cannot make that a nuisance which is not in fact a nuisance, and have no jurisdiction to make any order or ordinance to abate an alleged nuisance, unless it is in fact a nuisance.

4. The decision of a board of health condemning an alleged nuisance is not reviewable by certiorari, where the board is not obliged to hear any party, but may act upon its own inspection and knowledge.

5. On a division of the city of Yonkers into five wards, with a supervisor from each, by the amendment of 1892 to the city charter, the office of "the supervisor," who was a member of the board of health, disappeared, and the ward supervisors did not become members of the board of health.

(November 23, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming, upon certiorari to review the same, the proceedings of defendant in enacting a certain ordinance declaring mill ponds owned by relator to be a public nuisance, and directing their destruction.
Affirmed.

Statement by Earl, J.:

The Nepperhan river is a small stream of water flowing through the city of Yonkers, and across the stream there were several dams, to furnish power to drive machinery. Much complaint having been made to the board of health that these dams created nuisances, the members of the board resolved to hold a meeting on the 27th day of March last to consider the condition of the dams, and they ordered notice to be given to the owners of the dams to show cause at that time why the dams should not be removed. In pursuance of this resolution, notice was served upon the relator, who owned or was interested in two of the dams and the ponds and water powers thereby created, called the "5th" and "6th" water powers, and he appeared before the board at the time and place in person and by counsel, and he gave evidence tending to show that the two dams were not nuisances, and did not create nuisances; and there was also evidence in conflict with the case made by him. After hearing the evidence, the board made its determination that the dams were nuisances, and ordered them removed. The relator then instituted this proceeding by certiorari to review this determination. The board made return to the writ, setting forth all its proceedings and the evidence taken by it, and stated in its return that its determination and action were based "not only upon testimony given by the witnesses, but that the determination of the said board of health, and the members thereof, has been based mainly upon the individual knowledge and experience of the members of said board of health concerning the ponds in the Nepperhan stream, and the condition thereof, inasmuch as each member of the board of health, in performance of the duties imposed by law, has personally inspected and has examined and inquired into the condition of said ponds and of said stream, and that the conclusions reached by this board have been reached and depend largely upon personal knowledge and experience of the individual members of this board, and for this reason it is apparent that this board cannot certify to and reproduce before this court all of the proofs, nor all of the grounds of the determination of said board, nor any considerable part thereof." Upon the return and the papers filed therewith the general term affirmed the action of the board, and then the relator appealed to this court.

NOTE.—The right to compensation for property destroyed in abating a public nuisance is fully reviewed in the note to Oriando v. Pragg (Fla.) 19 L. R. A. 193.

The present case clearly presents the question of the validity of summary proceedings for abatement 23 L. R. A.

of nuisances which as shown in the Florida case as well as in the present case must be taken at the peril of those who act.

As to the powers of a board of health in such cases and the lawfulness of a pond in a city, see the case next following, post, 485.

Messrs. R. E. Prime and Calvin Frost, for appellant:

None of the matters other than what took place at the hearing of which the relator was notified, and at which he was present, should have been returned, and should be disregarded.

Babeock v. Buffalo, 56 N. Y. 268; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 626.

The relator has no redress. He cannot appeal and if he brings an action for damages, as was done in the case of Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. 164, the present adjudication will be pleaded as it was in that case, and the court will say, as in that case, "You might have raised those questions on certiorari, but not as a defense to this action."

The remedy, when matters have been returned which should not have been, is to disregard it.

Bacon, Abr. title, Certiorari, H; People v. Covert, 1 Hill, 874; People v. New York, 2 Hill, 9, 11; People v. Webb, 50 N. Y. S. R. 46; Stone v. New York, 25 Wend. 168.

The right to certiorari is given by Code Civ. Proc., § 2120, and it was undoubtedly issuable at common law, which brings it within the second subdivision of this section.

Lawton v. Cambridge Highway Comrs. 2 Cal. 179; Bradhurst v. First Great Southwestern Turnp. R. Co. 16 Johns. 8.

The duties of a board of health are quasi judicial, and certiorari was the proper remedy.

People v. Seneca Falls Board of Health, 58 Hun, 595.

An indictment could not be sustained against a person for refusing to obey an ordinance of a board of health, without notice to him before making the order.

People v. Wood, 62 Hun, 181; People v. Rochester, 44 Hun, 166; Rochester v. Simpson, 57 Hun, 86; Schuster v. Metropolitan Board of Health, 49 Barb. 450.

All of these cases proceeded upon the ground that the proceedings of boards of health were reviewable by courts, which they could not have done if the acts had been legislative.

See also Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. 262.

Mr. James M. Hunt, for respondent:

There can be no question about the offensiveness of a pond of stagnant water around and underneath residences. That stagnant water so situated is unhealthy and a direct promotant of disease the court will also take judicial notice of.

Adams v. Popham, 76 N. Y. 410.

The only possible way under any existing law by which these nuisances can be abated, and the health of the men, women, and children of Yonkers preserved from this terrible danger, is by the exercise by the board of health of the powers intrusted to them by statute.

In view of the statements contained in the return of the writ now before the court the writ should have been quashed. The statements contained in the return to the writ are conclusive, and must be taken as true.

People v. New York Fire Comrs. 73 N. Y. 487.

Unless all of the facts which were before the board of health, and which had a controlling influence upon the members of the board of 28 L. R. A.

health, can be reproduced before the court, the court cannot properly review the action taken by the board of health.

People v. McCarthy, 102 N. Y. 630.

The record shows that these ponds were just such nuisances as the statutes authorized the board of health to abate, and the only way to abate a nuisance caused by stagnant water lying immediately under and around residences is to remove the dams which create the stagnation.

Adams v. Popham, supra.

The fact that the relator claims that the water power is of great value should not have weight enough with the court to permit these nuisances to continue and public health to be jeopardized.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The disposition of this case turns largely upon the effect and the construction of the statutes constituting the board of health, and defining its powers and duties, and we will therefore first give attention to the statutes. By chapter 184 of the Laws of 1881 (an act to revise the charter of the city of Yonkers), it is provided in title 9 that the mayor, the supervisor, the president of the common council, the president of the board of water commissioners, the president of the board of police, and the health officer shall constitute the board of health of the city; and the board is given power, among other things, "to suppress, abate, and remove any public nuisance detrimental to the public health," and, in addition to other remedies which it may possess by law, it is empowered to issue its warrant, whenever necessary, to the sheriff of the county of Westchester, or to any policeman of the city, authorizing and commanding him to forthwith suppress, abate, and remove such public nuisance, at the expense of the lot whereon the nuisance exists, and of the owner thereof, to be enforced and collected as in the act provided. It is further provided that, in addition to the powers expressly granted in the act, the board shall "have and exercise all the powers now or at any time hereafter conferred upon boards of health in cities by any general law;" and it is authorized to make ordinances, rules, and regulations to carry into effect its powers, and to enforce observance of them by penalties, and by action instituted in its name to recover penalties and to restrain and abate the nuisance. By chapter 270 of the Laws of 1885 (the general act for the preservation of the public health) it is provided that the board of health in any city of the state, except the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Buffalo, shall have the power, and it shall be its duty, "to receive and examine into the nature of complaints made by any of the inhabitants concerning nuisances or causes of danger or injury to life and health within the limits of its jurisdiction; to enter upon or within any place or premises where nuisances or conditions dangerous to life and health are known or believed to exist, and by appointed members or persons to inspect and examine the same, and all owners, agents and occupants shall permit such sanitary examinations, and said board of health shall furnish said owners, agents and occupants a written statement of results or conclusions of such examinations; and every such board of health shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to order the suppression and removal of nuisances and conditions detrimental to life and health found to exist within the limits of its jurisdiction," and "to make, without the publication thereof, such orders and regulations in special and individual cases, not of general application, as it may see fit, concerning the suppression and removal of nuisances." It is further authorized to abate nuisances, and to impose penalties for the violation of its orders and regulations, and the violation of them is also made a misdemeanor, and it may commence actions to restrain and abate nuisances, and to enforce its orders and regulations.

A careful examination of the two acts shows that there is no provision for a hearing before the board on the part of any person who is charged with maintaining a nuisance upon his premises. The right to such a hearing is not expressly given, and cannot be implied from any language found in either act, or from the nature of the subjects dealt with in the acts. Boards of health and other like boards act summarily, and it has not been usual anywhere to require them to give a hearing to any person before they can exercise their jurisdiction for the public welfare. The public health might suffer or be imperiled if their action could be delayed until a protracted hearing could be brought to a termination. There is no provision in the acts for calling or swearing witnesses, and there is no general law giving them power to do so. Section 843 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not applicable to such a case, for the reason that the board is not authorized by law to hear testimony or take the oral examination of witnesses.

The question may be asked, How can these provisions conferring powers upon boards of health to interfere with and destroy property, and to impose penalties and create crimes, stand with the constitution, securing to every person due process of law before his property or personal rights or liberty can be interfered with? The answer must be that they could not stand if we were obliged to hold that the acts referred to made the determinations of the board of health as to the existence of nuisances final and conclusive upon the owners of the premises where they are alleged to exist. Before such a final and conclusive determination could be made, resulting in the destruction of property, the imposition of penalties and criminal punishments, the party proceeded against must have a hearing, not as matter of favor, but as matter of right; and the right to a hearing must be found in the acts. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289. As we have said, there is no provision of law giving any party a right to a judicial hearing before these boards, and there is no provision making their determination final. If the decisions of these boards were final and conclusive, even after a hearing, the citizen would in many cases hold his property subject to the judgments of men holding ephemeral positions in municipal bodies and boards of health, frequently uneducated, and generally unfitted to discharge grave judicial functions. Boards of health, under the acts referred to, cannot, as to any existing state of facts, by their determination make that a nuisance which is not in fact a nuisance. They have no jurisdiction to make any order or ordinance abating an alleged nuisance unless there be in fact a nuisance. It is the actual existence of a nuisance which gives them jurisdiction to act. Their acts declaring nuisances may be presumptively valid until questioned or assailed, for the same reasons which give presumptive legality to the acts of official persons under the maxim, "omnia presumuntur legitime facta donec probetur in contrarium." What operation, then, does the order or ordinance of the board of health have under these acts? The nuisance actually existing, and the jurisdiction having been regularly exercised, the order or ordinance has all the operation and effect provided in the act, and the persons who abate the nuisance have the protection which they would not have as private persons abating, not a private nuisance, especially injurious to them, but a public nuisance injurious to the general public. It may be said that if the determination of a board of health as to a nuisance be not final and conclusive, then the members of the board, and all persons acting under their authority in abating the alleged nuisance, act at their peril; and so they do, and no other view of the law would give adequate protection to private rights. They should not destroy property as a nuisance unless they know it to be such, and, if there be doubt whether it be a nuisance or not, the board should proceed by action to restrain or abate the nuisance, and thus have the protection of a judgment for what it may do.

It may further be asked, what, under this view of the law, is the remedy of the owner of property threatened with destruction or actually destroyed as a nuisance? He may have his action in equity to restrain the destruction of his property if the case be one where a court of equity under equitable rules has jurisdiction, or he may bring a common-law action against all the persons engaged in the abatement of the nuisance to recover his damages, and thus he will have due process of law; and, if he can show that the alleged nuisance does not in fact exist, he will recover judgment, notwithstanding the ordinance of the board of health. Thus the views we take of these acts and similar acts conferring powers upon local officers to proceed summarily upon their own view and examination furnish adequate protection to boards of health, to the public, and to property owners, and, while these views are not supported by all the decided cases upon the subject, they have the support of the best reasons and of ample authority. In Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 5th ed., at page 722, in a note, the learned author, speaking of boards of health, says: "Though they cannot be vested with authority to decide finally upon one's right to property, where they proceed to interfere with it as constituting a danger to health, yet they are vested with quasi judicial power to decide upon what constitutes a nuisance, and all presumptions favor their actions." And again, at page 742, in a note, citing authorities, he says: "Whether any particular thing or act is or is not permitted by the law of the state must always be a judicial question, and therefore the question what is and what is not a public nuisance must be judicial, and it is not competent to delegate it to local legislative or administrative boards. The local declaration that a nuisance exists is, therefore, not conclusive, and the party concerned may contest the fact in the courts." Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, 4th ed. § 874, says the authority to prevent and abate nuisances and its summary exercise "may be constitutionally conferred on the incorporated place, and it authorizes its council to act against that which comes within the legal nature of a nuisance; but such power conferred in general terms cannot be taken to authorize the extrajudicial condemnation and destruction of that as a nuisance which in its nature, situation, or use is not such." In Wood's Law of Nuisances (sec. 740), it is said that, where the public authorities abate a nuisance under authority of a city ordinance, "they are subject to the same perils and liabilities as an individual if the thing abated is not in fact a nuisance.

. . . It would, indeed, be a dangerous power to repose in municipal corporations to permit them to declare by ordinance or otherwise anything a nuisance which the caprice or interests of those having control of its government might see fit to outlaw, without being responsible for all the consequences; and, even if such power is expressly given by the legislature, it is utterly inoperative and void, unless the thing is in fact a nuisance, or was created or erected after the passage of the ordinance, and in defiance of it."

In Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984, Mr. Justice Miller said: "It is a doctrine not to be tolerated in this country that a municipal corporation without any general laws, either of the city or the state, within which a given structure can be shown to be a nuisance, can, by its mere declaration that it is one, subject it to removal by any person supposed to be aggrieved, or even by the city itself. This would place every house, every business, and all the property of the city at the uncontrolled will of the temporary local authorities." In Hutton v. Camden, 39 N. J. L. 122, 23 Am. Rep. 203, it was held that the action of the board of health could not determine conclusively that a nuisance exists, and that such a conclusive determination could be made only in a regular course of law before an established court of law or equity. In Underwood v. Green, 42 N. Y. 140, the action was to recover the value of dead hogs removed under the direction of the city sanitary inspector, an officer clothed with judicial discretion, and acting under a city ordinance declaring that all dead animals "be forthwith removed and disposed of by removal beyond the limits of the city or otherwise, so as most effectually to secure the public health;" and it was held that it must be shown, in order to justify the act, that the dead hogs were or would become in some way dangerous or deleterious to public health. The following are also instructive authorities upon the same subject: Hoffman v. Schultz, 81 How. Pr. 385; Clark v. Syracuse, 18 Barb. 82; Rogers v. Barker, 81 Barb. 447; Coe v. Schultz, 47 Barb. 64; Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L. R. A. 134. The result of these authorities is that whoever abates an alleged nuisance, and thus destroys or injures private property, or interferes with private rights, whether he be a public officer or private person, unless he acts under the judgment or order of a court having jurisdiction, does it at his peril; and when his act is challenged in the regular judicial tribunals it must appear that the thing abated was in fact a nuisance. This rule has the sanction of public policy, and is founded upon fundamental constitutional principles.

The way is now clear to the disposition of this case. The board of health did act, and had a right to act, upon its own inspection and knowledge of the alleged nuisance. It was not obliged to hear any party. It could obtain its information from any source and in any way, and hence its determination upon the question of nuisance is not reviewable by certiorari. People v. McCarthy, 103 N. Y. 630. It is claimed, however, on the part of the relator that the board of health was not properly organized when it made its determination, and that, therefore, the determination was void. Under the Act of 1881, above cited, there was but one supervisor for the city of Yonkers, and "the supervisor" was made a member of the board of health. By an amendment of the charter in 1892 (chapter 54 of the Laws of that year) the city was divided into five wards, and one supervisor was required to be elected in each of the wards. The claim of the relator is that all these supervisors became members of the board of health, and that, therefore, after the Act of 1892, the board of health was composed of ten members instead of six; and that, as only four members, to wit, the mayor, the president of the board of police, the health officer, and the president of the common council, took part in the proceedings under review, the board was not properly constituted; that, in fact, therefore, the board as such did not act; that there was no determination, and that the action taken was a nullity. If this claim be well founded, then there was no judicial determination for review by certiorari. People v. Parker, 117 N. Y. 86. But, assuming that the question as to the constitution of the board of health is before us, we think it was properly constituted. By the Act of 1892 the office of "the supervisor" disappeared, and therefore there was no longer any such officer as "the supervisor." The five supervisors elected in the wards were not made members of the board, and the board was thereafter composed of but five members, and the four who made the determination in the absence of the fifth were competent to act as the board.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the judgment of the General Term should be affirmed, with costs.

Board of Health of the City of YONKERS,
Rept.,

(140 N. Y. 12.)

1. A finding that the sanitary code of a board of health was subscribed by the secretary will not be disturbed on appeal, where there is no proof that the original, which has been destroyed, was not signed, and a copy of the code as published purports to be signed by the secretary, and is attested by his signature, as published.
2. Yonkers, although excepted by New York Laws 1886, chap. 270, § 1, from the provisions of the Act, so far as it relates to the composition of boards of health and appointment of members thereof, is not excepted from section 3, conferring general powers upon such boards.
3. A pond in a city is a public nuisance, where foul and malarious exhalations arise from the stagnant water and from the sides and bed as the water is drawn off, and are intensified by the accumulation of filth which no police vigilance can keep out of the stream and which the dam retains and holds.
4. The erection and creation of a nuisance, dangerous to health, may be restrained by injunction by a board of health, under the general health act of New York, as well as under the city charter of Yonkers.
5. The fact that a dam was made when the water of a stream was clean and pure will not prevent its abatement as a nuisance, when, by the growth of a city and the consequent pollution of the water, it has become an inevitable menace to the public health.

(November 23, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, modifying a judgment of a Special Term for Westchester County in favor of plaintiffs in a proceeding brought to enjoin the maintenance of a dam and to recover penalties for violation of a health ordinance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. E. Prime and Calvin Frost, for appellant:

Even if the complaint and ordinance had been sufficient for the purpose and the board was clothed with ample powers in the premises, it is insisted that the part of the judgment which restrains the defendant from rebuilding his dam, which had been torn down, and ordering him to clear out all other obstructions from the stream, cannot be sustained.

The exercise of the board is reviewable by the court as to its reasonableness.

NOTE.—As to rights of owner in respect to summary destruction of an alleged nuisance, see the preceding case, ante, p. 481, and notes to Orlando v. Pragg (Fla.) 19 L. R. A. 136.

N. Y. 110, 50 Am. Rep. 636; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389; Rochester v. Simpson, 57 Hun, 36; Babcock v. Buffalo, 56 N. Y. 268; Lawton v. Steele, 7 L. R. A. 184, 119 N. Y. 239.

To restrain the defendant from rebuilding his dam is a practical confiscation of his property, without compensation, in other words, would be a justification of the board in tearing down defendant's dam.

Resort can only be had to the extreme measures of destroying property without compensation when human life and health are in imminent peril—when an imperious necessity, which knows no law, is above the constitution, and cannot wait, demands the sacrifice when “the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the sickness that destroyeth in the noon-day” is present.

Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 108, 50 Am. Rep. 636.

The plain duty of the board was to clean the ponds by taking out the deposits and not by destroying the defendant's property and depriving him of a water power, which supplied eighteen or twenty manufactories, which he rented to his tenants.

Com. v. Patch, 97 Mass. 21; Rochester v. Simpson and Babcock v. Buffalo, supra.

Mr. James M. Hunt, for respondent:

Physicians testified that it would be impossible to maintain ponds, in which water must necessarily be more or less stagnant, in the heart of a city of thirty-five thousand inhabitants, such as Yonkers is, in such a manner that the same would not be detrimental to the health of the people who live in the vicinity of any such pond.

It seems that the court must take judicial notice of the fact that a large body of stagnant water in the heart of a city, lying in part under buildings in which people live, as shown to be the case in regard to the pond owned by the defendant at the first water-power, must be detrimental to public health.

Adams v. Popham, 76 N. Y. 410.

Plaintiff had full power to ordain the section of the sanitary code now under consideration and also to enforce the same in such an action as the present, even without previous notice to the defendant.

Gould v. Rochester, 105 N. Y. 46; Metro-politan Board of Health v. Heister, 37 N. Y. 661.

Finch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first cause of action against the defendant, stated in the complaint of the board of health, was for violation of the sanitary code of the city of Yonkers, adopted in 1881, and the recovery of a penalty imposed for such violation. The defendant, seeking a reversal of the judgment rendered against him for such penalty, contends that the sanitary code was not proved, because not shown to have been subscribed by the secretary of the board of health. The original draft of the code, which was before the board for adoption, and upon which that body acted, was not produced, and could not be produced, because it was destroyed by the printers in the process of publication; but the plaintiff did produce the proofs of such publication filed in the office of the board, and those proofs contain a complete copy of the code as adopted and published. That copy purports to be signed by the secretary of the board, and was attested by such signature as published. There was no proof that the original was not signed, but it was shown that the sanitary code, as published, was correctly printed in a volume produced, at the end of which appeared the words: "Adopted by the board of health, September 5th, 1881. W. H. Doty, Secretary." On this state of facts, the court found that "the plaintiff, on the 5th day of September, 1881, established its sanitary code; the same being duly subscribed by the secretary of said board, adopted, approved, and published." That finding, having sufficient evidence in the record to support it, is a finding of fact, which we may not, on this appeal, convert into a question of law.

The appellant further suggests the inquiry whether the board of health can maintain an action for the penalty upon a general enactment against all public nuisances, such as is section 82 of the Sanitary Code. That section provides that "whatever is dangerous to human life or to health . . . and whatever renders the air or food and water or drink unwholesome shall be deemed to be nuisances and to be illegal, and every person having aided in creating or contributing to the same, or who may support, continue, or retain any of them shall be deemed guilty of a violation of this section." The manner of enforcing the provision is dictated by section 97, which imposes a penalty for its violation, which may be recovered, with costs, "in an action brought by said board of health in its name in any court of competent jurisdiction." The charter of the city (chapter 184, Laws 1881, title 9, § 2) authorized the board to enact a sanitary code, and imposed penalties for its violation, and to maintain actions for the recovery of such penalties. In addition, the charter gave to the board of health of the city "all the powers now or hereafter conferred upon boards of health in cities by any general law." Such a general law was enacted afterwards (Laws 1885, chap. 270), which authorized the imposition of penalties for the violation of or noncompliance with, not only the orders of such a board, but also its regulations, and to maintain actions to collect such penalties. The learned counsel for the appellant maintains that the city of Yonkers was excepted from the operation of the general law. That is true, so far as it relates to the composition of the board, and appointment of its members (section 1), but is not true as to the general powers conferred upon the boards of health, when organized (section 3). At that point the excepted cities are named, but Yonkers is not one of them. There was ample authority, therefore, for the maintenance of the action.

There is nothing in the defendant's plea of the statute of limitations. He maintained the nuisance, and neglected and refused to abate it, down to the time of the destruction of his dam, and this action was commenced a few days later. It is said, however, that the complaint does not allege, and the proof does not show, that the dam and pond, in and of themselves, had become a nuisance, and so their maintenance down to the time of the commencement of the action does not answer the plea of the statute. The complaint alleges that the defendant maintained the dam and pond in such a condition as to be dangerous to human health, and to render the air and water unwholesome, and continues to support and retain the same in that condition. The trial judge found that the waters of the pond are stagnant, and filled with decomposed and decomposing animal and vegetable matters; that when the waters are drawn down, and the sides and bed of the pond are left exposed and bare, there arise noxious and poisonous exhalations, which taint the air, and are dangerous to life and health; and that "the said pond, with its contents so retained by the said dam, is and constitutes a public nuisance detrimental to the public health." There is evidence to support this finding, even irrespective of the filth contributed by others than the defendant; proof that the stagnant water, and, when drawn off, the exposure of the sides and bed of the stream tend to produce vile and malarious exhalations, and these are intensified by the accumulation of filth, which no police vigilance could keep out of the stream, and which the dams retained and held. I deem it impossible, upon the proof and the findings, to exempt the maintenance of the pond and the dam from the charge of being a public nuisance.

We come now to the third cause of action; the second having been defeated by the general term, and the plaintiff having submitted to the decision by omitting to appeal from it. That third cause of action was to recover a penalty for a violation of the ordinance of the board of health passed December 7, 1892. That ordinance recited that the dam had been partially torn down pursuant to a warrant issued by the board, and that the defendant threatened and was about to rebuild the dam and re-create the pond, which, if restored, would be a public nuisance, and then ordered him to refrain from building the dam and re-creating the pond, and directed him to remove all obstructions to the flow of the water. We have already said that the findings of the court declared the dam and the pond, as existing facts, to be a public nuisance, and that obstructions at that point could not exist without endangering the public health. As such, the dam had been partially torn down, and the defendant had not only threatened to rebuild, but had actually commenced the work, by putting obstructions in the stream, interfering with the free flow of the water. He was therefore engaged in the very act of creating a nuisance, and was ordered to desist. That order he disobeyed, and now seeks to justify his disobedience, and avert the two remedies of a fine and an injunction, upon several grounds.

The first is quite narrow and technical. It is, in substance, that the board had no power to declare in advance that a future construction would be a nuisance. It is apparent that the facts do not raise that question by itself, so far as the action for the penalty is concerned, because the board had many times declared a dam and pond in the river at that point to be a nuisance, and the court has so found as a fact. So far as defendant had put obstructions in the stream, he had created a nuisance, less in degree than the old dam, but of the same character and effect. He was ordered to remove such obstructions, and refused, and that fact alone will sustain the judgment for the penalty. But, beyond that, I think the board had power to prevent a reconstruction and a reinstatement of what it had declared to be, and what the court has found in fact was, a public nuisance. The question, however, may conveniently be reserved until we reach the argument made against the injunction which was granted.

The appellant also objects that the ordinance, which was directed against him specially, and affected his property rights, was invalid, because passed without notice to him, and an opportunity to be heard. In another phase of this case, coming to us on certiorari for a review of the action of the board, we have decided that a hearing was not necessary, because the question of nuisance, or not, lies at the foundation of the jurisdiction, and the party proceeded against may always try that vital and decisive question in the courts, and is not foreclosed by the order made. This case well illustrates the doctrine in actual operation. The plaintiff did not rely on its orders or ordinances alone, or the presumptions which they raised, but proceeded to allege and prove that the dam and pond were a public nuisance. The defendant took issue upon that, and the battle was fought out over that question. The defendant has had his day in court, ample and abundant chance to be heard,—better and more complete than any hearing which the board could give. But we have already decided the question adversely to the defendant's contention, and nothing needs to be added to the discussion which it has received.

We come now to the final point of the appellant's argument, which is a contention that no injunction should have been granted, and that the one allowed should be set aside. In a large class of cases, the writ of injunction is a preventive remedy. It issues often, and promptly, where the defendant threatens or is about to do some act of such a character that no legal action can furnish adequate redress. It implies the danger of a future injury, and very frequently has been used to check and prevent an apprehended nuisance. Even where a statute provided specially for the removal of a nuisance, the people were not compelled to await its completion, but were awarded an injunction to restrain the further erection, and compel the removal so far as erected. People v. Vanderbilt, 24 How. Pr. 301, 28 N. Y. 287. Beyond the general jurisdiction, we have in this case the fact that both by the charter of the city of Yonkers, and the provisions of the general health act, the boards may avail themselves of the remedy by injunction. In that fact is necessarily involved the power of such boards to prevent the erection and creation of a nuisance, and so their right to determine what will be a nuisance, and interfere to stop it. Certainly, in a matter so serious as that of the public health, they ought not to wait until some citizen is sick or dead before they prevent or abate the nuisance causing the injurious result.

The appellant, however, further argues that this is not a case in which it is reasonable or just to grant the remedy, and his contention is, in substance, that when he built the dam the stream was clean, and the water pure; that he never did anything to pollute it, or make it dangerous to health; that it came into that condition from the acts of others, made possible by the negligence of the city authorities; and that his property is destroyed, and he is forbidden to restore it, without any fault of his own. But the court below has found as a fact that he did participate in creating the actual condition of things which menaced the public health, and there is evidence tending to show that he erected and maintained closets which emptied into the stream. That finding furnishes one answer to his plea of absolute innocence. But this dam and pond were his. He had a right, and it was his duty, to keep them clean and safe, or dispense with them entirely if he could not. His dam was a pocket to catch and hold all filth thrown in above. He well knew it, and could not sit still, and suffer his own property to become an intolerable nuisance, and say it was not his fault. When pestilence is forcing a way into our harbors, and danger and death approach through all rot and filth, it is the condition with which boards of health must grapple, and the condition which must be abated or removed, without regard to the question who caused the trouble. Thus in Wenick v. McCotter, 87 N. Y. 127, 41 Am. Rep. 858, it was said by Danforth, J., as to the position of an owner of land upon which a third party should wrongfully enter and erect a nuisance, that "in such a case the owner would not be liable either for the erection of the nuisance, or its continuance, until he was requested to abate it. . . . As if the defendant simply suffer a dam erected upon his land by a former owner to remain, without being used by him, it is no continuance of the nuisance, unless he first be requested to remove it." That is to say, however innocent he may be in creating the condition or maintaining it, he is bound to abate it upon the proper official request, and, if he refuses, becomes at once responsible for the existing condition, as continuing a nuisance which it was his right and his duty to remove and suppress. Again and again the defendant was notified by the board of health that his dam and pond had become a public nuisance, and endangered the health of the city. The trial judge finds that formal notice of the fact was given to the owner in September, 1891, accompanied by an order to abate the evil. In December of that year, he was again warned that if the pond was not cleaned before February of 1892 the board would cause the nuisance to be abated. It was not till October of that year that the board ordered the destruction of the dam, and not until December that the order was executed. For more than a year he refused to make his own property clean and safe, and for the sake of his private interest neglected his public duty, and left the city's health in peril; and now he complains that the board should have cleaned his pond, and not destroyed the dam. He had the opportunity to clean it himself, but chose to refuse, and stand defiantly in the maintenance of his basin of filth. I think there was full jurisdiction to grant the injunction, ample occasion for it, and no error in awarding the writ. In Rochester v. Simpson, 57 Hun, 86, to which we are referred, there was no proof that the pond contained water which was stagnant or impure, or that the existence of the pond was in any manner detrimental to the public health. In Babcock v. Buffalo, 56 N. Y. 268, a slip in the canal was ordered to be filled up because it had become foul; and this court held that, as it could have been dredged and cleaned at a moderate expense, the filling should stop. Here the dam has been torn down,—whether rightfully or not is a question not before us. If that was a wrongful act, the defendant has his remedy.

The Babcock Case may have some bearing upon the inquiry whether the mode of abating the nuisance here involved was reasonable or proper, but has very little bearing upon the question whether the defendant should be permitted to rebuild his dam, and restore a nuisance already abated. The proof here is that all these dams and ponds in the heart of the city are an inevitable menace to the public health, and cannot safely be allowed to exist. The judgment should be affirmed with costs.
All concur,

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

George W. BUCHANAN

Town of BARRE.

(.....Vt.....)

A town which leases to an opera company a hall, situated in a village where in the town has no responsibility for the streets, is not, because of such private use of the hall, charged with liability for the defective condition of a sidewalk in front of the hall, since the sidewalk is a part of the public street for which the village alone is responsible.

(March 10, 1894.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to an order of the Washington County Court directing a verdict in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. W. Wing and John G. Wing, for plaintiff:

A town in this matter stands as an individual. When persons are invited to enter the house of said person, either on business or for amusement, the party so inviting must provide a safe approach to and from said houses, and so with a town.

The town were the owners in fee to the center of the highway, with only an easement in the sidewalk to the public to use the same for travel. The town rented said opera house for $25, and took said money for use of the same.

We seek to recover under the common law, creating a liability on a party who invites the attendance of another person, who receives an injury attending upon said invitation, by reason of the lack of care in permitting the approaches to said place to remain in an unsafe and careless condition.

Messrs. John W. Gordon and Barney & Hoar, for defendant:

A town is not liable except in case of a bridge, culvert or sluice, for an accident upon its sidewalks included in its streets.

NOTE.—The above case is a very peculiar one with respect to the ownership by a town of a building within a village. But even regarding the ownership as that of a private individual the question of the owner's liability for the defective condition of a sidewalk in a public highway is said by counsel to be new in that state. This question is discussed at considerable length in the case of Rochester v. Campbell (N. Y.) 10 L. R. A. 388.

Concord, 2 N. H. 394; Roberts' Dig. §§ 192-195, p. 573.

The place where the plaintiff slipped on the ice, fell, and hurt himself, had been used and occupied as a sidewalk for twenty-six years, and for about twenty years before the town hall was built.

Sidewalks are a part of the street.

Dickinson v. Worcester, 188 Mass. 565; McKinsey v. McKee, 109 Ind. 209; Bishop, Noncont. L. § 977; Anderson, Law Dict.

There was no evidence tending to show that the slipperiness in front of the building within the limits of the street where the accident happened was due to the negligence of the town; so far as the evidence goes, it only tends to show that the walk was slippery. Mere slipperiness is not ground for liability even where statutes exist making towns liable for accidents upon its highways.

Chamberlain v. Oshkosh, 19 L. R. A. 518, 84 Wis. 289; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1006; Bishop, Noncont. L. § 978; Stanton v. Springfield, 12 Allen, 566; Taylor v. Yonkers, 105 N. Y. 203, 59 Am. Rep. 492; Keith v. Brockton, 136 Mass. 119; Broburg v. Des Moines, 63 Iowa, 523, 50 Am. Rep. 756; Kinney v. Troy, 109 N. Y. 567.

The town as an owner of land abutting on a public highway is not liable for the dangerous condition of the sidewalk in front of its building, caused by "snow and ice accumulated by natural causes thereon."

1 Thomp. Neg. p. 360, § 26; Kirby v. Boylston Market Assn. 14 Gray, 249, 74 Am. Dec. 682; Flynn v. Canton Co. of Baltimore, 40 Md. 812, 17 Am. Rep. 603.

Tyler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action on the case to recover for injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff near the entrance to the town hall in the defendant town. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that he slipped and fell, and was injured, upon the sidewalk within the limits of the village of Barre, at a point two to four feet from the steps of the town hall or opera house, in consequence of the slippery condition of the sidewalk. To entitle the plaintiff to recover under the law of negligence, it must appear that the defendant owed him a duty in respect to the safe condition of the street at that point, and failed to perform that duty. By sections 5, 6, Act No. 190, Laws 1886, the village of Barre assumed all duties and responsibilities in respect to the streets of the village, and the town was relieved therefrom. If there was negligence in respect to the care of the sidewalk, it was on the part of the village. But there was no statutory liability upon either corporation, they being liable by the statute only for damages arising from the insufficiency of bridges, culverts, and sluices. The plaintiff contends that as the defendant owned the opera house, and rented it on this occasion for other than public purposes, namely, to an opera company, and received rent for its use, it owed a common-law duty to the plaintiff and others who were invited to the opera house to have the approaches to it reasonably safe. It is a general rule that towns and other quasi corporations are not liable for any neglect of corporate duty unless an action is given therefor by statute. This is for the reason that they are governmental in their character,—political subdivisions formed for the purpose of aiding in carrying on the government of the country. Dill. Mun. Corp. § 963; Mower v. Leicester, 9 Mass. 247, 6 Am. Dec. 63; State v. Burlington, 36 Vt. 521.

A city or town is not liable to a private citizen for an injury caused by any defect or want of repair of a city or town hall, or other public building erected and used solely for municipal purposes; but where a city or town does not devote such building exclusively to those purposes, but lets it for its own advantage and emoluments by receiving rents or otherwise, the city or town is liable, while it is so let, in the same manner that a private person would be liable. Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489, 8 Am. Rep. 486; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 844, 28 Am. Rep. 332; Worden v. New Bedford, 131 Mass. 28, 41 Am. Rep. 185. The rule applies only to the neglect or omission of a town to perform those duties which are imposed on all towns without their corporate consent, and exclusively for public purposes. Bigelow v. Randolph, 14 Gray, 541. The cases make a clear distinction between the responsibilities of towns for acts done in their public capacity, in the discharge of duties imposed upon them by the legislature for the public benefit, and those done for their immediate profit or advantage as a corporation, though inuring ultimately to the public benefit. Oliver v. Worcester, note to Perry v. Worcester, 66 Am. Dec. 434; Moffitt v. Asheville, 103 N. C. 237; Howard v. Worcester, 153 Mass. 426, 13 L. R. A. 160. Applying the rule for which the plaintiff contends,—that the defendant town stood in the case like a private individual; that, having rented the opera house on this occasion for the purpose shown by the evidence, it was legally bound to provide a reasonably safe approach to the building for persons going to and from it,—what was the measure of its liability? If a private person had been the owner of the opera house, he would have been under a legal obligation, to all persons visiting it on this occasion, to have had the building and its entrances and approaches, which were under his control, reasonably safe for their proper use. If there had been a space between the sidewalk and the building, owned and controlled by him, over which visitors had to pass in going to and from the building, he would have owed them the duty of having it in a reasonably safe condition for their passage over it; but over the sidewalk, which was a part of the public street, such private individual would have had no control, and in respect to its condition would have owed visitors no duty, and consequently would have been under no liability for its defects. Wherever there is a clear space between the street and any private building to which the public are invited, owned by the owners of the building, and used as an approach to it, such owners are responsible for its reasonably safe condition. If, on the other hand, the space is a part of the public street which it is the duty of the village, town, or city to maintain, the owners of the building are not liable for defects in the approach unless there is an ordinance which imposes upon them a duty to keep the approach in repair. In the absence of a duty there is no liability. The defendant has made no point as to the length of time the slippery condition of the sidewalk had existed, and we have not considered it.

Judgment affirmed.

All concur.

N. C. FOSTER, Respt.,

v.

CHARLES BETCHER LUMBER CO.,
Appt.

(.....S. Dak.)

*1. Under the provision of section 4898, Comp. Laws, service of summons upon the managing agent of a foreign corporation, in this state, constitutes a valid service, when such corporation has property within the state, or the cause of action arose therein.

2. The failure of a foreign corporation to file a copy of its articles of incorporation and the certificate of the appointment of an agent authorized to accept service of process, as required by sections 3190 and 3192, Comp. Laws, cannot be taken advantage of by such corporation, and service of summons upon

NOTE.—Who may be served with process in suit against a foreign corporation?

Early doctrine.

Some early cases laid down the doctrine that a foreign corporation could not be sued because it could not be served with process outside of the state by which it was created. This was declared in the case of McQueen v. Middletown Mfg. Co., 16 Johns. 5, but that case in reality only decided that an attachment under the New York act relative to absconding and absent debtors did not apply to a foreign corporation.

Other cases expressly decided that a foreign corporation, not having its chief office or place of business in the state, cannot be served with process, except by attachment. Robb v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 47 Mo. 540; Middough v. St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co., 51 Mo. 520.

So in Kain v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co., as reported in a note to 14 Conn. 303, it was decided by the superior court in New York that service of summons on the teller of a bank at a New York banking office of a New Jersey banking corporation was not valid, on the ground that suit could not be brought against a foreign corporation, except by attachment of property.

And in Middlebrooks v. Springfield F. Ins. Co., 14 Conn. 301, service of summons on the secretary of a Massachusetts insurance company who was in Connecticut when served at an agency of the corporation in that state, was held not valid, since a foreign corporation could be sued only by attachment.

In Hulbert v. Hope Mut. Ins. Co., 4 How. Pr. 275, service of summons upon the president of a foreign insurance corporation temporarily within the state, in an action on a contract made with an agent of the company in the state, was contested, but it was upheld with a statement that it was not a judicial process, but for all practical purposes simply a statutory notice that proceedings were about to be instituted against the property of the corporation.

Service on the rector, as the head of a church corporation, organized in another state, was held insufficient in Nash v. Evangelical Lutheran Church, 1 Miles (Pa.) 73, with the declaration that "service must be within the jurisdiction of the sovereignty where the artificial body resides." There is no distinction suggested in this case between a corporation engaged in business within the state and others, but from the nature of the corporation which was there sued, it would appear that it had no property or business in the state.

Likewise in Andrews v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 99 Mass. 534, 97 Am. Dec. 51, where service on a nonresident railroad corporation was made on its 28 L. R. A.

treasurer at its office in Boston, which was alleged to be its usual place of business within the commonwealth, it was held that the foreign corporation could be sued only by attachment of its property, except as in case of foreign insurance companies by virtue of an express provision of statute.

Service on the treasurer of a foreign corporation when not authorized by statute, was also held insufficient in Desper v. Continental Water Meter Co., 137 Mass. 252; and Lewis v. Northern Railroad, 139 Mass. 234.

The early doctrine declared in McQueen v. Middletown Mfg. Co., 16 Johns. 5, that a foreign corporation could not be sued because its representative officers, on whom process must be served, could not carry their official character with them out of the state in which the corporation was created, is said in St. Clair v. Cox, 103 U. S. 350, 7 L. ed. 223, to be perhaps unnecessary to the decision in that case, but nevertheless, to have been accepted as correctly stating the law; but, as stated by Justice Field in St. Clair v. Cox, this doctrine "was the cause of much inconvenience and often of manifest injustice. The great increase in the number of corporations of late years, and the immense extent of their business, only made this inconvenience and injustice more frequent and marked. . . To meet and obviate this inconvenience and injustice, the legislatures of several states interposed and provided for service of process on officers and agents of foreign corporations doing business therein."

Later doctrine.

But even in the absence of any statutory provision for service on agents or officers of such corporations, the courts in other cases have established what may be regarded as the present prevailing doctrine that a foreign corporation which enters a state for the transaction of business may be sued by serving process on its representative in that state.

Thus in Diana v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co., 13 Rep. 457, decided by Judge Hughes of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, it is said that a corporation doing business in a state other than that by which it is created through an agent may be sued and brought into court by service on such agent independently of any statute, law, or warrant of attorney especially authorizing such service. The case also holds a decision as to the effect of such agency, which is contested by the defendant, is conclusive on the courts of another state, when an attempt is made to enforce the judgment.

Also in Van Dresser v. Oregon R. & N. Co., 43 Fed. Rep. 203, it is held that whoever, with the a managing agent of such corporation within this state will be valid, notwithstanding the failure of such corporation to comply with the laws of the state.

3. A person who has full charge of the business of a foreign corporation dealing in lumber and merchandise at a particular place within this state, and subject to no authority from any other person or agent within the state, but who corresponds with, accounts to, and receives instructions from, the main office of such foreign corporation in the foreign state, receives and disburses moneys, pays freight, makes contracts with customers as to terms of payment of accounts, issues receipt for money, employs all necessary temporary assistance for and in behalf of the corporation, and, with the knowledge and under the instructions of the corporation, holds himself out and advertises in the newspaper as manager, is within the meaning of section 4893, the "managing agent" of such foreign corporation.

knowledge and consent of a foreign railroad company has the actual control and superintendence of its railway within a state, must be regarded as its authorized agent and representative, on whom process may be served.

And in Havden v. Androscoggin Mills, 1 Fed. Rep. 53, the circuit court of the United States sitting in Massachusetts held contrary to the doctrine of the Massachusetts cases above cited that a foreign corporation doing business in the state might be sued by serving an officer in the state irrespective of the fact of attachment of property.

In North Missouri R. Co. v. Akers, 4 Kan. 453, 16 Am. Dec. 133, service of process on a foreign railroad company in the state was upheld; but in this case the corporation had answered to the merits.

The person to whom a foreign corporation commits the management and control of its business in the state is its agent for the purpose of receiving service of process in actions arising out of the conduct of its business in the state. Norton v. Berlin Iron Bridge Co. 51 N. J. L. 42.

Service on the president of a foreign corporation at his residence within the state gives jurisdiction in suit on a contract made within the state, as by making the contract the corporation submits itself to the jurisdiction. National Condensed Milk Co. v. Brandenburg, 40 N. J. L. 111.

On the same theory if the chief office or place of business of a foreign corporation is in the state and its officers there, it cannot be attached as a nonresident, because it may be sued as an individual. Farnsworth v. Terre Haute, A. & St. L. R. Co. 29 Mo. 75.

A suit in personam will not lie on a contract or deed of a foreign corporation, which has no connection with its agency in the state. Bawknicht v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 55 Ga. 194.

Statutes authorizing service.

It is said in St. Clair v. Cox, 108 U. S. 350, 27 L. ed. 222, that "if a state permits a foreign corporation to do business within her limits, and at the same time provides that in suits against it for business there done process shall be served upon its agents, the provision is to be deemed a condition of the permission; and corporations that subsequently do business in the state are to be deemed to assent to such condition as fully as though they had specially authorized their agents to receive service of the process."

So in Merchants' Mfg. Co. v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 23 Fed. Rep. 358, it is held that a foreign corporation consents to be amenable to suit by such modes of service as the laws of the state provide when it invokes the comity of the state for the transaction of its affairs.

(March 8, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Grant County denying a motion to set aside a default judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought against a foreign corporation, in which the summons was served on persons alleged to be its managing agents. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. M. Bennett and F. M. Wilson for appellant.

Mr. Bion A. Dodge for respondent.

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order denying the motion of the appellant to vacate and set aside a judgment rendered in favor of the respondent by default, the appellant not having appeared in the action. The summons

Foreign corporations are within the provisions of Ala. Code, § 2568, authorizing service on president or other head of the corporation, or its secretary, cashier, or managing agent. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Pleasants, 46 Ala. 641.

So the Illinois statute authorizing service on "any incorporated company" by service on its president, etc., or an agent, is applicable to a foreign corporation doing business in the state. Mineral Point R. Co. v. Keep, 22 Ill. 2, 74 Am. Dec. 124.

And a foreign corporation doing business in the state is subject to Ga. Rev. Code, § 3293, authorizing service in a suit against any corporation on "any officer or agent." City F. Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Carrugi, 41 Ga. 660.

Likewise in New Hampshire it was held that a corporation allowed to hold property and bring suits in the state could be sued there by service on an officer by whom it transacted business in the state, under general provisions of a statute allowing service on agents of corporations. Libbey v. Hodgdon, 9 N. H. 394.

Service on a foreign corporation, under Missouri Rev. Stat., § 3439, has the same effect to allow personal judgment as service on an individual. Monichol v. United States Mercantile Reporting Agency, 74 Mo. 457.

A judgment in a state court against a foreign corporation obtained on service made upon a designated agent of the company within the state according to statute must be given full effect in a federal court. Warren Mfg. Co. v. Etna Ins. Co. 3 Paine, C. C. 501; Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 59 U. S. 18 How. 404, 15 L. ed. 451.

The legislature may determine how service shall be made on a foreign corporation. Hillier v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 70 N. Y. 223.

It is competent for the legislature of a state to authorize commencement of a suit against a foreign corporation, having a place of business or making contracts in the state, by service of process upon its president, secretary, or treasurer. Weymouth v. Washington, G. & A. R. Co. 1 McARTH. 19.

The rule limiting jurisdiction on such service to cases on contracts made or transactions occurring within the state does not apply where the foreign corporation has its principal place of business in the state. Peters v. Neely, 16 Lea, 275.

Where corporation is not engaged in business within the state.

A statute directing service of process on the agent of a foreign corporation conducting its business in the district clearly contemplates cases in which the corporation has an established place of business in the district with agents or persons em-and complaint were served upon A. J. Fairchild, at Millbank, in Grant county, in this state, and upon Albert Wihlborg, at Big Stone City, in said county. The sheriff, in his amended return, states that he duly served the summons and complaint upon the persons above named, who were the managing agents of said defendant. The appellant assigns as error that the court erred in denying appellant's motion to vacate and set aside the said judgment, as the court acquired no jurisdiction of the person of the appellant. It appeared that the appellant was a foreign corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the state of Minnesota, but it also appeared that it had property and places of business in this state. It also appeared from the proof offered by appellant that it had never filed a copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the secretary of state, nor its appointment of an agent authorized to accept service of process, as required by the laws of this state.

Two questions are presented for our decision: (1) Can service of a summons be legally made upon the managing agent of a foreign corporation, in this state, who has not been appointed by the corporation in the manner prescribed by the statute of this state? And (2) were the persons upon whom the service in this case was made "managing agents" of the appellant, within the meaning of the statute of this state relating to the service of summons upon foreign corporaployed to conduct it. Dallas v. Atlantic, M. & O. R. Co. 2 McArthur, 146.

In State v. Ramsey County Dist. Ct., 28 Minn. 233, it is intimated, though not decided, that jurisdiction of a foreign corporation, having no office or business in the state, cannot be obtained by service on an officer who comes into the state on private business.

This states a doctrine that is generally supported by the decisions outside of New York state.

Only those foreign corporations which have an agency or place of business within the state are contemplated by the Pennsylvania statute authorizing service against foreign corporations upon "any officer, agent, etc.," either personally or by copy, or by leaving a copy at its office, depot, or usual place of business. Branson v. Trump Bros. Mach. Co. 16 Phila. 112; Phillips v. Library Co. 141 Pa. 462.

If a foreign corporation is doing no business within a state, jurisdiction cannot be obtained in an action against it by service of process on its president who is temporarily within the state for his own business or pleasure. Phillips v. Library Co. supra.

This decision in Pennsylvania fully approves the doctrine of Camden Roll Mill Co. v. Swede Iron Co., infra, in which it is said that "upon general principles and in the absence of statutory innovations, it is to be regarded as settled that if a foreign corporation at the time of commencement of suit does not do business or has not any office or place of business in this state, such corporation, except by its own consent, cannot be brought within the jurisdiction of this or any other court of this state. Under such circumstances the officers or agents of such foreign corporation when they come into this jurisdiction do not bring with them their official character or functions."

The Pennsylvania case also says that the Statute of 1849, in respect to process on officers of a foreign corporation, contemplates a foreign corporation doing business within the commonwealth. This case, therefore, does not necessarily conflict with the New York decisions, infra, which uphold service of process on officers of a foreign corporation which does not do any business within the state, as the New York statute clearly contemplates service in such cases; but it is more difficult to harmonize the New York decisions with those of the federal courts.

So in New Jersey service upon one of the officers or agents of a foreign corporation who are named by the statute authorizing service will not give jurisdiction of the suit, if on general principles the courts of the state have no jurisdiction of the cause of action, as in a case in which the corporation did no business in the state, and the suit was on a contract not made in the state. Camden Roll Mill Co. v. Swede Iron Co. 22 N. J. L. 15.

A statute which authorizes service of process upon one of the officers or members of a foreign corporation, who is accidentally within the jurisdiction, in a case where the corporation confines its business operations to the state which chartered it, is so contrary to natural justice and to the principles of national law that the courts of other states ought not to sanction it. Moulton v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. 24 N. J. L. 222.

The provision for service on certain officers or agents of "any incorporated company" in the Illinois practice act does not apply to a foreign corporation having no business in the state but whose officer is served while passing through the state. Midland Pac. R. Co. v. McDermid, 91 Ill. 170.

So service of process on the president of a foreign corporation, who was temporarily in the state on his own business, is not valid, where the corporation has no agent or place of business in the state, merely because he sends a telegram in relation to a proposition in the business of the company. Galveston City R. Co. v. Hook, 40 Ill. App. 547.

A statutory provision allowing service on the presiding officer, or if there is none, in such manner as the court may direct in any suit against a corporation, if it applies at all to a foreign corporation does not justify service on an officer of a Canadian corporation which has no office or business, or resident officer in the state, while he is casually in the state. Newell v. Great Western R. Co. 19 Mich. 338.

Under Hill's Annotated Laws (Or.) § 516, a corporation is not subject to the jurisdiction of a court, unless it was created by the laws of the state, or has an agency for business, or property within the state, and then only to the extent of such property at the time the jurisdiction attached, therefore service upon an officer of a foreign corporation who is temporarily within the state to negotiate a transfer of its stock and plant is invalid where the corporation has no property or business in the state. Aldrich v. Anchor Coal & D. Co. (Or.) April 10, 1893.

The president of a foreign corporation, who is within the state, although not on official business or in any official character, or in any way representing the corporation, may be served with process against the company, if the cause of action accrued within the state, under How. Stat. (Mich.) § 8145, allowing service in such a case upon any officer or agent of a foreign corporation. Shickle, H. & H. Iron Co. v. The S. L. Wiley Constr. Co. 61 Mich. 226.

This was an action on a draft drawn by the foreign corporation upon a drawee within the state.

In this case it is said that this statute was passed to remedy defects in prior laws, as indicated in the case of Newell v. Great Western R. Co. supra.

Under S. C. Code, § 155, as amended in 1887, service on a foreign corporation can be made on its tions? The section of the statute relating to such service is section 4898, Comp. Laws, and reads as follows: "The summons shall be served by delivering a copy thereof, as follows: (1) If the action be against a private corporation, to the president or other head of the corporation, secretary, cashier, treasurer, a director, or managing agent thereof; but such service can be made in respect to a foreign corporation only when it has property in this territory, or the cause of action arose therein, or when such service shall be made within this territory personally upon the president, treasurer, secretary, or duly authorized agent thereof." The learned counsel for appellant contend that, under this section, service can only be made upon a foreign corporation by serving the summons upon the president, treasurer, secretary, or duly authorized agent, as provided in the last clause of the section, and that service can only be made upon a managing agent in case of domestic corporations. But we cannot agree with the counsel in this construction of the statute. In our opinion, the language of the section will not bear that construction. The first clause of the section clearly applies to all private corporations, whether domestic or foreign. No distinction is made in that clause between the two classes. But by the second clause a condition of such service is made, not as to the persons upon whom service may be made, but under what circumstances such service can be made; and it pro-president or agent only when it has property within the state, or the cause of action arose therein, or where service is made within the state personally upon the president or resident agent. Hester v. Basin Fertilizer Co. 38 S. C. 609.

The language of this section would seem to authorize service upon the president even if the cause of action did not arise in the state or the corporation have any property therein, but such a case was not presented for decision.

If the cause of action arose in the state, service on the president of a foreign corporation is sufficient under N. Y. Code Proc., § 134. Barnett v. Chicago & L. H. R. Co. 4 Hun, 114.

After the president of a foreign corporation has made a resignation, which has been accepted, and a new election had at which he is not elected, service upon him in an action against the corporation is not valid. Sturgis v. Crescent Jute Mfg. Co. 10 N. Y. Supp. 470.

Under the New York Code of Procedure, § 134, as it stood in 1856, service on an officer of a foreign corporation was authorized only when it had property within the state, or the cause of action arose therein. Hiller v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 70 N. Y. 223; Bates v. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. 13 How. Pr. 514.

The cause of action in favor of an agent of a foreign corporation on a contract for maintaining an office and performing services in New York arises in that state. Hiller v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. supra.

Service on the vice-president and manager of a foreign corporation while temporarily visiting in the state, but not in his official capacity, is valid under N. Y. Code, § 432, subd. 8, where the president, treasurer, or secretary is not within the state, if the cause of action arose within the state. Porter v. Sewall Safety Car-Heating Co. 7 N. Y. Supp. 166.

So in Atlantic & P. Teleg. Co. v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 11 N. Y. Week. Dig. 123, service on the president of a foreign corporation was held good in a suit for injunction against interference with telegraph lines in New York, although he was not in the state on his own business, and not acting as representative of the company.

And even if the cause of action did not arise within the state and the company has no corporate office, property, or business within the state, service on the president of a foreign railroad company, who is temporarily within the state for purposes of his own on his way to a sea-side resort, is authorized by N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 432, subd. 1. Pope v. Terre Haute Car Mfg. Co. 87 N. Y. 137.

So under that section and sub-division service of summons on the secretary of a foreign corporation in the state is sufficient, although it had no property within the state, and the cause of action did not arise therein. Miller v. Jones, 67 Hun, 281.

The New York decisions last cited go farther than those of any other state and are contrary to some of the federal cases following.

Thus in Bentliff v. London & C. Finance Corp., 44 Fed. Rep. 667, it was held that service upon a director of a foreign corporation found in the state of New York but not in any official capacity or business of the corporation, where the cause of action arose in the state, but the corporation has no place of business within the state and does no business there, although such a service is held valid by the courts of the state, will be set aside in a federal court after the cause has been removed thereto.

And the presence of an officer of a foreign corporation in the state of New York merely to negotiate a loan upon a mortgage of its property does not make service upon him in an action against the company a valid one. Clews v. Woodstock Iron Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 81.

Service on the president of a foreign newspaper corporation in a libel suit made while he was temporarily in the state was held invalid, there being no office, agent, property, or business of the corporation in the state. Golden v. The Morning News of New Haven, 42 Fed. Rep. 112.

Service upon an officer or agent of a foreign corporation, who is temporarily within the state on private business, is insufficient, where the corporation has no office and transacts no business within the state. Reisenfer v. American Imp. Pub. Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 438. (This case followed a decision of a court of the state in which suit was brought.)

In St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 27 L. ed. 222, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a corporation must be engaged in business in the state in order to authorize a personal judgment against it based on service of process made upon an agent or officer within the state.

This decision was rendered in relation to service of an attachment which by statute was equivalent to a summons under a Michigan statute authorizing service on "any officer, member, clerk, or agent of" a foreign corporation; and while the court construes the statute in the light of a Michigan decision as applying only to corporations doing business in the state, it quotes from Moulin v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co., 24 N. J. L. 222, to the effect that a law sanctioning service on an officer accidentally within the jurisdiction is contrary to natural justice and to the principles of international law.

The same court held in Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 137 U. S. 98, 34 L. ed. 608, that if a foreign corporation is not doing business in a state the mere fact that its president, or other officer, is within the state, but not transacting business for it or representing it, will not authorize service upon him so as to bring the corporation into the jurisdiction.

vides: "But such service can be made in respect to a foreign corporation only when it has property in this territory, or the cause of action arose therein." The expression "such service" evidently refers to the service specified in the preceding clause, as there is no other service to which it can properly refer. The third and last clause of the section provides for a different service, which may be made when the foreign corporation has no property in this state, and the cause of action did not arise therein. The learned counsel for the respondent contends "that the section authorizes service on the managing agent of a foreign corporation when it has property in this state, or the cause of action arose therein; and that when neither of these conditions exists, service can be made only upon the president, secretary, or duly authorized agent." We are of the opinion that this is the true construction of the section. This seems to be the construction placed upon a somewhat similar provision of the practice act of New York, whence the section we are considering apparently came. Brewster v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 5 How. Pr. 183; Sterrett v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 17 Hun, 816; Reddington v. Mariposa Land & Min. Co. 19 Hun, 405; Tuchband v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 437. We are not able to discover any valid reason why any distinction should be made as to the service of process between the managing agent of a domestic and a foreign corporation when such corporation has

The statute here applicable provided for suit against a nonresident or foreign corporation "in any county in which there may be property or debts owing to, or where said defendant may be found." Neb. Code Civ. Proc. § 59.

These cases suggest the question whether or not the New York decisions, upholding service on such officers as president, secretary, and treasurer of a foreign corporation, can be sustained under the Federal Constitution if the corporation has no property or business in the state and the cause of action did not arise there, or even if the cause of action did arise in the state.

As the New York statute clearly provides for such service the only question is as to its constitutionality, and this would seem most liable to attack on the ground of denying due process of law or the equal protection of the laws. The rule that a foreign corporation submits to such conditions as the laws of a state prescribe when it enters the state to do business manifestly has no place in case of a corporation which has not thus entered the state, and it is difficult to see how a foreign corporation which does no business in a state, asks no recognition or favor from the state, and does not enter it in any corporate capacity, can be held subject to the jurisdiction of that state merely because one of the corporate officers in the exercise of his personal liberty chooses to go into the state on his own affairs of business or pleasure. Therefore, recognizing the fact that the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States above cited are to be construed with reference to the facts involved in each case, and that neither of those cases is conclusive in respect to the New York statute, the constitutionality of that statute is at least subject to question. It may be said in this connection that the kindred provision of N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 438, authorizing service by publication in any suit against a foreign corporation, seems to be even more questionable as to constituting due process of law.

Service on director.

Service on a director of a foreign corporation, who is temporarily within the state, where the corporation has no property, although the cause of action is alleged to have arisen in the state, does not give jurisdiction which will sustain a personal judgment by default, and such judgment will not be upheld in another state. Latimer v. Union Pac. Railway, 48 Mo. 105, 97 Am. Dec. 373.

This decision follows Hulbert v. Hope Mut. Ins. Co., 4 How. Pr. 275, and Brewster v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 5 How. Pr. 183, which have been in effect overruled in New York.

Service on a director of a foreign corporation who is temporarily in the state in pursuance of his own business is sufficient, if the corporation has property in the state, or the cause of action arises therein. Hiller v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 70 N. Y. 223, 33 L. R. A.

To sustain service of process on a director of a foreign corporation it is enough, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 432, subd. 3, if the cause of action arose in the state. Childs v. Harris Mfg. Co. 104 N. Y. 477.

A director of a foreign corporation may be served in New York, in an action based on a contract to indemnify the plaintiff against actions for infringement in the state, although the contract was made in another state. Ibid.

Service of summons on a director of a foreign corporation, not being authorized in the case by N. Y. Code, § 432, although by section 431, a domestic corporation may be served in this way, service on the director of a foreign corporation, under N. Y. Laws 1846, chap. 195, authorizing service upon it "in the same manner as corporations created by the laws of this state," can be upheld only when the summons served is of the character described in that act, and not where it was in an action under section 1898 by a person aggrieved to recover a penalty of forfeiture. Quade v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 27 Jones & S. 479.

Service on stockholder.

Service on a stockholder of a foreign corporation is authorized by Colo. Code Civ. Proc., § 40, if there is no officer or agent on whom process can be served within the state, and this cannot be defeated by a collusive transfer of stock. Colorado Iron Works v. Sierra Grande Min. Co. (Colo.) 9 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 113.

Effect of designating agent.

Where a foreign insurance company has, in accordance with law, designated a general agent and attorney within the state on whom process may be served, service upon another person who is merely a soliciting agent for the company is invalid. Prudential Ins. Co. of Newark v. Conners, 6 Kulp, 400.

Under a statute requiring the appointment of a designated person to receive service of process for a foreign insurance company, where such an agent has been appointed, service on a mere solicitor of the company is insufficient. Liblong v. Kansas F. Ins. Co. 82 Pa. 413.

An agent of a foreign insurance company, who is not the attorney whom it has appointed as required by statute for the service of process, cannot be served with process for the company. Thayer v. Tyler, 10 Gray, 164.

Service upon the designated agent of a foreign corporation gives jurisdiction over it, if the corporation has property in the state, or the cause of action arose there. Gibbs v. Queen Ins. Co. 68 N. Y. 114, 20 Am. Rep. 513.

Service upon an agent of a foreign corporation which, in compliance with law, it had appointed for that purpose, is good in admiralty as well as in law. Re Louisville Underwriters, 134 U. S. 483, 32 L. ed. 901.

such a managing agent within this state, and we think the lawmaking power has made none.

The counsel for appellant further contend that inasmuch as the appellant had never filed its articles of incorporation with the secretary of state, nor its certificate of the appointment of an agent, as required by the law of this state, it was not legally doing business within the state, and could not legally have a managing agent therein, on whom service could be made. But we cannot assent to this proposition. The failure of appellant to comply with the laws of this state cannot be taken advantage of by itself, nor in fact by any private person in a collateral proceeding. The state only, in its sovereign capacity, can take advantage of such failure of a foreign corporation to comply with the law. Wright v. Lee (S. Dak.) 51 N. W. Rep. 706, 55 N. W. Rep. 981. If a foreign corporation is engaged in business in this state, though failing to comply with the laws by filing a copy of its articles of incorporation and a certificate of the appointment of an agent, it is still subject to the laws of the state, and amenable to its process, until its right to so continue to do business within this state is declared forfeited by the courts of the state, upon due proceedings taken in the name of the state. The person transacting the business of the corporation in this state, as managing agent, must be presumed to be the agent of the corporation,

A certificate of a foreign corporation appointing its general manager residing in a designated city in the state as its agent for receiving service of process is not insufficient because it does not give his name. Goodwin v. Colorado Mortg. & Investment Co. of London, 110 U. S. 1, 28 L. ed. 47. See also Michigan State Ins. Co. v. Abens, and Gibson v. Manufacturers Fire & Marine Ins. Co. infra.

An agent designated for service of process in accordance with the Alabama constitution need not be a person authorized to exercise any of its contractual powers. Nelms v. Edinburgh-American Land Mort. Co. 32 Ala. 187; McCall v. American Freehold Land Mort. Co. (Ala.) April 5, 1893.

Failure to make designation.

Where a statute provides that a foreign insurance company may not do business in the state until it has filed a stipulation authorizing service of process in suits against it to be made upon the auditor of state, the validity of service on such auditor cannot be contested by the company on the ground that it has not filed such stipulation, as it was required to do by law. Ehrman v. Teutonia Ins. Co. 1 McCrary, 123.

Failure of a foreign corporation to appoint an agent to receive service will not prevent service of process on an agent doing business for the company in the state from being valid, where the statute of the state authorizes service on such an agent. Mooch v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 696.

A foreign insurance company which fails to comply with a statute requiring the appointment of an agent to receive service of process may be sued by serving an agent in the state by whom it transacts business out of which the suit arises. Funk v. Anglo-American Ins. Co. 27 Fed. Rep. 236.

Service on any agent, or, at least, on the only one who is found in the state, is sufficient as against a foreign corporation which has failed to comply with a statute requiring it to establish an office and appoint an agent on whom service may be made. Hagerman v. Empire State Co. 97 Pa. 584.

Service on the general solicitor or counsel of a foreign corporation, which has established a place of business in the state, is sufficient, where the corporation has failed to designate any person on whom summons may be served, and where none of the persons holding the official relation to the company prescribed by statute can be served. Clews v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. 49 How. Pr. 117.

Termination of agency.

An agent of a foreign corporation who can be served in Iowa must be one conducting the business out of which the cause of action arose; and where an agency has been discontinued, the former agent cannot be served, although another agent is kept in the same place to transact other business. Winney v. Sandwich Mfg. Co. (Iowa) Dec. 17, 1891.

But service on a former agent of a foreign insurance company, who still resides within the state and who countersigned the policy sued on, is sufficient, under Maine Stat. 1848, chap. 186, authorizing service on the agent or attorney of such a company in an action on a policy countersigned by any agent in the state. Gillespie v. Commercial Mut. M. Ins. Co. 12 Gray, 301, 71 Am. Dec. 743.

Expiration of a contract of agency for a foreign corporation will not defeat service of process upon an agent in an action for breach of warranty in a sale made by him where some of the property of the corporation is still in his hands. Gross v. Nichols, 72 Iowa, 289; Brunson v. Nichols, Id. 763.

A foreign corporation which has been engaged in business within a state, but has withdrawn therefrom, may be sued by serving process in an action growing out of such business on an officer of the company who happens to be in the state accidentally for a purpose not connected with the company's business. Moulin v. Trenton Mut. L. & F. Ins. Co. 25 N. J. L. 57.

A foreign insurance company cannot frustrate a suit against it by revoking its agency, after it has been notified that suit is to be brought. Michael v. Nashville Mut. Ins. Co. 10 La. Ann. 737.

A statute providing that in case of the death of the agent of a foreign corporation and failure to appoint a new agent, the personal representative of the deceased agent may be served with process as the representative of the company, does not apply to a company which had abandoned its business in the state many years before and whose agent had died before the passage of the statute. Ellis v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 19 Blatchf. 383.

The provision in Illinois Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 73, § 22, authorizing service against a foreign insurance company, which has ceased business in the state, to be made on "the agents last designated or acting for such corporation," means those last acting in the state and not in the county where suit is brought. Michigan State Ins. Co. v. Abens, 3 Ill. App. 483.

Where a partnership is designated as agent of a foreign corporation for service of process, service can be made on one partner who continues the business under the same name, with the knowledge of the corporation which makes no change in the designation. Gibson v. Manufacturers Fire & Marine Ins. Co. 144 Mass. 81.

Service on a person designated by a foreign corporation for that purpose is valid so long as the designation is not revoked, although he has ceased to be an officer or agent of the corporation for any other purpose. Eureka Lake & Yuba Canal Co. v. Yuba County Super. Ct. 66 Cal. 311.

and subject to the service of process. In Hagerman v. Empire State Co., 97 Pa. 534, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "When a foreign corporation, transacting business in this state, has failed to establish an office, and report the name of an agent, . . . but has some person residing therein as its agent, it must be presumed that the corporation has substituted such agent as the one on whom service is authorized to be made, to the extent, at least, of its unfinished business in this state." This seems to be the true rule. If a corporation fails to comply with the laws of the state, but is still engaged in business therein, and permitted to carry on such business, it must transact its business here subject to the laws of the state, and its Cashier.

A man who handles whatever money is received by a corporation within the state in the conduct of its business there is a "cashier" within the meaning of N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 432. McCulloh v. Pallard Non-Magnetic Watch Co. 38 N. Y. S. R. 406.

Managing agent.

The question who is a "managing agent" presented in the main case has been presented in numerous cases which do not altogether agree but the later of which incline to less strictness in the construction of the words than the earlier ones.

The relation of attorney and client does not constitute the attorney a managing agent of a foreign corporation, within the meaning of N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 432. Taylor v. Granite State Provident Assn. 136 N. Y. 843.

An agent of a foreign corporation merely for the purpose of receiving what is sent him by the corporation and remitting the proceeds, is not a managing agent for the purpose of serving process upon him. Gibbin v. Kanawha & O. Coal Co. 2 Clin. Super. Ct. Rep. 75.

The captain of a steamboat owned by a foreign corporation is not a managing agent for service of process. Upper Mississippi Transp. Co. v. Whittaker, 16 Wis. 220.

A telegraph operator having charge of a local telegraph office of a nonresident postal telegraph cable company is not "a managing agent" on whom process can be served, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 431. Jepson v. Postal Telegr. Cable Co. 30 N. Y. Supp. 300.

A mere clerk in a store belonging to a foreign mining corporation is not a managing agent or cashier within the meaning of Cal. Code Civ. Proc., § 542. Blanc v. Paymaster Min. Co. 95 Cal. 524.

Local corporations licensed by the American Bell Telephone Company to use its patents and telephone instruments do not, by reason of a partnership interest, represent the main company as "managing agents," so as to make service on an officer of the local corporation sufficient as against the foreign corporation. United States v. American Bell Teleph. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 18.

A person in charge of a branch office of a foreign corporation kept merely for the transfer of stock and for receiving assessments, without any other office or place of business in the state, is not such a managing agent. Reddington v. Mariposa Land & Min. Co. 19 Hun, 406.

The assistant secretary of a foreign railroad company, whose only duty shown to have been performed by him was the signing of some scrip certificates, is not such a managing agent. Sterett v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 17 Hun, 316.

In Brewster v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 5 How. Pr. 168, an agent of a foreign railroad company whose duties relate only to its passenger business, was assent to service upon its managing agent is implied. The general rule is thus stated by the Supreme Court of the United States, in St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 27 L. ed. 223. "The state may therefore impose, as a condition upon which a foreign corporation shall be permitted to do business within her limits, that it shall stipulate that, in any litigation arising out of its transactions in this state, it will accept as sufficient the service of process upon its agents or persons specially designated; and the condition would be eminently fit and just. And such condition and stipulation may be implied as well as expressed. If a state permits a foreign corporation to do business within her limits, and at the same time provides that, in suits held not to be a managing agent, and a distinction was made between a manager of a branch or department and of the whole business.

So in Doty v. Michigan Cent. R. Co., 8 Abb. Pr. 427, it was held that a mere ticket agent of a foreign railroad company, having no office in the state for the sale of tickets, and no part of its road in the state, is not "a managing agent" for the purpose of the service of process.

But these cases are not supported by later decisions.

In Palmer v. Pennsylvania Co., 35 Hun. 369, it is held that a freight agent in New York of a foreign railroad company is a "managing agent" within the meaning of such code provision, and the court says: "The statute is satisfied if he be a managing agent to any extent."

And in Tuchband v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 115 N. Y. 437, the court of appeals decided that a general agent of the passenger department of a foreign railroad company at its office within the state, where a substantial portion of its business is transacted, is a "managing agent" on whom service may be made, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 432, if there is within the state no president, treasurer, or secretary, or person designated for such purpose.

The superintendent and general managing agent of a foreign company operating a railroad within the state may be served with process, under N. Y. Code Proc., § 134. Bank of Commerce v. Rutland & W. R. Co. 10 How. Pr. 1.

A division superintendent may be served with process, in a suit against a foreign corporation for injuries received on his division, though in another state. Hills v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 37 Fed. Rep. 680.

The superintendent of the business of a nonresident railroad company at its office in the state may be served with process, although he resides in another state, in which he also has an office. Porter v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 1 Neb. 14.

One who has the management and control of a manufactory owned by a foreign corporation, and carries on the business within the state, is a "managing agent" within the meaning of a statute as to service of process on foreign corporations. Hatswell Mfg. Co. v. Davis Sewing Mach. Co. 31 Fed. Rep. 294.

An assignee of a foreign corporation engaged in the business out of which the suit arises may be served with process as a "managing agent," where the statute authorizes service on a managing agent. Estes v. Belford, 22 Fed. Rep. 275.

A managing agent of a foreign corporation may be served under Nebraska Code, § 912, although he is but temporarily within the state, where the suit is for a debt contracted in the state. Klopp v. Creston City Guarantee Water Works Co. 34 Neb. 808.

The managing agent at an office in the state of a against it for business there done, process shall be served upon its agents, the provision is to be deemed a condition of the permission; and corporations that subsequently do business in the state are to be deemed to assent to such condition as fully as though they had specially authorized their agents to receive service of the process." Thomas v. Placerville Gold Quartz Min. Co. 65 Cal. 600; Funk v. Anglo-American Ins. Co. 27 Fed. Rep. 336; Knapp v. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 607; Moch v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. 10 Fed. Rep. 696; Pringle v. Woolworth, 90 N. Y. 502; Pope v. Terre Haute Car & Mfg. Co. 87 N. Y. 187; Tuckband v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 115 N. Y. 437.

foreign corporation at which it transacts its business may be served for the corporation, under Nebraska Code, § 912. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Manning, 23 Neb. 558.

Service on a managing agent of a foreign corporation may be made, where the corporation has failed to designate a person on whom service may be made, as required by statute. Thomas v. Placerville Gold Quartz Min. Co. 65 Cal. 600.

One by whom, and under whose supervision, the business of a foreign company is managed, is a managing agent within the meaning of N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 432, subd. 3. Shackleton v. Wainwright 47 N. Y. S. R. 872.

In the case of domestic corporations the words "managing agent" have also been considered in several cases; and it is held that a division superintendent of a large and important division of a railroad remote from the general office of the company is such an agent. Brayton v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 72 Hun, 602; Rochester, H. & L. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 48 Hun, 190.

So is an insurance agent having charge of a New York city office of a company whose home office is at Utica. Bain v. Globe Ins. Co. 9 How. Pr. 443.

So is the general superintendent of a domestic telegraph company. Barrett v. American Teleph. & Telegr. Co. 56 Hun, 430.

But a mere clerk at the home office of a corporation is not a managing agent. Rutland v. Canfield Pub. Co. 18 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 283.

Neither is the baggage master at a railway station. Flynn v. Hudson River R. Co. 6 How. Pr. 308.

Neither is the assistant treasurer of a domestic corporation, although the treasurer is a nonresident. Winslow v. Staten Island Rapid Transit Co. 51 Hun, 298.

A decision on a conflict of evidences as to whether an alleged managing agent of a foreign corporation was in fact thus employed will not be reversed on appeal. Norton v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 97 Cal. 394.

Other agents.

One who has authority to sign for general agents of a foreign corporation by himself and to draw important papers and contracts for the company may be served under Wis. Rev. Stat., § 2337, subd. 11, as an agent "having charge of or conducting any business" for the foreign corporation. Burgess v. Aultman, 80 Wis. 232.

A person employed by a foreign mercantile agency to furnish information as to commercial standing of merchants and business men to be used by the company in its reports is an agent of the company for the service of process. Bradstreet Co. v. Gill, 2 L. R. A. 408, 72 Tex. 115.

Whether a person is thus employed or not is a question for the jury, if the evidence is conflicting. Ibid.

This brings us to the consideration of the second question: Were the parties upon whom the service of the summons in this case was made the managing agents of the defendant? The defendant, in support of its motion to vacate and set aside the judgment, read the affidavit of the president and secretary of said defendant. The material part of the affidavit of the president is as follows: "That on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1890, H. J. Benedict, Esq., assuming to act as the sheriff of said county of Grant, in the state of South Dakota, . . . did levy upon and take into his custody, as said sheriff, under said writ, a large quantity of lumber, lath, shingles, and other personal and real property of and belonging to the

An attorney of a foreign corporation employed in collection of claims and having jurisdiction of some of its property may be served with process for the company, if no other agent can be found, under Utah Laws, § 3208, subd. 5, authorizing service if no acknowledged agent can be found on "any person in its employ, or who has any of its property in charge." Saunders v. Sioux City Nursery & Seed Co. 6 Utah, 431.

But an attorney employed merely to aid in the collection of certain claims is not a local agent of a foreign corporation, under N. C. Code, § 217, making "any person receiving or collecting money" for a foreign corporation a local agent for that purpose. Moore v. Freeman's Nat. Bank, 92 N. C. 500.

If the officers and agents of a foreign corporation willfully conceal themselves to avoid service of an order to show cause why a corporation should not be adjudged guilty of contempt, service may be made upon the attorney of record for the corporation in the proceeding out of which the alleged contempt arises. Eureka Lake & Yuba Canal Co. v. Yuba County Super. Ct. 116 U. S. 410, 29 L. ed. 671.

A person acting as agent for a foreign corporation in matters relating to the loaning of money and receiving payments may be served with process for the company in an action to set aside a mortgage given for such a loan obtained through him. Taylor v. Granite State Provident Assn. 47 N. Y. S. R. 382.

The receiver and forwarder of advertisements to a foreign newspaper corporation is not an agent on whom process can be served. Mulhearn v. Press Pub. Co. 11 L. R. A. 101, 53 N. J. L. 153.

The fact that a foreign railroad company pays one half the expenses incurred in the maintenance and operation of a joint warehouse does not make an employé or agent in that warehouse, who is selected and approved by another company, to whom he gives bond and makes reports, "a local agent" of such foreign company within the meaning of the Texas statute authorizing service of process on the local agent of a foreign corporation. Mexican Cent. R. Co. Limited v. Pinkney, 149 U. S. 194, 37 L. ed. 690.

Process against a foreign corporation, which has no property, officer, or office for the transaction of business within the state, cannot be served on persons who are mere solicitors of business for the corporation, who occupy a room rented by the company. Fairbank v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 420.

A mere solicitor of passengers, with no authority to sell tickets, cannot be served with process for a foreign railroad company which has no office or place of business in the state, even if foreign corporations are within the provisions of a statute as to service on corporations having an office or said Charles Betcher Lumber Company, then and there being at and situate in Millbank, and also Big Stone City (each and both of said places are in the said county of Grant, and state of South Dakota), and which said personal and real property was then and there of great value, to wit, of the value of sixteen thousand ($16,000) dollars. . . . The said personal and real property of said Charles Betcher Lumber Company at said Big Stone City, in said county, was on said day of said levy in the charge of Albert Wihlborg, a hired employé of said corporation; and the said personal and real property of said Charles Betcher Lumber Company at said Millbank, the day of said levy, was in charge of said A. J. Fairchild, Esq., an employé of said corporation." The affidavit of the secretary is substantially the same. It will be noticed that the affidavits admit that the defendant was engaged in the lumber business at Millbank and Big Stone City; that the two persons named were in their employ, and inferentially had charge of defendant's business at the places named. It will be further noticed that it is not in terms denied that they were managing agents, but they are designated in the affidavits as "employés." It is nowhere stated in the affidavits that the defendants had any other agents or persons in charge of their business in this state. On the part of the plaintiff, a number of affidavits were read on the hearing two being made by the two agents on whom the agency within a county. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Walker, 9 Lea, 475.

A local ticket agent of a foreign railroad company is not a "general or special agent," within the meaning of the Michigan statute, but these words contemplate an agent who has a controlling authority in some matter either general or special. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hunt, 99 Mich. 470.

But one who sells tickets for a foreign railroad company may be served at his place of business, under Neb. Code, § 912, authorizing service on the person in charge of the office or usual place of business of such corporation, when none of the officers previously mentioned can be found within the county. Chicago, R. & Q. R. Co. v. Manning, 23 Neb. 552.

A foreign railroad corporation which forms a combination with other companies, one of which operates a railroad within the state, the combination having a duly authorized ticket agent acting on behalf of all the associate companies, is bound by service on such agent. VanDresser v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 48 Fed. Rep. 202.

A section foreman is a "local superintendent of repairs" within the meaning of Kan. Civ. Code, § 68a, on whom process may be served, if there is no other officer or person in the county on whom it can be served. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. DeFord, 38 Kan. 299.

Under Tex. Rev. Stat. 1879, art. 1223, service may be made on the local agent of a foreign corporation. Société Foncière et Agricole des États Unis v. Milliken, 135 U. S. 804, 34 L. ed. 208.

A local agent of a foreign corporation may be served with process in the county in which he has an agency, under Tex. Rev. Stat. 1879, art. 1198, exception 21. Angerhoefer v. Bradstreet Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 305.

Persons called distributing agents of a foreign corporation, to whom alone the corporation sells goods in that state, and who buy from the corporation exclusively, with certain provisions as to rebate from the established price in case they keep the contract in good faith, are not "agents" within the meaning of a statute authorizing service upon an agent of the foreign corporation. Gottschalk Co. of Baltimore City v. Distilling & Cattle Feeding T. Co. of Illinois, 50 Fed. Rep. 681.

Service on a local agent of a foreign railroad company, under Ind. Code, § 80, is valid only when the cause of action grows out of, or is connected with, the business of his agency. Ætna Ins. Co. v. Black, 80 Ind. 513.

Service on a traveling salesman for a foreign corporation which is not doing business in the state was held insufficient in a case referred to but not named in Block v. Atobison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 21 Fed. Rep. 520.

In Central Trust Co. of New York v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co., 40 Fed. Rep. 428, the federal court made 23 L. R. A.

an order allowing service of process from a state court on a station agent employed by a receiver of a railroad company, whose office was established in another state.

Service on a local agent of a foreign insurance company as prescribed by statute is sufficient. Walker v. Continental Ins. Co. of New York, 21 Utah, 331.

The Maryland act authorizing service upon any agent of a foreign corporation does not apply to a foreign insurance company which, by statute applicable especially to such companies, requires them to appoint agents for the purpose of receiving service of process and authorizing service on the insurance commissioner in case of the death or absence of the attorney so appointed. Oland v. Agricultural Ins. Co. of Watertown, 69 Md. 248.

And the provision of Indiana Rev. Stat. relating to foreign corporations in general have no application to service on a foreign insurance company, which is provided for by the Act of 1883. Behm v. German Ins. & Sav. Inst. of Quincy, 125 Ind. 185.

Any agent of an unlicensed foreign insurance company may be served with process for the company, under Wis. Rev. Stat., § 2337, includes any person who solicits insurance, transmits an application or a policy, makes a contract of insurance, collects premiums, or in any manner aids or assists in doing either, or in transacting any business for such company, or advertises to do any such thing. State v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 67 Wis. 624; State v. Minnesota Endowment & L. Assn. 62 Wis. 174.

The secretary of a local division of a foreign mutual insurance company, who is the medium for dealings between the members and the company, is an "agent" of the association under Wis. Rev. Stat., § 2337, subd. 9. Dixon v. Order of Railroad Conductors of America, 49 Fed. Rep. 910.

One who has power to take an application, deliver a policy, and collect a premium for a foreign insurance company, although he has no power to issue policies or adjust losses, may be served with process for the company as a local agent, under Tex. Rev. Stat., art. 1223. Southern Ins. Co. of New Orleans v. Wolverton Hardware Co. (Tex.) April 26, 1892.

A local secretary of a foreign accident association, who receives and transmits money to the association and does some other business on its account, may be served with process against the association as an agent, under the Indiana statute, where its chief officer is not found in the county. Reyer v. Odd Fellows Fraternal Acc. Assn. of America, 157 Mass. 367.

Under Miss. Code, §§ 1073, 1085, and 1087, while a foreign insurance company cannot do business without a resident agent who may be served with process, any person who collects and remits for another any premium due such company is such service of the summons and complaint was made. The material part of the affidavit of A. J. Fairchild is as follows: "A. J. Fairchild, being duly sworn, says that for the last past twenty-two months, and until the 1st day of December, 1890, and on that date, he was the duly authorized, acting, and managing agent, and the only agent, of Charles Betcher Lumber Company, the defendant in the above-entitled action, and also a foreign corporation, whose main office and principal place of business is in the city of Red Wing, in the state of Minnesota, at the city of Millbank, in the county of Grant, and state of South Dakota; that, as such agent, he had full charge of the business of said corporation at said city of Millbank, and was subject to no authority from any other person or agent in said state of South Dakota; that he accounted to said corporation, and received all instructions from the main office thereof, at said city of Red Wing, Minn.; that he conducted and managed the affairs and business of said corporation at said city of Millbank, and, in its behalf, he received and disbursed all moneys, sold lumber and merchandise, paid freight, made contracts and agreements with customers as to terms of payment of accounts, issued receipts for money for said corporation, as agent thereof, employed all necessary temporary assistance for said corporation, and transacted all of the business of said corporation at said city of Millbank." an agent. Sadler v. Mobile L. Ins. Co. 60 Miss. 391.

The fact that agents of a foreign insurance company, who are actually engaged in its business, have not given bond or been formally commissioned, will not prevent valid service on them of process against the company. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Williams, 79 Tex. 638.

A person acting as agent of a nonresident co-operative insurance company in receiving pay for assessments and delivering receipts of the company may be served with process in a suit against the company. Vorhies v. People's Mut. Ben. Soc. of Elkhart, Ind. 86 Mich. 81.

A local or branch secretary of a mutual benefit association who receives assessments from members and countersigns and delivers receipts, may be served with process, under Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, par. 4152, where the company has no other officer in the county on whom service can be had. South Western Mut. Ben. Asso. v. Swenson, 49 Kan. 449.

Prior to the Louisiana Act of 1877, relating to service on foreign insurance companies, such a company could not be sued by serving process on a local agent in a country town, when it had a general agent and a local board of directors in New Orleans. Weight v. Liverpool, L. & G. Ins. Co. 30 La. Ann. 1183.

An assistant manager of agencies for a mutual benefit association, who is sent out into another state to look up testimony in lawsuits and at times to look after local agents, investigate the facts and report to the general manager, cannot be served with process in a state in which he has no office or headquarters, under a statute authorizing suit on an agent employed in the general management of the office business, or an agent in charge of an office or agency in a county other than that in which the principal resides. Philip v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Asso. 62 Iowa, 638.

A mere volunteer who takes an application for insurance is not an agent of the company on whom service of process can be made in an action growing out of or connected with the business of an office or agency in a county other than that in which the principal resides. State Ins. Co. v. Waterhouse, 78 Iowa, 674.

Service on state officer

A foreign corporation doing business in a state will be presumed to have complied with the law requiring the designation of a person on whom process may be served, and where the designation of an officer of the state is required, service on him is at least prima facie sufficient. Knapp v. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 607.

Service on an insurance commissioner, as prescribed by statute, is sufficient as against a foreign insurance company that has appointed him agent for that purpose. O Osborne v. Shawmut Ins. Co. 51 Vt. 278.

The provision of Maine Rev. Stat., title 4, chap. 49, § 63, authorizing service of process against a foreign insurance company to be made on the insurance commissioner, applies only to companies doing business in the state. Hazeltine v. Mississippi Valley F. Ins. Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 748.

The individual name of the superintendent of insurance need not be stated in a certificate appointing him as the agent of a foreign insurance company for service of process. Laffin v. Travelers Ins. Co. 121 N. Y. 713.

The plaintiffs in an action against a foreign insurance company are not deprived of the benefit of the provision authorizing service of process upon the auditor of state because they happen to be the agents of the corporation. Behm v. German Ins. & Sav. Inst. of Quincy, 135 Ind. 135.

But an appointment of the superintendent of insurance as attorney for a foreign corporation for the purpose of service of process sent with an application for permission to do business in the state to insurance agents and brokers, who had proposed to procure the admission of the corporation into the state, is ineffectual, at least for the purpose of an action by such agents for services and expenditures, where the superintendent has refused to admit the company to the state, and the application has been withdrawn. Richardson v. Western Home Ins. Co. 39 N. Y. & S. R. 830.

Insurance effected by correspondence through the mails by a foreign corporation, having no place of business or agent in the state, is held not to constitute "doing business" in the state, within the meaning of a statute authorizing service upon the insurance commissioner for a foreign insurance company. Romaine v. Union Ins. Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 751.

Service on the deputy of the secretary of state is held in Lonkey v. Keyes Silver Min. Co., 17 L. R. A. 351, 21 Nev. 312, to be insufficient, under a statute authorizing service on the secretary of state, as agent of the corporation.

But in South. Pub. Co. v. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia, 67 Hun. 41, the clerk of the superintendent of insurance, who was specially designated by him for the purpose, was held his representative to receive service for a foreign insurance company, where the superintendent had been appointed to receive and accept service, and himself gave a written admission of service.

Service of summons by mail on the superintendent of insurance of which he makes a written admission was held insufficient by the circuit court of the United States in Farmer v. National L. Asso. of Hartford, Conn., 50 Fed. Rep. 829, 28 Abb. N. C. 421, under New York Laws 1884, chap. 846, § 1, authorizing service on him in a suit against a foreign

Albert Wihlborg, the agent at Big Stone City, was more full and specific as to the nature of the agency, but we will insert only a few paragraphs of the same: "Affiant further states, on oath, that at the instance, and by and with the consent and instructions, of the said Charles Betcher Lumber Company, he inserted in a certain newspaper, the Western Wave, published at said city of Big Stone City, an advertisement of the business of the said Charles Betcher Lumber Company, including the name of affiant as agent thereof; . . . that affiant had full power and authority to hire laborers as he deemed best from time to time, to make contracts with them for the amount of their hire, and to pay the same, and that affiant had power and authority from the said Charles Betcher Lumber Company to bring suits in the name of said Charles Betcher Lumber Company whenever he deemed the same to be necessary for the protection of the interests of said corporation, to engage attorneys for the prosecution of said suits, and to settle and adjust the claims upon which such suits were based; . . . that affiant at all times during his connection with the said Charles Betcher Lumber Company, at the city of Big Stone City [has been], held out to be, and has been, and has been authorized by the said Charles Betcher Lumber Company to hold himself out to be, the sole agent of the said corporation at the city of Big Stone City, for the general transaction of its business in all its insurance company which has appointed him its attorney on whom process "may be served" with the same effect as if the company or association existed in this state.

This was in a case removed from a state court. But on the same state of facts and apparently in the identical case (though how it came back into the state court does not appear) it was subsequently held by the general term of the supreme court in New York that written admission of service by the superintendent of insurance in New York, who has been appointed an attorney to receive service for the foreign insurance company, constitutes a sufficient service, although the summons was sent him by mail. Farmer v. National L. Asso. of Hartford, Conn. 67 Hun. 119.

The refusal of the insurance commissioner to receive process against a foreign insurance company, which he has power to receive, will not prevent such attempted service from being effectual. Knapp v. National Mut. F. Ins. Co. 30 Fed. Rep. 607.

Although a summons in an action in the city court of New York cannot ordinarily be served outside of the city, an implied exception is made in respect to service on a foreign insurance company by the statute authorizing service upon the superintendent of insurance, and he may be served at his office in Albany. People v. New York City Ct. Justices, 33 N. Y. S. R. 147.

Summons served on the superintendent of insurance in Kansas in a suit against a foreign insurance company must be directed to the superintendent, but otherwise the same in form as a summons in other cases. Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Coverdale, 48 Kan. 446.

Admission of service.

An agent of a foreign corporation who may be served with process may acknowledge service. Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, P. & M. R. Co. 51 Ga. 458.

Service on a foreign corporation accepted by its attorney, who had been appointed in pursuance of statute as one upon whom process against it might be served, is sufficient. Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 149 Mass. 24. See also supra, Farmer v. National L. Asso. of Hartford, Conn.

Return of service.

A return of service on a "state agent" of a foreign insurance company sufficiently shows that he is the person appointed, under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 6013. Stone v. Travelers Ins. Co. 78 Mo. 655.

Where the statute authorizes service upon an agent "in charge of any office or place of business" of the corporation, the return of service must show that the agent served was in charge of such office or place of business. Klufeke v. Merchants Dispatch Transp. Co. 3 McCrary, 547. 23 L. R. A.

The return of service on a person named is insufficient as against a corporation, if it fails to connect him with the corporation. Willamette Falls Canal Mill & Transp. Co. v. Williams, 1 Or. 112.

The return of service on "one of the agents" of a foreign insurance company is insufficient to show service on an agent designated by the company to acknowledge or receive service, as the statute contemplates the designation of but one such agent. Gates v. Tusten, 89 Mo. 18.

The return of service on a person named as "lawful attorney" of a foreign corporation sufficiently states that he was appointed as attorney to receive process. Webster Wagon Co. v. Home Ins. Co. 27 W. Va. 814.

The return of service stating that it was made on a person named "as president" does not sufficiently state the fact as to the character of the person served. Illinois & M. Teleg. Co. v. Kennedy, 24 Ill. 319; Michigan State Ins. Co. v. Abens, 3 Ill. App. 488.

But the return of service on a person named, with the words "secretary of" the corporation added to his name, sufficiently shows that he is its secretary. Benwood Iron Works v. Hutchinson, 101 Pa. 359.

A return of service upon a "ticket agent and general agent" of a railroad company is insufficient, under Ohio Rev. Stat., § 5044, to show service upon "any regular ticket or freight agent." Tallman v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 154.

The return of service on an agent of a foreign corporation is not conclusive as to the fact of his agency. Mineral Point R. Co. v. Keep, 23 Ill. 2, 74 Am. Dec. 124.

A return of service on a person named, reciting that he is authorized "to acknowledge service" is not insufficient as failing to show that he received it, where the statute authorizes him to "acknowledge or receive service." Swallow v. Duncan, 18 Mo. App. 622.

In garnishment cases.

An attorney appointed to receive service in "actions upon any liability or indebtedness incurred or contracted" by the company, under Mich. Comp. Laws, § 1624, cannot be served in a garnishment proceeding. Moore v. Speed, 55 Mich. 84.

A resident agent of a foreign mining company, whose duties consist in acting as custodian of property in the county where its mining is done and inspecting work of contractors in that county, may be served in garnishment proceedings against the corporation, under How. Stat. (Mich.) § 5083, as amended in 1889, authorizing service "upon the president . . . the general agent, or such other officer as the corporation may appoint or the court direct." The agent served need not be a general agent. Shafer Iron Co. v. Stone, 86 Mich. 444.

Garnishment of the chief or managing agent of a foreign corporation doing business in the state details; that at no time during affiant's connection with the said Charles Betcher Lumber Company has any person or persons in the state of South Dakota had or executed any authority or superintendency over him in his connection with the business of said corporation at the city of Big Stone City, and that he was, up to and including the said 1st day of December, 1890, the sole agent of said corporation at said Big Stone City, as aforesaid, and not otherwise; that affiant, as such agent, received from said corporation an annual salary." It was also shown that from August 8th to the 17th day of October, 1889, the said Fairchild had an advertisement published in the Grant County Review, a newspaper published in said county, as follows: "Chas. Betcher Lumber Co. A. J. Fairchild, Manager. . . . Office and Yards, Third Av. and Second Street, Millbank, South Dakota." It was also shown that from May, 1890, to January 15, 1891, the following advertisement was published in the Western Wave, a newspaper published in said Grant county: "Charles Betcher Lumber Company. . . . Albert Wihlborg, Manager." It was also shown that said Wihlborg had filed several mechanics' liens on behalf of said defendant, and as the agent of said company, some of which he had settled and released as such agent.

While the term "managing agent" has no strict legal definition, and it is not easy to may be upheld, under Missouri statutes, authorizing garnishment of corporations by service on such an agent. The statute applies to foreign corporations. McAllister v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co. 28 Mo. 214.

A foreign corporation doing business in the state is subject to garnishment by service on its agent. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Crane, 102 Ill. 249, 40 Am. Rep. 581.

A foreign corporation is subject to garnishment in a state in which it owns property, or in which the cause of action arose. Brauser v. New England F. Ins. Co. 21 Wis. 507.

In Bushel v. Commonwealth Ins. Co. 15 Serg. & R. 176, a foreign corporation was held subject to garnishment, and it was said that a foreign corporation was not exempt from suit, but that the difficulty as to suits against such corporations arose from the fact that there was no person within the limits of the state on whom process could be served.

A corporation qualified to do business in the state by compliance with its statutes is subject to garnishment there. Barr v. King, 96 Pa. 485.

A foreign railroad corporation, accepting the privilege of extending its road into the state on condition of keeping a resident manager or officer on whom process may be served, is subject to garnishment in the state. Fithian v. New York & E. R. Co. 31 Pa. 114.

But in Dawson v. Campbell, 2 Miles (Pa.) 171, it was held that a bank incorporated in another state could not be garnished by service on its president while he was passing through the state.

The agent of a foreign insurance company for South Carolina and Florida, who resides in Georgia, in which state the company does no business, cannot be served in Georgia in proceedings of garnishment or attachment. Schmidlapp v. La Confiance Ins. Co. 71 Ga. 246.

Serving process of federal court.

A circuit court of the United States may take jurisdiction of a suit brought against a foreign corporation by service of process upon an agent of the company whom it has designated for that purpose as a condition of doing business in the state, if the other requisites of jurisdiction exist, as by such appointment the company consents to be found within the state. Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 509, 24 L. ed. 853; Wotherspoon v. Massachusetts Ben. Assn. 38 Fed. Rep. 625; Eaton v. St. Louis Shakespear Min. & Smelting Co. 2 McCrary, 362; Albright v. Empire Transp. Co. 18 Alb. L. Rep. 294; Gray v. Quicksilver Min. Co. 21 Fed. Rep. 238; Hussey Mfg. Co. v. Deering, 20 Fed. Rep. 705.

The same is true of the appointment of an agent 23 L. R. A.

in the District of Columbia in order to be allowed under act of congress to extend business into that District. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 65, 30 L. ed. 354.

Ex parte Schollenberger, supra, expressly overrules the cases of Day v. Newark India Rubber Mfr. Co. 1 Blatchf. 623, Pomeroy v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 4 Blatchf. 120, and Stillwell v. Empire F. Ins. Co., 4 Cent. L. J. 463, and also overrules, without mentioning it, the case of Hume v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co., 8 Biss. 31.

A corporation whose sole place of business is in New York, where all its directors and corporators reside, although it was organized under the laws of Colorado, may be sued in a circuit court of the United States by service on its officers in New York. Hunter v. International Railway Imp. Co. 26 Fed. Rep. 299.

Service of process in a suit in a circuit court of the United States against a foreign corporation, under the provisions of a state statute requiring service on one of certain officers, if any such is within the county, must be made on such an officer if he is within the district or territorial limits of the court's jurisdiction. Lung Chung v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 19 Fed. Rep. 254; Miller v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 431.

Where the cause of action did not arise within the state so as to authorize service of process upon an agent of a foreign corporation under a state statute, it was held that the corporation was not found within the district for the purpose of suit in a federal court merely because it had a passenger agent there whose sole duty it was to solicit travel, but without authority to sell tickets. Maxwell v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 34 Fed. Rep. 236.

A foreign corporation not engaged in business in the state is not "found" there for the purpose of service of process of the federal court, because its president is temporarily there on behalf of the corporation. Good Hope Co. v. Railway Barb Fencing Co. 22 Fed. Rep. 635; St. Louis Wire-Mill Co. v. Consolidated Barb Wire Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 802.

Nor because its officers have run a train into the state for mere exhibition and advertising. Carpenter v. Westinghouse Air Brake Co. 32 Fed. Rep. 434.

As to the residence or citizenship of a corporation for the purpose of federal jurisdiction in a state other than that of its creation, see note to Stephens v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (C. C. W. D. Ark.) 14 L. R. A. 184.

English cases.

Where a foreign corporation is actually carrying on business at an office in that country, it may be sued in an English court, and the service of the writ of summons on the head officer at the place of business in England is good service on the corporation, under Order LX. r. 8. Haggin v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris, L. J. 167.

formulate or lay down a general rule that will govern all cases, yet we are of the opinion that the facts in this case show that both Fairchild and Wihlborg were "managing agents," within the meaning of the statute. The latest and perhaps the most satisfactory definition of a managing agent is that laid down by the court of appeals of New York in Tuchband v. Chicago & A. R. Co., supra. The court says: "(2) Whether Oberg, within the meaning of the Code [supra], was the 'managing agent.' The defendant like other railroad corporations, necessarily has not only directors, a treasurer, and secretary, but other officers and agents. By these persons, or, under their direction, by others, the business of the company is conducted. From the very nature of a body corporate, service of process cannot be personal, and at common law it was made by serving it on a proper officer; so that it might come to the knowledge of the company, and then further proceedings by distress. 1 Tidd, Pr. 121. Under the statute [supra] the same object was in view; and when the corporation has an office in this state where a substantial portion of its business is transacted by a person designated by itself as a 'general agent,' although followed by words indicating some one department, it may safely be assumed that the object of the statute will be accomplished. It, of course, intends a managing agent in this state; and, where a corporation created by the laws of any other state does business in this state, the person who, as its agent, does that business, should be considered its managing agent; and more especially should that be so where the foreign corporation has an office or place of business in this state, and when that office is in charge of that person, and he there acts for the corporation. He is there doing business for it, and so manages its business. Such person is, in every sense of the words used in the statute, a managing agent. . . . So far as the cases cited by the appellant hold a contrary doctrine, they cannot be approved. To limit service by requiring the person served, in case of an action against a railroad corporation, to be one who controls 'the general and practical operations and business of running the road,' would so restrict the meaning of the statute as to render it useless. Such an agent would naturally find his occupation and engagement in the state where the road was domiciled or operated; and if his incidental presence in this state subjected him to process, as representing the corporation, it cannot be supposed that the legislature intended to confine the remedy to him alone." The case of American Exp. Co. v. Johnson, 17 Ohio St. 641, is directly in point, and the law is so clearly stated that we quote the decision in full: "By the Court. The plaintiff, who was defendant in the original action, is a foreign corporation, and the principal ground of error relied upon is the alleged insufficiency of the service of the original summons. At the time of service the company had a general 'superintendent' for the state, residing at Cleveland, and two or more 'local agents' in the county of Madison, one of whom resided in London, in said county, and kept an office there, Service may be made on the head officer of a foreign corporation at its place of business in England, under Order IX, r. 8. Haggin v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 519.

The manager of the London agency of a foreign bank, which does banking business in London, may be served for the company as "its head officer." Lhoneux v. Hong Kong & S. Banking Corp. L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 446.

But the agent of an American hotel company, which has an English agent and office merely for convenience of dealing with its shares which are mostly owned in England, cannot be served with process for the company as a "head officer." Babcock v. Cumberland Gap Park Co. [1898] 1 Ch. 362.

But an American corporation having a branch office and place of business in which it carries on its operations in England, may be sued there by service on its resident agent, distinguishing this case from one in which a foreign corporation has a mere agency, and not a branch office or place of business in England. Newby v. Van Oppen & Colts Mfg. Co. L. R. 7 Q. B. 268, 41 L. J. Q. B. 148, 28 L. T. N. S. 184, 20 Week. Rep. 383.

A London agent of a company having head offices in Paris, Bordeaux, and Marseilles, was held not to be the head officer, clerk, secretary, or treasurer of the company, within the meaning of Order IX, r. 8, relating to service on corporations. Nutter v. Messageries Maritimes de France, 54 L. J. Q. B. 527.

A foreign corporation is held not to be within the provisions of §§ 18 and 19 of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, relating to service on persons out of the jurisdiction. Ingate v. Austrian Lloyd's Co. 4 C. B. N. S. 704, 27 L. J. C. P. 823, 4 Jur. N. S. 975.

As the clear language of the rules does not allow Scotchmen or Irishmen domiciled in their native country to be sued in England, a corporation which has its registered office in Scotland, though it does business also in England, cannot be served in England. Watkins v. Scottish Imperial Ins. Co. L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 235.

So a Scottish accident insurance company registered in Scotland is not suable in England, because of an agency there. Jones v. Scottish Acc. Ins. Co. L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 421, 55 L. J. Q. B. 415, 55 L. T. N. S. 218.

The manager of an English branch of a Scotch corporation cannot be served with process for the company, where the companies act under which the corporation was registered requires summons to be served at its "registered office." Wood v. Anderston Foundry Co. 36 Week. Rep. 918.

A Scotch railroad company, whose charter under act of parliament includes the English companies clauses act so far as necessary to permit the operation of a few miles of road in England, was held to have its "principal office" for the purpose of serving process in Scotland only, and that its English incorporation was for a limited purpose and insufficient to justify service in England. Palmer v. Caledonian R. Co. [1892] 1 Q. B. 823, reversing [1892] 1 Q. B. 607. This decision seems to overrule that of Wilson v. Caledonian R. Co., 5 Exch. 822, 6 Ry. Cas. 772, 1 L. M. & P. 731, 20 L. J. Exch. 6, 15 Jur. 17, in which service on the secretary of such company while temporarily in London at a meeting of shareholders was held good.

A booking clerk or ticket agent of a Scotch railroad company, which runs for a few miles over an English road cannot be served as the "head officer" of the company, under the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, § 16, although he is the one officer resident in England. Mackereth v. Glasgow & W. R. Co. L. R. 8 Exch. 149. B. A. R.

where he received and forwarded packages for the company, and did all the business of the company usually transacted in such receiving and forwarding offices. Service was made upon the said agent at London alone; and the question is, whether he was the 'managing agent' of the company, within the meaning of the sixty-eighth section of the Code? We think he was such managing agent, and that the service was sufficient." In McAllister v. Pennsylvania Ins. Co., 28 Mo. 214, the court says: "It would seem to be a reasonable interpretation of the language of the twenty-sixth section of the Attachment Law that an agent of a foreign insurance company located here, and doing business under this Law of 1855, should be deemed a 'managing officer' of such corporation for all the purposes of an attachment or garnishment. Such agents do in fact represent the corporation here, although, in the foreign country where the corporation has been chartered and its chief place of business is, there is another chief officer of such corporation. We are not aware of any principle of public policy which could induce the legislature designedly to discriminate between domestic insurance companies and these agencies of foreign insurance companies which they have allowed to transact business here with all the privileges of domestic corporations, so as to exempt the latter from liability to a process to which the former is undoubtedly liable." White Lake Lumber Co. v. Stone, 19 Neb. 402. The case of Tuchband v. Chicago & A. R. Co., supra, shows that the principles laid down in some of the earlier cases in New York, cited by appellant's counsel, are in effect overruled. As showing what agents are not regarded as managing agents, we quote briefly from Reddington v. Mariposa Land & Min. Co., 19 Hun. 405: "Hence arises the material question upon this appeal, viz., whether Brumagim can be regarded a 'managing agent' of the corporation, within the meaning of said statute, so as to authorize the service upon him of a summons, in order to commence an action in this state. The duties which were assigned to Brumagim by the company were restricted in regard to their nature and extent, and the performance of such duties was subject to the direction and control of the company. We do not perceive that any exercise of independent judgment was confided to him, and he seems to have acted entirely in a subordinate capacity. . . . It is quite clear that the legislature attached importance to the term 'managing agent,' and employed it to distinguish a person who should be invested with general power, involving the exercise of judgment and discretion, from an ordinary agent or employé, who acted in an inferior capacity, and under the direction and control of superior authority, both in regard to the extent of the work and the manner of executing the same. The distinction thus attempted to be drawn we deem reasonable, and in harmony with the obvious purpose of the statute in regard to the service of process upon a foreign corporation. It would, indeed, be a great hardship to allow actions to be commenced against foreign corporations by the service of a summons upon an inferior agent or servant, who by reason of ignorance or heedlessness, would be quite likely not to apprehend the purpose of such service, and therefore neglect the same." In the latter case, Brumagim was simply employed in the city of New York as transfer agent of the defendant's stock, and was authorized to collect assessments, and remit them to the company. In the former case, decided by the court of appeals some ten years later, Öberg, the agent, was described in the company's time table as "General Agent, Passenger Department, 261 Broadway, N. Y." He had nothing to do with the freight department, but he occupied an office over which was the sign "Chicago & Alton R. R.," etc., which, as the court says, indicated that the office was a general office, for the transaction of railroad business connected with the defendant's line in that city. It seems to us that the facts in the case at bar clearly bring the agents within the principle of the case in 115 N. Y. Fairchild had charge of the entire business of the defendant at Millbank, paid freights, made contracts, hired and discharged men, and held himself out to the public and advertised himself as manager. He exercised, in all the business of the defendant at that point, discretionary powers and independent judgment. He was subject only to the control of the company, with which he corresponded directly. The defendant had an office and lumber yard entirely under the control of Fairchild, subject, of course, as are all managing agents, to the control of the corporation. The same may be said of Whilborg, at Big Stone City. He occupied a place of business, where the lumber of the defendant was sold and dealt in, under his sole charge; and he held himself out and advertised himself, under instructions of the defendant, as manager. He, too, exercised discretion and an independent judgment in the management of the business, and received, as such manager, an annual salary. Neither of these agents occupied the position of "inferior agents" or "servants," in the ordinary sense in which these terms are used, or were used by the court in the cases quoted from, 19 Hun. We have examined all the authorities cited by counsel for the appellant to which we have access, but they were, in nearly all cases, decided under provisions of statutes so dissimilar to our own, or the agent's powers were so limited as to afford us but little aid in deciding the question before us. Our conclusions are that the learned circuit court was clearly right in denying the appellant's motion to set aside and vacate the judgment rendered in this case, and that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

The order of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

OMAHA & REPUBLICAN VALLEY R.
CO., Plff. in Err.,

v.

Bernard CLARKE.

(65 Neb. 887.)

1. In an action against a railway company for negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully blowing off steam from its engine, whereby the plaintiff's horses were frightened and ran away, breaking his leg, etc.,—Held, that the words employed implied that steam was blown off needlessly and unnecessarily, and, as no objection had been made to the petition by demurrer, it was sufficient after demurrer.

2. A railway company, in the legitimate transaction of its business, has the right to use steam, and is not liable for the proper and necessary use of the same, even if it result in injury to others, as by frightening horses and causing them to run away. If, however, an engineer, within a city where teams are constantly passing, needlessly and unnecessarily opens the valves of his engine and frightens such horses, and causes them to run away and commit injury, the company will be liable, provided the plaintiff is free from contributory negligence.

3. There being testimony which would warrant the jury in finding a verdict against the defendant, it was properly submitted to them, and the court did not err in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant.

On rehearing.

4. In order to render a railroad company liable for injuries caused by horses running away in consequence of fright caused by steam escaping from the valves of an engine, it must appear, not only that the opening of the valves was unnecessary, but also that it was done under such circumstances as to imply a failure to exercise that care which a prudent and reasonable man would exercise under similar circumstances.

5. While negligence is an inference to be drawn from the facts, the existence of the facts themselves must not be left to conjecture, but facts must be established by evidence which would warrant a reasonable man in inferring negligence.

6. The evidence in this case re-examined, and held insufficient to sustain the verdict.

ERROR to the District Court for Madison County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been

*Headnotes by MAXWELL, Ch. J.

†Rehearing headnotes by IRVING, C.

NOTE.—The liability of a railroad company in respect to frightening horses by blowing off steam while a locomotive is standing in or near a street is shown by the above case, which though deciding no new principle, illustrates the subject very clearly.

As to liability for blowing whistle even when the signal is required by statute, see Butler v. Camden & A. R. Co. (N. J.) ante, 283.

caused by the defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. M. Thurston, W. R. Kelly, and E. P. Smith for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. F. P. Wigton and E. F. Gray for defendant in error.

Maxwell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error to recover for personal injuries, and on the trial the jury returned a verdict in his favor for the sum of $4,835, upon which judgment was rendered. The questions presented are many of them new to this court. The cause of action is set forth in the petition as follows: "That, at the time of the committing of the wrongs and injuries hereinafter complained of, the said defendant was, and still is, a corporation duly incorporated and organized under and pursuant to the laws of the state of Nebraska, and then and ever since owned and operated with its locomotive and cars a railroad leading from Columbus, in Platte county, Neb., to and through the city of Norfolk, in Madison county, Neb. That, at said time of the committing of the wrongs and injuries hereinafter mentioned, said city of Norfolk was a city of the second class, compactly built up, of the population of 5,000 inhabitants, and then had, and long prior and ever since has had, a street named 'Norfolk Avenue,' and also called 'Main Street,' passing through said city in its most central and business portion, and running east and west, which said street then was, long had been, and still is the principal street, roadway, and thoroughfare of said city. That at said time of the committing of the wrongs and injuries hereinafter complained of the defendant's said railroad and its side tracks crossed the said principal street, roadway, and thoroughfare, in the central and most public business portion of said city, running north and south. That, at said time of the committing of the wrongs and injuries hereinafter complained of, the said defendant, by its servants and agents, negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully stopped, left, and permitted its locomotive engines to stand and remain headed south for a long time, viz., for the space of twenty minutes, on its side track, at the north margin of said principal street, at the point of the said crossing of the same by said railroad and side tracks, and at the same time negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully omitted and neglected to have at said crossing any flagman or person to give warning. That on the 13th day of August, 1888, the said plaintiff was engaged in hauling dirt, with his team of horses and wagon, upon said principal street, roadway, and thoroughfare in said city, to grade the same and other streets, and necessarily had to pass and repass over the said crossing of the same by said railroad and side tracks with his said team and wagon; and having unloaded his said wagon of dirt in one of the said streets, and the plaintiff then standing upon the dirt bed or planking floor of his wagon, necessarily, without any negligence, wrong, default, or want of due care on his part, drove his said team of horses and wagon west in the center of said principal street, roadway, and thoroughfare to pass over said crossing, when, as plaintiff had so driven his team upon said crossing, in the center of said principal street in front of said locomotive engine, and about fifty feet from it, so left standing as aforesaid, the said defendant, by its servants in charge of its said locomotive engine, negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully, suddenly, and without warning to the plaintiff, let off and discharged steam from said locomotive engine, and from the cylinders thereof, in great volume, noise, and hissing sound, by means of which, and the several negligent, wrongful, and unlawful acts, omissions, and defaults of the defendant, its servants and agents, above stated, the said team of horses took fright, became unmanageable, ran away, and threw the plaintiff off from said wagon, down under the same, and ran said wagon, and the wheels thereof, over him, whereby he was greatly injured, his right leg, between the knee and ankle, was crushed, and both bones thereof broken in several places, and mashed into several pieces, the thigh of the same leg was bruised and injured, his left leg and thigh and ankle were bruised and injured, his head was cut and bruised, and he was otherwise bruised and injured, from which injuries he became and was, from thence hitherto, sick, sore, and crippled, and unable to carry on his usual work and business, and from which injuries he has, from thence hitherto, suffered great pain and anguish, and from which injuries he is permanently crippled and injured, and will continue to suffer pain and anguish for the remainder of his life; and that he has necessarily incurred, expended, and paid out for surgical and medical attendance, medicine, and nursing, in endeavoring to be cured of said injuries, the amount of $325, and that the plaintiff's entire damages in the premises are $10,000." To this petition the railway company made answer, in substance, denying that its employes wrongfully, negligently, and unlawfully permitted its engine to stand on the track at the point indicated, or that there was no watchman at the crossing named; denies that the plaintiff was driving in the streets, and that the locomotive in question, suddenly, without warning, let off steam from the cylinders; with other special denials, which need not be noticed. It will thus be seen that the question of negligence of the company, and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff below, were fairly presented to the jury.

It is insisted with great earnestness on behalf of the plaintiff in error that the petition fails to allege actionable negligence, and we are referred to the case of Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Loree, 4 Neb. 446. In that case it was held, in effect, that there was a failure to allege that the arrangement of material on the cars was unusual and unnecessary in the legitimate transaction of the business of the company. It was also held, in effect, that the words "scarecrow," "horrid," and "frightful appearance," without stating in what respect, were not sufficient to raise an issue upon, and therefore, taking the whole petition together, it failed to state any dereliction of duty on the part of the company; and in our view the decision is correct. The petition in this case, however, charges that the railway crosses one of the principal streets of the city; that no flagman was placed there; that the plaintiff below, without notice or knowledge of the presence of the engine, drove to the center of the street to pass over the railway, and about fifty feet in front of a locomotive, when the person in charge thereof, "negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully, suddenly, and without warning to the plaintiff, let off and discharged steam from said locomotive engine, and from the cylinders thereof, in great volume, noise, and hissing sound," etc., by means whereof his horses were frightened and ran away. If steam was blown off "negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully," then it was unnecessary, and in violation of its duty. Had any question been raised upon the petition, a demurrer should have been interposed, and its legal effect determined, before going to trial. This was not done, but its sufficiency, in effect, is conceded; and, liberally construed, it states a cause of action. In saying this, we are not to be understood as deciding that where the cylinder cocks are opened, and steam necessarily blown off, and horses frightened thereby, the company is liable for the damages. Hahn v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 51 Cal. 605; Beatty v. Central Iowa R. Co. 58 Iowa, 242; Abbot v. Kalbus, 74 Wis. 504. In the case last cited, it is said, in effect, that the evidence did not show that the locomotive made any other than the usual noises, and all the cases cited by the plaintiff in error are to the same effect.

But it is said that, even if the law is as contended by the defendant in error, still there is no evidence in support of the charge.

One George R. Latimer, a civil engineer, called as a witness by the plaintiff below, testified that he was about 600 feet away from the engine at the time of the occurrence; that his attention was called to the scene of the accident by the escape of steam. "Question. You may state what attracted your attention, and what you saw. Answer. Well, I think there was several of us there together, and a remark something like this was made.—I think that the remark was made by some of us,—that that engine was making an unusual amount of noise. That was about the remark. Q. A remark was made by some one in regard to the engine? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you look up then to see? What did you do when that remark was made? A. I turned around, and saw a team running away. Q. You remember looking around, and seeing a team running away? Whose team was that? A. I learned afterwards that it was Mr. Clarke's team. Q. Bernard Clarke, the plaintiff? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you see the man that was hurt? A. Yes, sir. Q. State whether or not he was the same man that was driving that team. A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, you may state whether or not that was Bernard Clarke, the plaintiff. A. Yes, sir. Q. It was? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, as you looked up and saw this team running away, did you see an engine near to the team? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where, as you looked up, was the team and was the engine? Where was the team,—what part of the street or that crossing,—that railroad crossing? A. Well, it was just near the crossing, just on the crossing, or coming to the crossing going west. Q. Just on the crossing, or just coming to the crossing? A. Yes, sir; the team. Q. Now, where was the team with reference to the middle of the street? A. It was very near the middle of the street. Q. Now, where was this engine that you saw, with reference to the team? A. It was north of the street. Q. Now, how near to the north. That street runs east and west? A. Yes, sir. Q. And the railroad tracks run north and south, or nearly so? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, where was the engine, with reference to the north margin of the street? A. Well, it was very close. It was not very far away. It was not very far from the street." On the cross examination he testified: "Q. 'Which direction was you looking at that particular time? A. Well, my recollection is that I was facing a little bit northwest. Q. Well now, what were you looking at at the time, or just before, you heard the noise that you have testified to, and what were you doing? A. I was looking at the winding up the tape. Q. You was looking at the tape, was you not? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who was with you there? A. I don't remember who the parties were. Q. Do you remember who they were, or how many there were? A. I think that there was two. Q. Well, now, what do you remember as to buildings on that side of the street where you were, between you and the Elkhorn Valley track and the U. P. tracks? A. Well, my recollection is that there was this building that we have been speaking of,—the Gravel grocery. That is my recollection of it. Q. Do you remember of any other buildings along there? A. I don't call to mind just now. There may have been a house. Q. What grocery did you call that? A. I think it is called the 'Gravel Grocery.' There may have been a residence or two there, also. Q. Well, now, while you was winding up this tape, and paying attention to the tape, what was it that first called your attention to the runaway team? A. Well, I think it was the noise of the steam that I heard. Q. Well, now, did you hear steam any more after you observed the runaway? A. I don't remember of hearing any noise after the team was excited, at that time that I looked around, and saw both of them. Q. You was in the habit of passing up and down that street frequently? A. Yes, sir. Q. And was in the habit of seeing trains and engines passing over this particular street? A. Yes, sir. Q. As you came to and from your place of residence? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had you not frequently heard these engines letting off steam and making a noise? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was there anything particular about this noise which called your attention, more than any ordinary noise that happens as you go up and down that street when you have heard other engines letting off steam? A. I presume, probably, that I have heard the noise before and since."

Mr. Phillips, a carpenter, testifies that he was at work on the roof of a story and a half building about one block from the engine at the time of the accident, and saw what transpired. "Question. You may state what you saw and heard with reference to the engine at the time that you saw the team. Answer. Well, I heard an unusual amount of steam. That is what attracted my attention. That is the reason that I looked that way,—and the same time I saw the team. Q. State whether you saw the team or not. A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did the steam escape from? A. I think that the engine was going off at the time,—and also escaping from the cylinder cocks. Q. In referring to the cylinder cocks, what part of the engine do you refer to? A. The steam chest. Q. You mean down on the sides of the engine? A. Yes, sir. Whereabouts is that, with reference to the front trucks? A. It is right over the front trucks. Q. And about how high up are these steam cylinders? A. Just about a couple of feet. Q. What kind of a sound was this escaping steam? A. It was a hissing sound, the same as steam escaping. Q. Now, what was it that first attracted your attention, and caused you to look that way? A. It was the noise of the steam. Q. When you first looked up, on your attention being so attracted, was that the time you spoke of as first seeing the team? A. Yes, sir. Q. After you first looked up, and first saw the team, what was the team doing then,—where were they? Just state what the team was doing, and what the driver was doing. State all the facts, as you first looked up. A. Well, the team was running. It had started to run. It was under pretty good headway. Q. Did you notice it when it had started to run? A. No, sir; I did not. Q. It was running when you looked up and saw it? A. Yes, sir. Q. State whether it went faster after you first looked up. A. Yes, sir; it went faster afterwards. Q. Well, now, about the driver. Did you notice that he was holding onto the lines when you first looked up? A. Yes, sir; he was on the wagon, holding onto the lines. Q. Did you notice his position on the wagon? A. I think that he was sitting down. Q. When you first looked up and saw the team, as you spoke of a little while ago, what was its position? I want to locate its position when you first looked up and saw the team. Where was it, with reference to the front of the engine? A. It was between me and the engine, and a little west. Q. Of what? A. When I first looked up to see, it was a little bit west of the engine,—probably the length of the wagon west of the engine. Q. It was a length of the wagon west of the engine, then? A. Yes, sir; when I first noticed it. Q. How long did that engine keep letting off steam from the cylinder cocks, so far as you noticed it at that time? A. I did not pay any more attention to the engine. I kept my eye on the team a while after they passed by where I was at work. Q. Did you notice, by hearing or seeing, whether the steam kept on blowing, or let up? A. I could not say about that."

The plaintiff below testifies: "Answer. I drove carefully up to within about 100 feet of the crossing. Then I tightened on the lines and braced myself up. I did not know but what the engine might move, and I prepared myself for any emergency that might take place, the best I could. Question. Did you still remain standing? Was you standing? A. Yes, sir. Q. That was within about 100 feet of the crossing? A. Yes, sir. Q. What occurred then? A. I went on slowly. I could not tell whether I was trotting or walking. I could not tell which, as I was on the crossing and entering on the track in front of the engine. The engine blew off steam,—a loud, hissing noise. Q. At that time was you still standing up? A. When the engine blew off steam, and the team jumped, I sat down on the wagon, and pulled on the lines. Q. How did you sit down? A. Well, in pulling on the lines, I sat down quietly. Q. Stand up, and just show us how you pulled on the lines and sat down. A. Pulled that way, and sat down (witness showing the jury how he did). Steadied yourself with the lines? A. Yes, sir. Q. You held the lines as tight as you could? Your feet were towards the horses? A. Yes, sir; towards the horses. Q. Just tell us again what point you were at when the team took fright and jumped, with reference to the front of the engine. A. I said that I was entering on the railroad or railway,—just entering on it. My team was just entering the railroad track that the engine was on. Q. When the team jumped? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had you got on past the engine when they first jumped? A. The team was entering the track that the engine was on at the time the noise was made from the engine. Q. Now, this noise from the engine,—state the appearance of any steam that you saw or heard. A. I did not see any steam. I heard a loud, hissing, continuous blowing off of the steam. Q. You say that you did not see it? A. No, sir. Q. Did you have time to look at it? A. No, sir. Q. What did you say that the sound was? A. It was a hissing sound. Q. Now state, with reference to the time the team started to run, whether the steam escaped just before or after. State when you heard the hissing sound, with reference to the time that the horses started. A. Why, the horses started when they heard the noise of the steam,—not until then."

There is considerable other testimony to the same effect. Some of the witnesses on behalf of the company testify that the noise was made by the escape from the pop valve, over which the engineer has no direct control. The question thus became proper to submit to a jury, and, under the state of proof in this case, the court will not disturb their findings. It is unnecessary to review the instructions at length. The principal contention of the plaintiff in error is that there is no liability shown, and in effect, that the jury should have been so instructed; but, in our view, the court below did right in submitting the questions to the jury. The questions of fact seem to have been fairly submitted. That a railway company, when necessary in operating its road, may blow off steam in the crowded thoroughfare of a city, as well as other places, is undoubted, even if by doing so horses will be frightened, and losses thereby sustained. But it has no right to do so wantonly, or when unnecessary to do so. While the rights of the company are to be respected and protected, other persons also have rights which in like manner must be respected by the company and its employes. The right of the public to use the streets of the city is equally as broad as the right of the company to use its tracks and neither can willfully commit an injury, whereby loss is sustained to the other, without liability. The case of Andrews v. Mason City Ft. D. R. Co., 77 Iowa, 669, is very similar in its facts to this case, and it was held that the company was liable. In that case the plaintiff's team was frightened by the discharge of steam, and ran away and committed injury, for which the plaintiff was permitted to recover. The same rule was applied in Manchester, S. J. & A. R. Co. v. Fullerton, 14 C. B. N. S. 54; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Harmon, 47 Ill. 298, 95 Am. Dec. 489; Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Starnes, 9 Heisk. 52, 24 Am. Rep. 296,—and is approved by Judge Thompson in his valuable work on Negligence (vol. 1, pp. 351, 352). He says: "Whilst no liability attaches for damages arising from the doing of these acts, under proper circumstances, yet it will be different if they are done without necessity, negligently, or wantonly; for although, as will be shown in a subsequent chapter, the rule obtains in England, and generally in this country, that a master is not answerable in damages for the wanton and malicious acts of his servant, yet enlightened American courts have refused, on cogent grounds of public policy, to extend this immunity to railway corporations, whose servants are intrusted with such extensive means of doing mischief. Accordingly, it has been held that if such a servant, while in charge of the company's engines and machinery, and engaged about its business, willfully perverts such agencies to purposes of wanton mischief, the company must respond in damages. This doctrine has been applied where the person in charge of a railway locomotive frightened a traveler's horse by blowing off steam and sounding the steam whistle with a loud noise, when it was wholly unnecessary." This, we think, is a correct statement of the law.

Upon the whole case, the questions were proper to submit to a jury, and there is no material error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

The other Judges concur.

A rehearing was subsequently granted after which on January 16, 1894, Irvine, C., on behalf of the court filed the following opinion:

An opinion in this case, affirming the judgment of the district court, was filed January 8, 1893, and reported in 85 Neb. 867. A rehearing has been granted upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence, the question being raised upon the proof of negligence upon the part of the plaintiff in error. The statement of facts in the former opinion suffices, without much by way of addition, for this. The facts alleged for the purpose of establishing negligence on the part of the plaintiff in error may be analyzed as follows:

First. That the railroad company negligently permitted its engine to stand for an undue length of time at the north margin of the street. There is absolutely no evidence tending to establish these averments, and a further consideration of the point is unnecessary.

Second. That the railroad company unlawfully neglected to have any flagman at the street crossing. The duty of a flagman is clearly to keep a lookout, and warn persons using the street of the approach of trains. Necessarily, he cannot have any knowledge of the fact that locomotives receding or standing on the track are about to let off steam, and it is not his duty to warn passers-by of the fact that the steam is about to escape. The presence or absence of a flagman could not in any manner affect the case, and there could be no recovery upon these averments. The jury was expressly so instructed, and the instruction was correct.

Third. That, as the plaintiff below approached the crossing, the railroad company, by its servants, negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully, suddenly and without warning, let off and discharged steam from the locomotive and from its cylinders in great volume and with noise, whereby plaintiff's horses were frightened, ran away, and threw the plaintiff from his wagon, causing the injuries. It is upon these averments that the judgment must stand, if at all, and the court so treated the case upon the former hearing. The conclusions reached by the court upon the legal questions thus presented were stated in the former opinion as follows: "A railroad company, in the legitimate transaction of its business, has the right to use steam, and is not liable for the proper and necessary use of the same, even if it result in an injury to others, as by frightening horses, and causing them to run away. If, however, an engineer within a city, where teams are constantly passing, needlessly and unnecessarily opens the valves of his engine, and frightens such horses, and causes them to run away and commit injury, the company will be liable, provided the plaintiff is free from contributory negligence." It was also held that the allegations that steam was blown off negligently, wrongfully, and unlawfully implied that such action was unnecessary. We have no doubt that the petition stated a cause of action correctly. It was held, in the former opinion, that the railroad company would be liable for an injury sustained by reason of such an accident, where the horses were frightened by an engineer's negligently permitting steam to escape from his engine; but, where it is said that the company is liable when such act is done unnecessarily, the term "unnecessary" must not be limited in its application to an absolutely unavoidable escape of steam. As said by the court in the syllabus of the former opinion, a railroad company has the right to use steam, and is not liable for the proper and necessary use of the same, even if it results in an injury to others. The railroad company is in such cases liable for injuries caused by its negligence, and its negligence alone. Its liability is to be measured by the same rules as that of an individual under similar circumstances. It is not for the consequences of every act not strictly necessary that one is responsible. I may drive along a highway for pleasure, no motive except seeking my own amusement inducing me to do so. The fact that I am so driving may cause an injury; but I am not responsible in damages therefor simply because it was not necessary for me to be driving at that place, and at that time, but, if I am to be held responsible, it must be because I failed to exercise reasonable care in the manner of my driving. I may make alterations in my sidewalk and someone passing during the progress of those alterations may be injured; but I cannot be held responsible solely because it was not a matter of necessity for me, at the time, to make such alterations, but, if I am responsible, it must be because I failed to observe reasonable care in making such alterations at the time, and under the circumstances. In other words, an act cannot be determined negligent simply from the fact that it was not strictly necessary; but, in order to constitute negligence, there must either be the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or the doing of something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do. Foxworthy v. Hastings, 23 Neb. 772. We think, therefore, that the terms "needless" and "unnecessary" in the former opinion are not to receive a strict construction, but are to be taken in connection with the rule that the railroad company was liable only for negligence, and that in the legitimate conduct of its business it had a right to discharge steam from its locomotive, even within the limits of a city, and near traveled thoroughfares, provided, in so doing, it acted as a person of prudence would act under similar circumstances.

Numerous authorities have been cited upon this branch of the case. Many of them are from states where the courts undertake to say, as a matter of law, whether or not a given state of facts constitutes negligence. Where this is done, it is equivalent to saying that the circumstances only are questions of fact, and the inference to be drawn from them a question of law. This is not the rule in this state, but, upon the contrary, the rule here is that even where the facts are undisputed, but where, upon such facts, different reasonable minds may honestly draw different conclusions as to whether or not such facts establish negligence, the inference to be drawn is a question for the jury, and not for the court. Lincoln v. Gillilan, 18 Neb. 114; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Landauer, 36 Neb. 642; American Waterworks Co. v. Dougherty (Neb.) 55 N. W. Rep. 1051.

Starting, then, from these premises, let us examine the evidence. The engine, at the time the accident occurred, was engaged in switching. It is not absolutely certain whether, at the time the team took flight, the engine was at a standstill, or moving very slowly. It had crossed the street, and had either come to a stop, or was moving very slowly away from the street, and was about to stop. There is much evidence to show that steam was escaping from the pop valve, and it was within the ordinary experience of men that steam, in so escaping, makes a loud noise likely to frighten horses. There is also much evidence in regard to these pop valves. They are necessary appliances for the safety of the engine. In fact, they are safety valves so adjusted as to open automatically when the steam reaches a certain pressure, and so permit the escape of steam before the pressure becomes so great as to endanger lives and property. The evidence shows, without contradiction, that an engine, especially when engaged in switching, must necessarily be kept at a steam pressure near the limit, and that while engineers endeavor, so far as possible, to prevent the accumulation of steam to such an extent as to cause the pop valves to open, exigencies are such that it is impossible to absolutely regulate the accumulation of steam, and an escape from the pop valve, necessarily frequently occurs. Had this engine not been provided with a pop valve, or had the pop valve been permitted to get out of repair, whereby an explosion occurred, there can be no doubt that negligence might be inferred from such a state of facts. It follows necessarily that negligence cannot be predicated, under ordinary circumstances, because there was a proper pop valve and because it did perform its proper office by permitting steam to escape in order to prevent a dangerous pressure. Did the evidence show that the engine had been permitted to stand a long time at the crossing, with the steam unnecessarily kept at a high pressure, it may be that such facts, followed by an escape of steam at the pop valve, would justify an inference of negligence. But there is no evidence to show such a state of affairs. On the contrary, the uncontradicted evidence shows that, owing to the varying loads to be hauled by an engine engaged in switching, the steam must be kept at a high pressure; that the quantity of steam to be used from time to time cannot be accurately predetermined; and that the engine, upon this occasion, had not been allowed to stand with the steam unnecessarily kept up, but that it was then engaged in switching, and had either not yet stopped, or had just been brought to a stop, when the accident occurred.

We are thus brought to a consideration of the averment that steam was unnecessarily allowed to escape from the cylinders, and that caused the accident. As to whether or not steam was escaping from the cylinders the evidence is conflicting. Several witnesses testify positively that they saw steam escaping from such a part of the engine that it must have come from the cylinder cocks. The weight of this evidence was subject to criticism. In the first place, these witnesses were all persons whose attention was casually attracted to the affair, and, while it seems it was first drawn to the escaping steam, it was almost instantly diverted to the runaway horses, and then to the injured plaintiff. The means of observation of these witnesses were therefore limited, and their recollections not entirely to be trusted. In the next place, their testimony upon this point met with direct and positive contradiction. These were questions, however, to be considered by the jury, and the evidence was sufficient to permit a finding that steam did escape from the cylinder cocks. It also appears that, when steam escapes from the cylinder cocks, it is because of a voluntary act on the part of the person in control of the engine in opening the valves. It further appears that these cylinder cocks are provided for the purpose of allowing condensed steam to escape from the cylinders, and that it is necessary to use them for that purpose in order to prevent the cylinder heads from being blown out. When the plaintiff rested his case, the evidence upon this point simply showed that steam was escaping from the cylinder cocks. A motion was then made to direct a verdict for the defendant, which was overruled. We think there was nothing at this stage of the case to permit an inference of negligence. Negligence cannot be inferred from the mere fact that an accident happened. Negligence cannot be inferred from the mere fact that an act was done which it is proper, and even necessary, to do at some times, and under some circumstances. Some evidence must be given of facts and circumstances from which a reasonable man might infer that in doing the act at that particular time, and under these particular circumstances the defendant failed to exercise due care and prudence. There was no evidence on the part of the plaintiff to show at what times and under what circumstances it was necessary to open the cylinder cocks. The evidence produced by the defendant certainly did not strengthen the plaintiff's case. The engineer testified that the cylinder cocks might have been open at the time, but, if they were, there could have been no forcible discharge of steam, under the circumstances existing as to the operation of the engine at that moment. He did not see the plaintiff until after the horses were frightened. His train was moving away from the street, or had practically at that instant come to a stop after moving in that direction, and, if he were observing his duty, his attention would probably be turned away from the street, and not towards it. There is no evidence to show that he willfully or wantonly, within the rule set out in Thompson on Negligence, cited in the former opinion, opened the cylinder cocks, and we can find no evidence permitting an inference that a state of facts existed which would have induced a reasonably prudent man to have kept them closed at the time in question. While negligence is an inference to be drawn by the jury from facts established, facts warranting such an inference must be established by evidence, and a jury must not be left to conjecture,—to infer not only negligence, but the existence of facts which would constitute negligence. Kilpatrick v. Richardson (Neb.) 56 N. W. Rep. 481. Where one generally has a right to do an act, in order to predicate negligence upon the doing of it in a particular instance the burden is upon the plaintiff to show such facts and circumstances as rendered the doing of it in that instance negligent. The burden is not upon the defendant to show that the act was not negligent. Such is the case here. The opening of the cylinder cocks was, in general, a proper and reasonable act to be performed. It could only be negligence to open them in a particular instance, when there was no necessity of so doing, and when, in addition to that, the circumstances were such that a reasonably prudent man would not do so. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show that such special circumstances existed, and there is a complete and total failure of evidence upon the point.

L. D. LEWELLING et al.

*1. Under the constitution of the state, and chapter 142, Sess. Laws 1885, providing "for the organization, government, and compensation of the militia of the state," the governor as commander in chief of the militia, has the power to disband and muster out, at any time, any company of the national guard, comprising the active militia of the state. Such power has always

*Headnotes by HORROR, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Power of the governor to disband militia.

Although the above case, as to the power of the governor to disband a company of militia, is based on the constitution and laws of Kansas, and the court cites no similar case, there have been a few cases in which a similar question has been presented. Quite recently it was decided in New York that the military code of the state, Laws 1883, chap. 290, giving authority to the governor as commander in chief to alter, disband, and reorganize companies of uniformed militia "whenever in his judgment the efficiency of the state force will be thereby increased," did not violate the Federal Constitution. People v. Hill, 126 N. Y. 497. One ground of the decision was that the officers thus rendered supernumerary were not "removed." The case also decided that if it was necessary to find this power to disband such a company in the federal statutes, it was impliedly given in U. S. Rev. Stat., § 1630, which provides that state militia may be arranged into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, as the legislature of the state may direct.

It has been previously held in the same state that the governor, as commander in chief of the militia, had the power to consolidate companies. People v. Ewon, 17 How. Pr. 375.

In Massachusetts also it is decided that the governor, as commander in chief, with the advice and consent of the council, may disband any of the militia companies. Proctor v. Stone, 1 Allen, 198; Opinion of the Justices, 1 Allen, 197, note.

In Maine on the other hand, under the Militia Law of 1882, chap. 45, § 5, providing that on report of the commander of a regiment that the company has refused or neglected to choose officers, the governor, as commander in chief, may disband them, a report by such commander, from which it appears that some of the members of the company did vote for officers, without showing that the persons voted for were intelligible, although it states that they were persons unfit for officers, will not give the governor power to disband the company. Gould v. Hutchins, 10 Me. 145.

2. Enlistment in the national guard—the active militia—is not to be construed, upon the part of the state, as a contract; but the state, through the governor, as commander in chief, may put an end to the term of enlistment before it has regularly expired.

3. The provision in section 4, chap. 142, Sess. Laws 1885, authorizing officers to be commissioned for a term of five years, is violative of section 2, art. 15, of the Constitution forbidding the legislature to create any office, the tenure of which is longer than four years. Military officers are within the provisions of the constitution.

4. Where the statute fixes a term of band the company. Gould v. Hutchins, 10 Me. 145.

That the power of the governor as commander in chief to control the militia is beyond the jurisdiction of the civil courts is held in People v. Scrugham, 25 Barb. 218, refusing by mandamus to the appointee to review the governor's order relieving one officer from the command of a brigade and appointing another in his place.

And a similar decision as to changing the command of a regiment was made in State v. Harrison, 24 Minn. 523, on application for quo warranto.

So in Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. L. 132, 5 Am. Rep. 584, mandamus was refused to control the action of the governor as commander in chief in respect to the removal of a militia officer.

A similar question as to the power of a division commander to disband a company of the national guard for mutiny, under N. J. Rev. p. 673, was raised in State v. Mott, 46 N. J. L. 323, 50 Am. Rep. 424, in which it was held that the order of the division commander was not reviewable by a civil court.

Somewhat connected with the question above presented is the decision in North v. Appleton, 25 Abb. N. C. 389, holding that no request or consent of an enlisted man is necessary to his discharge, under a provision of section 219 of the regulations of the national guard, that when an enlisted man is entitled to a full and honorable discharge, his immediate commander may apply for the discharge.

Whether or not the tenure of office in the militia is established by the constitution is a question suggested, but not decided, in Opinion of the Justices, 62 N. H. 706, holding that the statute requiring service for five years, unless sooner discharged, did not limit the right to continue service to five years necessarily, but was a limitation on the right to resign.

As to power of the governor to call out militia for service, see Chapin v. Ferry (Wash.) 15 L. R. A. 116, and note.

(April 7, 1894.)

ERROR to the District Court for Marion County to review a judgment in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to enjoin defendants from disbanding a company of the Kansas National Guard. Affirmed.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

The plaintiffs filed their petition on July 15, 1893, against L. D. Lewelling, as commander in chief of the Kansas national guard, H. H. Artz, as adjutant general of the state, and S. A. Maginnis, as acting colonel of the second regiment of the Kansas national guard, alleging that they (the plaintiffs) were the officers and privates of company G of the second regiment, duly commissioned and enlisted as such; that their term of service, as provided by the terms and conditions of their enlistment, and by the laws of Kansas, is for the period of five years; that the term of their enlistment had not expired in the case of any one of them; that company G was duly organized in pursuance of the laws of the state, and the rules and regulations of the military board thereof, on or about October 1, 1885, and that the company had, during all said time, kept its membership of noncommissioned officers and privates up to a number in excess of forty, and not in excess of the number of sixty; that the company had been provided with arms, uniforms, and other military equipments, as provided by law, and had at all times since its organization conformed to the military laws of the state, and all the rules and regulations of the military board, concerning meetings, drilling, instruction, practice in the manual of arms, and annual muster, and fully complied with all other lawful rules, regulations, and orders promulgated by the military authorities of said state; that neither the company nor any of its members had been guilty of any neglect of duty, breach of discipline, disobedience of orders, or violation of law, nor of any conduct which would authorize their discharge or dismissal from the military service of the state before the expiration of their term of enlistment; that, notwithstanding the premises, L. D. Lewelling, as commander in chief of the national guard, without any lawful authority, and in excess of his power as such officer, had issued an order directing that all the officers and enlisted men of the company be mustered out of the military service of the state, and discharged therefrom, on July 15, 1893, at 4 o'clock P. M., and that the company then surrender to a mustering officer all its arms, equipments, and other military property of the state in its possession, and the said H. H. Artz, as adjutant general of the state, was proceeding to, and would, unless restrained by the court, carry out the order at the time, and that he had for that purpose detailed S. A. Maginnis as a mustering officer to meet the company at its armory at Marion, in this state, on the said day and hour, to muster it out, and discharge each of the plaintiffs from the military service of the state, all of which orders and acts are and will be illegal, and without the authority of any law whatever, and in violation of the rights and privileges of the company, and each of its members, and for which threatened wrongs and injuries the plaintiffs are wholly remediless at law, and without the means of protection from the threatened injuries and wrongs, except by and through the orders, injunctions, and processes of the court. The petition closed with a prayer for an order restraining the defendants, and each of them, from mustering out the company. To this a demurrer was filed by all the defendants, as follows: "And now come said defendants, and severally demur to the petition filed against them herein, for the reason that it appears on the face of said petition—First, that this court has no jurisdiction of the persons of these defendants, nor of the person of either of them, nor of the subject of the action; second, that the plaintiffs have no legal capacity to sue; third, that there is a defect of parties plaintiff and defendant; fourth, that several causes of action are improperly joined; fifth, that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." On September 29, 1893, the demurrer was submitted to the court, after argument, and sustained. The plaintiffs excepted, and bring the case here.

Messrs. Keller & Dean, for plaintiffs in error:

L. D. Lewelling as commander in chief and H. H. Artz as adjutant general are subject to the restraining process of the courts to prevent them from committing an unlawful and wrongful act.

Re Gunn, 19 L. R. A. 519, 50 Kan. 155; Burnham v. Morrissey, 14 Gray, 226, 74 Am. Dec. 676.

The demurrer concedes that the defendants were proceeding to disband a large portion of the national guard without any sufficient cause, and without warrant of law; that the defendants had no power to muster out of the service company G, under the circumstances disclosed in the petition. If we are correct in this, then the judicial branch of the government has jurisdiction to restrain the defendants from the commission of the threatened wrong.

The legislature has, in section 18, specifically provided under what circumstances the commander-in-chief may increase the active military force, and when he may decrease it. Does it not logically follow that the intention was to withhold the power to increase or decrease the force under any other circumstances and conditions?

Under our system of government, no officer is placed above the restraining authority of the law, which is truly said to be universal in its behest—all paying it homage, the least as feeling its care, and the greatest as not exempt from its power.

Meurs. Frank Doster and G. C. Clemens, for defendants in error:

In the absence of a constitutional provision casting upon the legislature the burden of providing for the organization and discipline of the militia, it would rest upon the executive, because historically it always rested upon him.

1 Bl. Com. 262; Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192, 5 Am. Dec. 564.

Unless the legislature discharges its duties in the premises, under the grant of power to it, they are to be discharged by the executive, because the power to do so inheres in the commander in chief, and must of necessity be exercised by him.

That the power to muster out these troops, in the absence of some restraining statute, when the exigencies of the service permit, is a power inherent in the commander in chief, is a proposition too plain to require argument. This being the case, suppose the statute does take the form of an enabling act; suppose it does, in words, confer power to muster out and discharge troops. The mere phraseology of the statute will not avail because the "expression of those things which are tacitly implied operates nothing."

Dwarris, Stat. 17th rule.

Suppose it be claimed that the governor does not intend to replace the discharged company with another, to keep the alleged complement full. Shall he be compelled to come into court to establish the integrity of his contemplated official act, and submit his personal veracity to the countervailing testimony of incredulous witnesses? This court has even decided that it will not hear evidence that a railroad company does not intend to discharge its corporate obligations.

State v. Martin, 51 Kan. 462.

It is said that the secret intent is to reorganize the militia upon a partisan basis, and to secure its subservency to partisan ends. Shall the purity of motive of the head of a co-ordinate department in respect to his constitutional acts be made a subject of crimination and countercharge in the courts?

The uniform practice of the commander in chief, attested by the records of the adjutant general, has been to muster out military companies without hindrance, let, or reason. While the specific instances of its practice may not be judicially noticed, yet the general and uniform exercise of the authority by a co-ordinate department of the government will be so noticed.

Lanfear v. Metier, 18 La. Ann. 497, and note to the same case, 89 Am. Dec. 658.

Enlistment in the army is a contract, and is to be construed, as far as the soldier is concerned, according to the principles which regulate contracts generally. The government, however, is not bound by the conditions of the contract, although such conditions are imposed by itself; thus, it may reduce the pay which was a part of the original consideration, or it may put an end to the term of enlistment before it has regularly expired.

15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 899, and cases cited.

The statute authorizing commissions for the period of five years is void, because opposed to the tenure-of-office clause of the constitution, 23 L. R. A.

which prohibits the creation of any office to be held for a longer period than four years.

The tenure of these offices is, therefore, not declared by law; and all military officers hold their commissions at the pleasure of the governor who appointed them.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for our determination in this case is whether the governor of the state, as commander in chief of the national guard, comprising the active militia of the state, has the power to disband or muster out a company of the guard before the expiration of the term of its enlistment, except for insubordination, breach of discipline, insufficiency of service, or other like cause. The constitution ordains that "the governor shall be commander in chief, and shall have power to call out the militia to execute the laws, to suppress insurrection, and to repel invasion; that the officers of the militia shall be elected or appointed, and commissioned in such manner as may be provided by law; that the legislature shall provide for organizing, equipping and disciplining the militia in such manner as it shall deem expedient not incompatible with the laws of the United States." Sections 2-4, art. 8, of the Constitution. Chapter 142, Sess. Laws 1885, provides "for the organization, government and compensation of the militia of the state." Gen. Stat. 1889, pars. 8762, 8798. Section 5 declares that "in time of peace, the national guard shall consist of not more than thirty companies of infantry, two companies of cavalry, and one battery of light artillery." Section 8 provides that the governor of the state shall be the commander-in-chief of the militia, with power to appoint certain military officers. And section 7 provides that the major general, four brigadier-generals, and the adjutant-general, appointed by the governor, shall be a military board; and section 8, in prescribing the duties of this board, constitutes it an advisory body to the commander-in-chief on all the military interests of the state. The board is given authority to prepare and promulgate the necessary provisions, rules, and regulations for "the organization, government, and compensation of the national guard;" such provisions, rules, and regulations to have force when approved by the governor, as commander in chief. The board has also the power, with the consent of the governor, to make any changes in the military organization of the state that may be necessary to conform the same to the laws of the United States.

The statute does not make it compulsory upon the governor or the military board to keep the military force of the state up to its maximum of thirty-three companies. We have recently had occasion in the case of Re

Sanders (just decided) 36 Pac. Rep. 348, to construe the words "organization" and "management" or "government." Without unnecessarily repeating what was said in that case, we are of the opinion that the power to organize and govern the national guard of the state, conferred upon the governor, as commander-in-chief of the militia, by the constitution and the statute, gives him the authority to recruit or fill up the national guard or active militia to the maximum limit permitted by the statute, and also to disband or muster out, at any time, any company thereof. Such power has been uniformly exercised by the governors of the state ever since the adoption of chapter 142. On October 1, 1887, six companies of the guard were disbanded and mustered out of the service upon the written order of Gov. John A. Martin, as commander-in-chief, signed by A. B. Campbell, as adjutant-general. In 1889 and 1890 Gov. Humphrey found it necessary, from various causes, to muster out of the service ten companies. They filled their places with new companies. In 1890-91 the same governor mustered out eight companies. Other instances of disbanding of companies of the guard might be mentioned. Report of Adjutant-General, State Pub. Docs. 1887-88, vol. 1, p. 29; Id., Pub. Docs. 1889-90, vol. 1, p. 5; Id., Pub. Docs. 1891-92, vol. 1, p. 81.

The general and uniform exercise of the authority by a co-ordinate department of the government, under any particular statute, is entitled to some consideration in the interpretation of its provisions, if it is at all doubtful in its terms.

Section 4 of chapter 142, providing that enlistments in the national guard shall be for the term of five years, might limit the power of the governor, as commander-in-chief, to disband or muster out any company before the expiration of five years, if enlistments in the militia were a contract to be considered according to the principles which regulate contracts generally. But the state is not bound by the terms of an enlistment, and may put an end to the term before it has regularly expired. 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 399; United States v. Cottingham, 1 Rob. (Va.) 615, 40 Am. Dec. 710.

The provision in section 4 permitting officers to be commissioned for a term of five years is violative of section 2, art. 15, forbidding the legislature to create any office, the tenure of which is longer than four years. Military officers are within the provisions of the constitution. Where the statute fixes a term of office at such a length of time that it is unconstitutional, the tenure thereof is not declared, and therefore the office is held only during the pleasure of the appointing power. People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 105.

Various other questions were discussed upon the hearing of this case,—among others, the alleged unconstitutionality of the provisions of chapter 142, upon the ground that said chapter did not provide for organizing, keeping, or disciplining all of the militia, but limited its operation, in times of peace, to thirty-three companies only. As the conclusion we have reached permits the disbandment of any company of the national guard by the governor, as commander-in-chief of the militia, and affirms the judgment, it is unnecessary to pass upon the other questions presented. If the statute, with the interpretation given to it by this court, is unwise or dangerous in any of its provisions, the legislature, which will convene in a few months, may, within the terms of the constitution, modify, amend, or repeal it, or any part thereof, as seems best to them, as the representatives of all the people. As a general rule the constitutionality of a whole statute ought not to be passed upon, unless directly involved in the final disposition of the case.

The judgment of the District Court will be affirmed.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County refusing to grant a new trial, after verdict in favor of defendant, in an action brought to recover the value of certain property destroyed by fire alleged to have been set out by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The following is the order rendered by the lower court:

"Plaintiffs' motion for a new trial of the above-entitled action was brought on for hearing at special term, January 28, 1898, and both parties appeared by counsel. The ground of motion is alleged errors in law, occurring at the trial, and excepted to by plaintiffs.

"1. It is urged that the court erred in excluding the testimony offered to show that repairs were made by defendant on its burner a few days after the fire. The ruling of the court in this offer was in accordance with the rule laid by our supreme court in Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 80 Minn. 465. That case is not only a binding authority, but its reasoning seems conclusive and unassailable. The plaintiffs were permitted to show the condition of the burner at this time by the many witnesses who examined it. The mere fact that the defendant caused repairs to be made was the only fact excluded.

"2. The question asked of the witness W. H. H. Day as to his opinion about the effect upon the quantity of sparks and coals emitted from the Akeley smokestack and burner which would result from turning in the exhaust steam was rightly excluded. The question called for the opinion and conjecture of the witness. It was entirely different from the questions afterwards put to the witness Hume as to his observations where that course was taken with other smokestacks and burners.

"3. The evidence as to the experience and competency of Joseph Turnbull, who had been employed by the defendant to construct its burner, was competent. In the construction of such an appliance, it is some evidence of care that defendant had it done under the charge and supervision of a workman of experience and reputed skill in the construction of such appliances.

"4. It was competent, on the question of ordinary care, to compare the burner, as to its material and construction, with other burners in use here and elsewhere in connection with steam sawmills. The kind of danger to be guarded against is similar in them all. The degree of danger may differ, depending upon circumstances and surroundings, calling for greater precaution, perhaps, in one case than another; and, therefore, any differences in the circumstances and surroundings may be shown and considered by the jury. But whether or not ordinary care has been used in a particular case can be fairly determined only after comparing the care taken in that case with the care taken in other like cases, and having regard for any differences in risk or danger to be apprehended from differences in situation, surroundings, or other circumstances.

"5. As to the alleged error in respect to a statement of fact to the jury in the charge of the court, the jury were cautioned and instructed at the outset that 'all questions of fact are for the jury to determine, and it is for the jury to remember and apply the evidence given by the different witnesses upon the trial; . . . and if in what I shall say to you I should refer to any of the testimony either generally or as to any of the witnesses, for the purpose of applying what I shall say, it will be merely stating my remembrance, and, if that differs from yours in any respect, you will take your own recollection, and not my statement, as to the testimony of any of the witnesses or any of the evidence given in the case.' With such instruction the jury could hardly have been misled, even had the court failed to remember accurately, and therefore misstated some item of the evidence. But there was no such lapse of memory or misstatement. The part of the charge objected to is that portion where, after referring to the testimony about the notice given to Mr. Akeley and Mr. Farr as to previous fires, the court added: 'I think the testimony does not show that any specific defect was pointed out to those gentlemen by Mr. Day or Mr. Robinson or any one else. But the general fact was stated to them that the property was endangered by the burner. I think that there is no testimony that any specific defect, either in the stacks or in the burners, was mentioned or pointed out. The testimony which plaintiffs claim is ignored by this portion of the charge is that of the witness W. H. H. Day, where he speaks of being near the Akeley burner shortly before the fire, and seeing and sending for Mr. Farr. He proceeded: 'When he came down where we were, the fuel burner—the top of it—was all of a blaze; a flame of fire going out through it, and I called his attention to it. He didn't say much about it. I says: "Mr. Farr, that smokestack there, that fuel burner, is in bad shape, and something ought to be done to it." He said it was not in bad shape at all. I says: "There is holes through it there. You can see it; you can see it with the naked eye." He said there wasn't any. I says: "Well, yesterday we had seven fires in our yard, and you didn't pay any attention to it,"' etc. The calling of Farr's attention to the fact that a blaze was passing out through the top of the burner was not calling his attention to any specific defect. Blaze, as well as smoke, would pass through meshes fine enough to arrest sparks. Saying it was in 'bad shape' did not call attention to any specific defect; neither did the statement that there were holes through it that could be seen with the naked eye. This was a mere general assertion of defective condition by having holes. It was not a mentioning, pointing out, or calling attention to any specific defect,—any particular hole or holes. The testimony was just this: that Day told Farr that the top of the fuel burner had holes in it that could be seen with the naked eye, but did not mention or point out any in particular, and Farr denied that it had any holes. To amount to notice, the particular defect, if any existed, should have been pointed out, or mentioned in such a way as to describe and designate it, and thus had attention directed to it. The statement to the jury was therefore strictly accurate. The motion for new trial is therefore denied."

Messrs. Koon, Wheelan & Bennett and R. W. Barger, for appellant:

If defendant erected, near to the lumberyards of said plaintiffs, a refuse burner, which, on account of its nature, use, and operation and essential character was dangerous, and necessarily tended to the damage of the property of others in that immediate vicinity, and fire escaped therefrom and was carried by the wind into and upon the lumberyard of said plaintiffs, and there, by igniting, burned and consumed their said lumber piled thereon, defendant is liable to the plaintiffs in this action for the value of lumber so destroyed.

Testimony offered by plaintiffs to show that immediately after the fire occurred which destroyed plaintiff's property, the defendant shut down its mill, stopped its burner, and at once, among other things, under direction of the building inspector of the city of Minneapolis, repaired its burner by closing the holes therein, and also placing a bell-shaped netting on its smoke-stacks, covering them completely, was admissible, not to prove an admission by defendant of its negligence, but to prove affirmatively that the holes were actually there in that burner, and that they were dangerous.

Such evidence was held proper in this court in—

Plaintiff knew that this burner was essentially and intrinsically a dangerous thing. It knew that a large amount of dry and inflammable property was exposed to danger therefrom—knew the situation and all surrounding circumstances, and knew that fire was constantly escaping from the burner. Under these facts it was bound to make the burner absolutely safe, or cease its use, or stand liable for all damages done thereby.

Messrs. Kellogg & Laybourn and J. M. Shaw, for respondent:

It is impossible to say that the use which defendant made of its premises was not an ordinary and lawful use; it was not extraordinary in any sense. It is also impossible to say that the result which accrued, if it did accrue,—the burning of the plaintiff's lumber yard,—was a necessary or inevitable result of such use.

A careful setting and keeping of fires in one's dwelling house, field, or elsewhere, for a useful purpose, creates no liability to another injured by its spreading through some accident, not reasonably to be anticipated. But a fire set or looked after negligently, if by reason of such negligence it communicates to a neighbor's property and destroys it, will give the neighbor an action for damages.

If the defendant used ordinary and proper care in looking out for such things as were liable to occur from appliances of this kind, and did not discover or have notice of them, and an accident should occur, the defendant would not be liable.

Read v. Morse, 34 Wis. 318.

If the defendant was bound in the construction of this burner, to use no more than ordinary diligence, and to do no more than to adopt and put in use the most approved and tested safeguards in ordinary use in connection therewith, it was proper for it to show that it had fulfilled that duty in the given case, and it could not be shown in any other way than by bringing its appliance in comparison with others which had been before and were in ordinary use for the purpose for which defendant was using the same.

Collins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiffs J. W. Day & Co. and defendant corporation were extensively engaged in the manufacture of lumber at Minneapolis. Their plants, operated by steam, and their lumber yards, were separated by a street only, and on the morning of May 21, 1891, fire destroyed a large quantity of lumber belonging to and piled in the yards of J. W. Day & Co. This lumber was insured, and the insurance companies, having paid the amounts due on their respective policies, are made coplaintiffs herein, the action having been brought to recover the value of the destroyed lumber. It is alleged in the complaint that the fire was caused by defendant's carelessness and negligence in the operation of its mill, and particularly that it allowed a sawdust burner, used in connection, to become so out of repair that large quantities of coals and burning brands escaped through the netting on top, and set the fire in question. This, as might be presumed, was the main question of fact on the trial of the action; but, as the action comes before us on a bill of exceptions, not on a settled case, we are not to review the evidence or to pass upon appellants' forty-ninth specification of error.

There have been fifty assignments of error made by appellants, very few of which need be referred to. The others are without merit. Taking those which require mention in the order of discussion by appellants' counsel, we first come to an instruction to the jury requested by plaintiffs which the trial court declined to give. This request eliminated from the case any consideration by the jury of defendant's alleged negligence, and planted the plaintiffs' right to recover upon grounds independent of such negligence. The fire used by defendant was for manufacturing purposes, and, if used with proper safeguards and without negligence, no liability attached for damages caused by its escape. Any other rule would make the person who uses fire for manufacturing or mechanical or propelling purposes, or even for heating, an insurer against accidents. The element of negligence—an essential element in pleadings, as well as in proofs in cases of this nature—cannot be ignored when the cause is given to the jury. Counsel have confounded the question they argue with one relating to the burden of proof when damage is caused by fire. Doubtless, one who employs the element of fire for manufacturing or mechanical or propelling purposes, or who employs it for any purpose under circumstances which render it especially dangerous to others, is held to the exercise of more care and caution than is one who employs the same element for a less dangerous purpose. Yet the degree of care is the same, for in either case reasonable care, or, what is the same thing, ordinary care, only, is required. Read v. Morse, 34 Wis. 818; Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 69 Wis. 5. Reasonable care is all that is required, but it must be proportionate to the risks to be apprehended and guarded against. Hoy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 46 Minn. 269. To state it briefly, negligence or misconduct is the gist of the action, and it must be proven.

All of the questions to witnesses covered by assignments of error from one to eight, inclusive, relate to the exclusion of testimony tending to show that, immediately after the fire, defendant, under the direction of the city building inspector, repaired the top of its sawdust burner. In the case of Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 30 Minn. 465, this court, after twice holding to the contrary, concluded that evidence of this character was inadmissible and its previous rulings wrong on principle. Several cases were cited in support of the changed position, and we are satisfied that the rule last adopted is the correct one, without regard to the time when the repairs are made. Scarcely a court in the country now holds that evidence of that kind should be admitted. We cannot agree with appellants' counsel that this testimony was offered for the purpose of showing that there were holes in the netting of the burner when the fire occurred, for their argument in support of their assignments of error clearly repudiates the assertion.

What we have said in respect to the request to charge which eliminated from the consideration of the jury all question of negligence on defendant's part, as an essential element in the case, disposes of several alleged errors in the charge, and the balance have been so clearly shown to be unfounded in the opinion of the learned court below when refusing plaintiffs' motion for a new trial that we can add nothing to what was there said. This last remark is applicable also to the fourth specification of error, relating to the exclusion of an answer to a question asked one of plaintiffs' witnesses.

Evidence was admitted, over plaintiffs' objection, tending to show that defendant's burner was as safe as any burner used or known. In the adoption and use of such appliances as a refuse burner, parties are not held to adopt and use appliances which are perfect. The defendant was bound to exercise care proportionate to the risks to be apprehended. It could do no more than to adopt and use the most approved and tested safeguards, and that it did was a fact perfectly proper to be shown. This could be done by comparing the burner it used with those elsewhere used in connection with sawmills, and it was not necessary to show that the situation and circumstances were precisely alike in all cases. As was said by the trial court, the kind of danger to be guarded against is the same, but the degree may differ, depending upon surroundings. The differences in situation, surroundings, and circumstances are all proper to be shown and considered when determining whether, in a given case, ordinary care has been observed in providing a burner for the consumption of refuse matter at a sawmill.

The burner in question was built under the direction of one Turnbull, who had had large experience in this work, it was claimed. One of the members of defendant corporation was asked, "What is and what had been Turnbull's reputation as to competency in this line of business?" We see nothing wrong in the ruling of the court whereby an answer to this question was allowed. It was proper for defendant corporation to show that, when erecting this burner, they employed a competent man, one of good reputation as to competency for the work. It tended to show the degree of care used by defendant.

It appears that, shortly before the fire, one of the firm of J. W. Day & Co. complained to Mr. Akeley, of defendant corporation, in respect to the condition of the netting on top of the burner, and that Akeley immediately sent for Turnbull. When testifying as to this, the witness Akeley was asked to state what he told Turnbull he wanted done when the latter came to the mill. Akeley was permitted to answer, in effect, that he directed him to examine the burner, and, if anything could be done to make it safer, to do it. It is contended that the court below erred when receiving this answer, and again in refusing to strike it out. The evidence was proper, for it showed that a competent man was called, and told to do what plaintiffs claimed should be done. It tended to prove that defendant was not negligent in its efforts to make the burner safe, when attention had been called to its condition. We discover no error in the record.

Order affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, FIFTH CIRCUIT.

Charles DILLINGHAM, Receiver of the Huston & Texas Central R. Co., Appt.,

v.

Leona P. HAWK.

(60 Fed. Rep. 494.)

The judgment of a state court against a receiver appointed by a federal court is conclusive as to the existence and amount of the claim, but the time and manner of its payment must be controlled by the court appointing the receiver.

(February 27, 1894.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Texas in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to have a judgment recovered against the receiver in a state court paid out of the estate in his hands. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Pardee, Circuit Judge, and Locke and Toulmin, District Judges.

Mr. F. M. Etheridge, for appellant:

It is conceded that appellee had, under the third section of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1887, the right to sue appellant in the district court of Navarro county, Texas, without leave of the court appointing him receiver (Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cox, 145 U. S. 598, 36 L. ed. 829); but it is contended that the judgment obtained in such suit is not conclusive upon, but only advisory to, the chancellor.

A judgment obtained against a receiver in a suit at law, instituted by leave, whether such leave is granted by the court appointing the receiver, or is conferred by statute, is but the trial of an issue out of chancery. Granting leave to sue at law is but another method of directing an issue to be tried by a jury in a court of common law, and the verdict obtained in the one instance is not more conclusive than in the other.

2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 5th ed. p. 1071.

The verdict of a jury upon an issue out of chancery is only advisory and never conclusive upon the court. It is intended to inform the conscience of the chancellor. It may be disregarded and a decree rendered contrary to it.

1 Foster, Fed. Pr. § 805; Watt v. Starke, 101 U. S. 247, 25 L. ed. 826; 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 5th ed. p. 1148; Kohn v. McNulta, 147 U. S. 238, 37 L. ed. 150.

The party dissatisfied with the verdict upon an issue out of chancery must move for a new trial to the court of chancery and not the court of law trying the issue.

1 Foster, Fed. Pr. § 805; Johnson v. Harmon, 94 U. S. 871, 24 L. ed. 271; Watt v. Starke, supra.

Said Act of March 3, 1887, expressly provides that "such suit shall be subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court in which such receiver was appointed so far as the same shall be necessary to the ends of justice," thereby precluding any legitimate contention that there should be any departure from the established chancery practice.

Under the provision above quoted the chancellor, to the end that justice may be done, has the right, and it is his duty, to determine whether or not the judgment rendered in such suit is a valid claim against the receiver.

Jesup v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 665; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Texas Pac. R. Co. 41 Fed. Rep. 814.

What remedy did the new law afford? An absolute, unqualified, undeniable and indisputable right of trial by jury. A right to the aggrieved party of trial by jury in the forum of his own selection. But the very statute which accords this valuable right, out of abundant precaution, couples with it an express condition that the established chancery jurisdiction and practice in other regards should neither be invaded nor departed from. "But," says appellee, "if this be true the statute has, indeed, afforded no right. If my judgment is not conclusive then the statute is a farce." To which we respond: "The statute confers upon you the right of trial by jury in a forum of your own selection, a right that theretofore did not exist. When you obtain a verdict and judgment in such trial and in such court you bring it, for enforcement, to the court of original jurisdiction. This verdict and judgment comes appealing to the conscience of the chancellor, advising him of your right. If unattacked it will find acceptance and enforcement. It is prima facie, and the party attacking it must take the laboring oar and overcome its advisory effects, but if shown to be inequitable and unconscionable you can reap no benefit therefrom. The chancellor will not blindfold himself to justice and decree that as just which is manifestly unjust.

Kohn v. McNulta, 147 U. S. 238, 37 L. ed. 150.

Mr. R. S. Neblett, for appellee:

Under the Act of Congress March 3, 1887, the state court, where the judgment sought to NOTE.—The Act of Congress of March 3, 1887, permitting suits to be brought in state courts against receivers appointed by federal courts as a matter of right, has made the question presented in the 23 L. R. A.

above case very practical and important. The above decision, though not the first upon the point, is, we believe, the first from the circuit court of appeals.

be enforced was rendered, had jurisdiction of the receiver (appellant) and such judgment conclusively determines the cause of action and the amount of the claim.

Appellee's judgment having been rendered in a proceeding at law in a state court of competent jurisdiction, when carried to the federal court and there made the basis of her claim, is entitled to full faith and credit, and is subject only to the plea of nil tiel record, or a plea calling in question the jurisdiction of the court pronouncing the judgment.

Such is the plain provision of the Constitution of the United States, § 1, art. 4.

It will not be contended that a judgment rendered in one state when sued on in a sister state can be reopened. In such case the plea of nil dicit has never been allowed.

Christmas v. Russell, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 290, 18 L. ed. 475.

The question is, Does the provision of the constitution apply, when a judgment has been rendered in a state court, and is made the basis of a claim in the federal court? In support of the affirmative of this question the authorities are numerous and certain.

Mills v. Duryee, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 481, 8 L. ed. 411; Hampton v. McConnell, 16 U. S. 8 Wheat. 234, 4 L. ed. 378; McElmoy v. Cohen, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 312, 10 L. ed. 177; Freem. Judgm. § 578.

The facts constituting appellee's cause of action having been tried by a jury in a law proceeding in a state court of competent jurisdiction cannot be again re-examined in a federal court when made the basis of her claim and carried there to be enforced against property under the control of the federal court.

A construction of the act of congress under consideration which would leave the facts tried by a jury in a state court open to review in the federal court would make it violative of the 7th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Why should the verdict bind the conscience of the judge and not the chancellor?

In the proceeding at law a jury trial is given by constitution and by statute, while in the chancery proceeding it is given by neither.

In the chancery case the litigants are not entitled to a jury trial; the chancellor is without power to summon a jury; on him rests the responsibility of finding the facts.

Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 181, 26 L. ed. 676, 8 Greenl. Ev. §§ 261, 262.

What was the character of the suit in the state court where the judgment was rendered which appellee now seeks to enforce? Simply a suit to reduce to judgment an unliquidated demand for damages arising out of the negligence of the receiver in operating property as a common carrier. There was involved in it no element of equity. It asserted no liens on or claims against the funds in the hands of the receiver. It was purely a common-law proceeding.

By what right was the suit instituted and maintained in the state court in the common-law proceeding? Not by permission of the 23 L. R. A.

chancellor appointing the receiver nor at his direction to "relieve his conscience" on an issue involved but by virtue of act of congress under consideration.

The Seventh Amendment to the Constitution is as follows:

"In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by a jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law."

In Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 181, 26 L. ed. 676, it is held receivership cases are equity cases, and parties seeking to establish claims against the receiver have no right to a trial by jury; and the trial of questions involved belong to the court, no matter what may be its importance or complexity. The act of congress sought to relieve the chancellor from this responsibility and at the same time confer the right of trial by jury.

When appellant seeks to have the court appointing the receiver review the facts on which the judgment sought to be enforced is founded, he gives to the act of congress a construction violative of the constitution quoted. The expression in the constitution referred to "than according to the rules of common law," has been held to mean an application for a new trial in the court trying the case or on appeal to the court of last resort in that jurisdiction.

Parsons v. Bedford, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 446, 7 L. ed. 773; New York Sup. Ct. Justices v. United States, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 274, 19 L. ed. 658; Stevenson v. Williams, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 672, 23 L. ed. 162.

A construction harmonious with the constitution can only be given to the act by limiting the expression, "such suit shall be subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court appointing the receiver so far as the ends of justice may require,"—to the collection and enforcement of the judgment and not to the establishment of the claim by the verdict of a jury in a law trial.

Dillingham v. Anthony, 8 L. R. A. 634, 78 Tex. 50.

Toulmin, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 20, 1890, appellee recovered in the district court of Navarro county, Tex., against appellant, as receiver of the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company, judgment for $2,500, with interest and costs. On February 3, 1891, appellee filed, in consolidated cause No. 198, entitled "Nelson S. Easton and James Rintoul, Trustees, et al., vs. The Houston & Texas Central Railway Company et al.," then pending in the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Texas, wherein appellant had been appointed as such receiver, her petition of intervention, based upon the aforesaid judgment rendered in her favor by the said district court of Navarro county, Tex., praying that said receiver be ordered to pay the same. Said petition was on February 12, 1891, referred to the special master for examination and report. On January 14, 1892, the special master reported that the said district court of Navarro county was without jurisdiction to render the aforesaid judgment, and that same was void. To such report appellee excepted.—“Because it appears from the records of this cause, and from the report of the master, that intervenor’s cause of action accrued against defendant after the passage of the Act of Congress of March 3, 1887, and that she instituted her suit in the district court of Navarro county, Tex., and recovered the judgment she now seeks to enforce October 30, 1890, which judgment has never been reversed nor appealed from, and is in full force and effect, and neither the master nor this court can now inquire into the facts on which such judgment was rendered.”

The said circuit court sustained appellee’s said exception, holding that the aforesaid judgment declared upon by her was final and conclusive, and decreed accordingly. Appellant’s assignments of error are as follows:

“(1) The trial court erred in holding that the judgment obtained by intervenor in the district court of Navarro county, Tex., and made the basis of her intervention herein, was conclusive, and in sustaining the exceptions of intervenor to the report of the master, which set forth all the testimony adduced upon the hearing before the master.

(2) The trial court erred in rendering judgment for intervenor, and not rendering judgment in favor of defendant, in that intervenor’s judgment, which formed the basis of her intervention, was not conclusive, but only prima facie, and the facts adduced before, and reported by, the master, showed that such judgment was inequitable, unconscionable, against and without evidence to support it, and the facts so reported by the master imperatively demanded judgment for the defendant.”

The sole question presented for our decision is raised by appellant’s first assignment of error. That question is whether the judgment obtained by the appellee in the state court was conclusive upon the federal court, or only advisory to it. The contention of appellant is that all judgments obtained against a receiver in suits at law are but the trial of issues out of chancery, and are not conclusive on the court appointing the receiver. We cannot agree with this contention. The trial of an issue out of chancery is where the chancery court directs an issue to be tried by a jury. “It is intended to inform the conscience of the chancellor,” or to aid him where there is great difficulty in deciding upon the facts of a case. The order of a chancellor directing the issue at law is discretionary. In such case the verdict of the jury is only advisory, and never conclusive upon the court. The court renders the decree, but in doing so may disregard the finding of the jury, and render a decree contrary to it. 2 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. p. 1071; 1 Foster, Fed. Pr. § 805; Watt v. Starke, 101 U. S. 247, 25 L. ed. 826; Kohn v. McNulta, 147 U. S. 238, 37 L. ed. 150.

As said by Mr. Greenleaf in his work on Evidence, in section 262, vol. 3: “It is only where no right of the party is recognized by law, and where the resort to a jury is left to the discretion of the judge, in aid of his own judgment, that he is at liberty to disregard the finding of the jury, or to determine the facts for himself.”

Such is not this case. The court whose receiver appellant was did not direct the issue on which appellee’s judgment was obtained to be tried by a jury, and did not render the judgment thereon. The suit in which the judgment was obtained was not instituted by leave of the court, but was brought as a matter of right,—a right conferred by the Act of Congress of March 3, 1887, which provides that every receiver appointed by any court of the United States may be sued without the previous leave of the court. Prior to that act of congress the rule was that a receiver could not be sued without leave of the court of equity which appointed him. That act abrogates the old rule. The court now has no discretion to say when its receiver may be sued. The act of congress gives the right without condition or qualification. It gives the right to sue the receiver in any court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties. The counsel for appellant concedes that the act referred to gave appellee “an absolute, unqualified, and indisputable right of trial by jury, and in the forum of her own selection.” She selected the state court, and the proceeding therein was on a legal claim, and was purely a common-law proceeding. It had no element of equitable jurisdiction in it. The suit was to recover damages for a personal injury caused by the negligence of the receiver, or his agents, in operating a railroad as a common carrier. On such a cause of action a receiver can be sued in any court of competent jurisdiction. Central Trust Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. 40 Fed. Rep. 426, 41 Fed. Rep. 551; Dillingham v. Anthony, 73 Tex. 50, 3 L. R. A. 634.

If, then, the right of trial by jury was given by the act of congress, it was given subject to the constitutional provision that “no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.” U. S. Const. Amend. 7.

In Pearsons v. Bedford, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 446, 7 L. ed. 773, the court says, in speaking of this provision of the constitution: “This is a prohibition to the courts of the United States to re-examine any facts tried by a jury in any other manner. . . . The only modes known to the common law, to re-examine such facts, are the granting of a new trial by the court where the issue was tried, or to which the record was properly returnable, or the award of a venire facias de novo by an appellate court for some error of law which intervened in the proceedings.”

In the case of New York Sup. Ct. Justices v. Murray, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 274, 19 L. ed. 658, the supreme court says that the provision in the Seventh Amendment of the Constitution of the United States which declares that “no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of common law,” applies to the facts tried by a jury in a cause in a state court. The claim on which appellee’s judgment was obtained was a legal, not an equitable, demand. It was adjudicated eated in the state court of Texas, wherein appellant, being duly served with process, appeared as defendant, and contested the same. The federal court having no appellate or supervisory jurisdiction over such proceedings, it cannot re-examine the facts constituting the cause of action on which the judgment was rendered, or annul, vacate, or in any manner modify, the judgment. Central Trust Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. supra.

But, it is said that, while the act of congress grants leave to sue, it expressly provides that "such suits shall be subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court in which such receiver was appointed so far as the same shall be necessary to the ends of justice;" and it is contended that this provision of the act precludes any departure from the established chancery practice. It is true that the act does contain such provision. But considering it in the light of, and as in harmony with, the Seventh Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, we must construe it as applying only to suits which seek to interfere with the receiver's possession of property, and to process the execution of which would have that effect; any process, whether for the recovery of such property, or for the enforcement and collection of a judgment out of it. These shall be subject to the control of the court appointing the receiver, so far as the ends of justice may require. The time when, and the manner in which, a judgment against the receiver shall be paid; the adjustment of equities between all persons having claims against the property in his hands; the just distribution of the funds according to the rights of the several parties interested in it,—all must necessarily be under the control of the court having custody of the property by its receiver, and shall be subject to its general equity jurisdiction. Dillingham v. Anthony, supra.

This, we think, is the true meaning of the statute referred to. We can perceive no other reasonable interpretation of it. Any other interpretation would impute to congress a very useless act. We agree with the learned judge who pronounced the opinion in the case of Central Trust Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co., supra, when he says that "the right to sue the receiver in the state court would be of little utility if its judgment could be annulled or modified at the discretion of this [federal] court," to which it is presented as a claim against the fund or property in the hands of the receiver. The judgment of the state court is conclusive as to the existence and amount of the appellee's claim, but the time and manner of its payment must be controlled by the court appointing the receiver. A judgment may be complete and perfect, and have full effect, independent of the right to issue execution. Mills v. Duryee, 11 U. S. 7 Cranch, 481, 8 L. ed. 411.

The decree of the circuit court is in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion, and it is affirmed.

Pardee, Circuit Judge:

I concur with the conclusion reached, but not with all the reasoning of the majority.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of North Carolina, Appt.,

Charles EASON.

(.....N. C.)

1. The jurisdiction of a municipality, bounded by a navigable river, does not extend beyond low-water mark, in the absence of anything in the charter extending the limit of its jurisdiction expressly or by fair implication.

2. An ordinance prohibiting the throwing of fish or offal into a river is void for lack of jurisdiction, where the boundary of the municipality is the low-water line of the river.

(February 20, 1894.)

NOTE.—Boundary of municipality on navigable stream.

The attempt to determine the law on the subject of the boundary of municipal corporations by navigable streams is not altogether satisfactory since the decisions exactly in point are few and apparently conflicting.

That the same rule governs as to boundaries on streams of water of incorporated territories, and of lands of individuals, is declared in Ft. Smith & V. B. Bridge Co. v. Hawkins, 12 L. R. A. 487, 54 Ark. 500, which was the case of a navigable river, and it is there held, in harmony with the main case, that the boundary of an incorporated town or city on a navigable river in Arkansas, like that of an individual proprietor, extends only to high-water mark, although the county boundary goes to the middle of the channel.

In this case the act of incorporation declared the corporate limits to be "the same metes and bounds as designated" on a map previously made by the owners of the land and as private ownership only 23 L. R. A.

extended to high-water mark, this remained the boundary of the incorporation.

The channel of the Connecticut river between Lyme and Saybrook is not within the patented limits of either town, the former of which is bounded by the "channel of the Connecticut river" and the other is bounded "by" or "on" the Connecticut river; but by virtue of ancient, infallible, and undisputed uses the towns bordering on the river have jurisdiction to the center of the channel, and constables may serve process to that line. Pratt v. State, 5 Conn. 388.

A by-law passed by one of these towns in respect to taking oysters in the Connecticut river was held not to have been legally passed, but the court did not consider the question of the power to pass it. Hayden v. Noyes, 5 Conn. 381.

In Pennsylvania it is held that the boundary of a city on a navigable fresh water river, like the Susquehanna at Wilkes Barre does not extend below low-water mark, and consequently coal beds under the river cannot be taxed by such city, even if they APPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Superior Court for Beaufort County acquitting the defendant of a charge of violating a town ordinance. Affirmed.

The town of Beaufort was incorporated with the following boundaries: Beginning at a cedar post upon Pamlico River, the eastern corner of the Macnair land and being the same cedar post referred to in the Private Laws of one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five, section three of chapter one hundred and nine, and thence running with the eastern line of the Macnair land north thirty-four degrees east to its intersection with a line drawn two hundred and ten feet north of and parallel with Fifth street; thence with the said intersecting line to the east side of Market street; thence northerly with the eastern line of Market street extended a distance of nine hundred and forty-five feet; thence westwardly on a line parallel with fifth street to its intersection with a line drawn two hundred and ten feet west of and parallel with Washington street; thence with the said intersecting line on a line parallel with Washington street to the north side of Fourth street extended; thence with the north side of Fourth street extended westwardly a distance of one thousand five hundred and eighty-four feet; thence on a line parallel with Washington street to Pamlico river, and thence with the river to the beginning. Laws of 1891 (Private), chap. 110, § 2.

The affidavit on which defendant was arrested was as follows: "On the 31st of September, 1893, before me, E. M. Short, mayor are not taxable elsewhere. Gilchrist's App. 109 Pa. 600. No reference is made in this case to Neal v. Com. in ra.

These cases clearly proceed on the theory that municipal boundaries are to be regarded the same as those of private property with respect to rules of construction, but they do not in any way deny the possibility of the extension of municipal boundaries to the center of a navigable river or even to the opposite shore when that is the state boundary, and the question becomes one of legislative intent in the creation of the municipality.

The jurisdiction of the mayor's court of Philadelphia extends to the Jersey shore, subject to the limitations specified in the compact between Pennsylvania and New Jersey, giving the states concurrent jurisdiction of the river. The Incorporating Act of 1788 declares that Philadelphia is laid out between the rivers Delaware and Schuylkill and makes a reference to the Penn charter, in which nearly the same words are used, but in which the authority of the city over the building of wharves is recognized. Neal v. Com. 17 Serg. & R. 67.

The court in this case says that there is nothing in the statute directly bearing on the question, and bases its decision largely on grounds of expediency.

That the corporate limits of a village bounded by a navigable river extend to the middle of the river is decided in Marseilles v. Kiner, 34 Ill. App. 335, and Marseilles v. Howland, 23 Ill. App. 101, affirmed 124 Ill. 547, in respect to the liability of a village for negligence in respect to the condition of a bridge across such river. These cases do not show the description of the boundary, but it is said in 23 Ill. App. 106, that this is the boundary "by the terms of its charter and as matter of law."

The west boundary of East St. Louis has been held in several cases to be the state line of Illinois in the middle of the Mississippi river. Buttenuth v. St. Louis Bridge Co. 123 Ill. 553; St. Louis Bridge Co. v. People, 125 Ill. 226; St. Louis Bridge Co. v. East St. Louis, 121 Ill. 238.

The eastern boundary of the city of St. Louis is, like the eastern boundary of the state, the middle of the Mississippi river under its charter, by which its boundary begins at a mill on the bank of the Mississippi, then following several calls returns "to the Mississippi" and "from thence by the Mississippi to the place first mentioned." Jones v. Soulard, 65 U. S. 24 How. 41, 16 L. ed. 604; St. Louis Public Schools v. Risley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 91, 19 L. ed. 850.

The court in Jones v. Soulard, supra, applied the general doctrine that "all grants of land bounded by fresh water rivers, where the expressions designating the water line are general, confer the proprietorship on the grantee to the middle thread of the stream, and entitle him to the accretions."

the western boundary of Water street in the village of Brooklyn, Ill., is held to be the center of the Mississippi river, so that the village corporation is the owner of ice formed on this part of the river. The town was laid out with a street marked on a plat as running along the river front, although with the width stated at 80 feet, but this width was held not to control.

These decisions by the federal and Illinois courts do not make any distinction between municipal and private boundaries and seem to proceed on the theory that boundary of property by any fresh water stream whether navigable in fact or not will extend to the thread of the stream. In states therefore which deny private riparian ownership of the beds of navigable rivers these decisions are not controlling and it would seem reasonable to say that where municipal boundaries are described in general terms with reference to a navigable river the same construction will be given to the description that would be given if it was a case of private boundary.

Where a river is not navigable this rule is clearly established that the center of the stream is the boundary of an incorporated territory. Cold Spring Iron Works v. Tolland, 9 Cush. 492; Re Ipswich, 13 Pick. 431.

That the center of the river is the dividing line between towns separated by the Kennebec river is recited in Hall v. Benton, 69 Me. 846.

In Perkies v. Oxford, 66 Me. 545, it is said that the same rule applies to the boundary of towns in an act of incorporation as in a deed, where the boundary is on a fresh water stream.

Towns on the Connecticut and Merrimac rivers are held in State v. Canterbury, 23 N. H. 195, to extend to the middle of the river, and it is said that there is no sufficient ground to doubt the propriety of applying the ordinary rules of construction to all unnavigable rivers.

In State v. Columbia, 27 S. C. 137, the center of the Congaree river was held to be the boundary of the city of Columbia, where the tract had been laid off by commissioners and marked on a map by lines showing three sides, with the river for the other side. The river seems to have been regarded as not technically navigable, although it is said that the proprietary right to the center of the stream is subject to the right of the public to use such stream for transportation as a highway, where it is in fact, though not technically navigable, or may be made so by removal of obstructions.

In Louisville Bridge Co. v. Louisville, 81 Ky. 189, it is recited that the corporate limits of the city of Louisville extend to low-water mark on the opposite shore of the Ohio river, although it is held that municipal taxes cannot be levied on the bridge, because there is no benefit which can amount to of Washington, N. C., personally appeared J. R. Grist, who, being duly sworn, complains, on oath, and says that Charles Eason did on the 20th of September, 1893, in violation of the town ordinance No. 11, in force in said town, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state."

The warrant was as follows: "You are hereby commanded forthwith to arrest Charles Eason, and him safely keep, so you have him before me at my office in Washington immediately to answer the above complaint, and be dealt with as the law directs."

The jury rendered a special verdict, as follows:

consideration therefor. The case does not, however, state the grounds on which the city limits are said to extend across the river, whether they are expressly defined by the act of incorporation, or whether they are by implication extended to the state boundary, which as shown in the note to Buck v. Ellenbolt (Iowa) 15 L. R. A. 187, is on the north side of the river.

The same declaration as to the boundary of the city of Henderson is made in Henderson Bridge Co. v. Henderson, 90 Ky. 498, in which a bridge across the river is held taxable, at least for railroad and school taxes, to the northern shore by the city of Henderson, under a reservation of power to tax in an ordinance giving permission to build the bridge.

The city and county of New York under the statutes includes the whole of the rivers and harbor to actual low-water mark on the opposite shores, and therefore a floating vessel made fast to the end of a wharf or dock on the East river on the Brooklyn or Long Island shore is within the city of New York so as to be outside the jurisdiction of a licensed measurer of grain for the village of Brooklyn. Stryker v. New York, 19 Johns. 179.

Whatever rights of property the corporation of New York may have in the made land on Long Island shore of the river, such territory is, for all purposes of police regulation at least, within the city of Brooklyn. Re Furman Street, 17 Wend. 649.

A floating elevator lying inside the piers on the Brooklyn side of the East river below the low-water mark is not in Brooklyn so as to charge that city with liability for its destruction by a mob. Orr v. Brooklyn, 38 N. Y. 665.

But a pier on piles, although below the original line of low-water mark on the Brooklyn side of the East river is in Brooklyn, and the city may be held liable for its destruction by a mob. Atlantic Dock Co. v. Brooklyn, 3 Keyes, 445, 1 Abb. App. Dec. 24.

The village of Brooklyn was held in Udall v. Brooklyn Trustees, 19 Johns. 175, to include all the wharves and made land on the Long Island shore of the East river, where it formed the boundary, as well as natural alluvion to the actual line of low-water; and therefore an ordinance as to the measuring of grain is in force on a wharf or dock within those limits.

The jurisdiction of the city of Brooklyn must from necessity follow the shore as it advances into the river or bay whether the accretion proceeds from alluvion or artificial deposits and erections, therefore a grain elevator situated on a dock upon the Brooklyn side of New York bay is within the city of Brooklyn, and the city may be liable for permitting its destruction by a mob. Luke v. Brooklyn, 43 Barb. 54.

So a statute authorizing the city of Brooklyn to open a street to the "East river and to the permanent bulk-head line" means that the street may be extended to the shore of the river, wherever it may

"That the town of Washington is bounded on the south by Pamlico river, which is a navigable stream, and the boundaries of the said town are set forth in chapter 110 of Priv. Laws 1891, and the cedar post referred to is on the bank of the said river. That the fish house hereinafter described is situated as follows: The northern sill of the said house rests upon the wharf log, which said wharf log is beyond the natural low-water mark, being the end of the made land which was made prior to 1891. That the wharf at the said point extends further out in the river than the wharves immediately to the east and west of the said wharf, and the said wharves mark the present shore line of said river, and be at any time by change of line. Re Brooklyn, 73 N. Y. 179.

To the same effect the description in the charter of the village of Edgewater of its boundary "along the lower and upper Bay of New York" is not intended to give an absolute and fixed boundary to the shore as it then existed, but to give a boundary which will shift with the change of the shore by natural causes, or by the erection of artificial structures for the purpose of commerce. Bechtel v. Edgewater, 45 Hun, 240.

In Tebbo v. Brooklyn, 134 N. Y. 341, it was said that the boundaries of Brooklyn having been changed, it was claimed that they extended now below low-water mark, but this question was not decided.

The bounds of the city of Albany were, by the Laws of 1828, extended to the middle of the Hudson river. Hart v. Albany, 9 Wend. 602, 24 Am. Dec. 165.

An act extending the bounds of the town of Flushing in Queens county, N. Y., over the bay and into the sound of East river, so as to include islands eastward of the main channel, was held in Palmer v. Hicks, 6 Johns. 133, to be merely for the purpose of jurisdiction, but did not give the town title to the land under water, or power to prohibit the catching of clams below ordinary low-water mark.

In New Jersey, the town of Camden, formerly incorporated as the city of Camden, was expressly bounded by the Pennsylvania state line in the Delaware river, and, although the states had concurrent jurisdiction of the river, it was held that the court of oyer and terminer in Camden had no jurisdiction of crime on the river beyond the county line (State v. Davis, 25 N. J. L. 386), but in a footnote to the case it was said that by Statute March 14, 1856, this defect of jurisdiction was remedied.

But the boundaries of townships and counties as distinguished from municipal corporations are not regarded as within the scope of this note, and will not be here considered.

Under the proclamation fixing the western boundary of a town in Fiji as the seacoast at high-water mark, and the eastern boundary at a specified distance therefrom, the northern and southern boundaries to connect the eastern, all lines of specified lengths with certain points on the high-water mark, the western boundary varies from time to time as the high-water mark shifts, but the eastern boundary is absolutely fixed. Smart v. Suva Town Board [1898] A. C. 301.

The fixing of the boundary line by harbor and land commissioners between the tide waters of the town of Hull and the city of Boston has no effect on the title to land never covered by tide water, whether it be an island or on the main land. Russ v. Boston, 157 Mass. 60.

The two cases last cited do not touch boundaries on navigable streams but are added as somewhat similar to those above considered. B. A. R.

the present low-water mark. That the water at the end of all of said wharves is of sufficient depth to be navigated. That, from said wharf said house is built on piles driven in the bed of the river, and extending about thirty feet out from said wharf over the water. That the water of the river flows under said house; is of sufficient depth to be navigated, if it were not for said piles. That the southern end of said house borders on the channel of the river. That Wynne and Gaskill have boats to land at said fish house, from which boats they receive fish. That the river is about four hundred yards wide at this point. That ordinance 11 of the town forbids the throwing of dead fish into said river, and the penalty is five dollars. That on the 20th day of September, 1893, the defendant threw dead fish into said river from said fish house. That the said fish house was built over the said water by one J. R. Wynne, under a license regularly issued by the commissioners of navigation for the port of Washington, granted on March 31, 1892. That if, upon these facts, the defendant is guilty in law, the jury say for their verdict that the defendant is guilty; and if, upon these facts, in law he is not guilty, the jury say for their verdict, 'Not guilty.' Upon these facts, the court, being of opinion that the defendant was not within the corporate limits of the town, directed the jury to render a verdict of not guilty, and thereupon the jury, under the instruction of the court, rendered a verdict of not guilty. The solicitor for the state, after verdict, moved to amend the warrant by inserting therein, after the figures "1893," the following words: "Did unlawfully and willfully throw dead fish into the Pamlico river in said town, in violation of the town ordinance No. 11 of the town of Washington, N. C." The court allowed this amendment, and the defendant excepted.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. W. B. Rodman for appellant.

Mr. Charles F. Warren, for the State:

The mayor or chief officer of every city or incorporated town, within the corporate limits, has the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace in all criminal matters arising under the laws of the state, or under the ordinances of said city or town.

Code, § 8818.

The court has the power to amend any warrant, process, pleading, or proceeding of a justice of the peace, either in form or substance, at any time before or after judgment.

Code, § 908; State v. Norman, 110 N. C. 484.

While there is an absence of authority here upon such a case in an act defining the boundaries of a city or town, in other states it has been held to extend to the center of the stream.

Mr. Frank I. Osborne, Atty.-Gen., also for the State.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Our numerous long streams and large inland sounds come so clearly within the reason of the rule adopted, on account of the different conditions, in England, exclusively to waters subject to the ebb and flow of the tides, that it became necessary to establish here a new test of navigability, in determining what submerged land should be reserved as the property of the state, and what should be liable to appropriation by private persons by specific entry and grant, or should pass as incident to patents issued to riparian proprietors. The criterion in North Carolina is whether the stream, bay, or sound is navigable for seagoing vessels. Broadnax v. Baker, 94 N. C. 681, 55 Am. Rep. 633; Hodges v. Williams, 95 N. C. 331, 59 Am. Rep. 242; Angell, Watercourses, § 549, note; Collins v. Benbury, 25 N. C. 277, 88 Am. Dec. 723; Fagan v. Armistead, 33 N. C. 433.

While the bed of a stream navigable, or declared by the legislature to be navigable, for "sea vessels," is not subject to entry, the beds of streams that are large enough to subserve the purpose of highways for smaller boats, floats, rafts, and logs, but insufficient for seagoing vessels, may be granted specifically, or pass by deeds of riparian proprietors on both sides, running with rivers, and extending by construction ad flum aquæ, but subject to the easement of the public to use the channel as a highway. Bond v. Wool, 107 N. C. 149; State v. Glen, 52 N. C. 325; Williams v. Buchanan, 23 N. C. 535, 85 Am. Dec. 760; McNamee v. Alexander, 109 N. C. 244. The legislation in North Carolina has been generally in affirmance of the new rule so much better adapted to the nature of this country. Our statutes, with the exception of a short interval, have never permitted the issuing of grants to private individuals for the beds of streams navigable for sea vessels, even though not affected by the tides, beyond the deep-water line, at most. Bond v. Wool, supra; 1 Potter, Rev. 278; Rev. Stat. chap. 42, § 1; Acts 1777, chap. 114; Hatfield v. Grimstead, 29 N. C. 139; Code, § 2751; Laws 1889, chap. 555; Laws 1893, chap. 17.

It follows, therefore, that a grant to a riparian proprietor, running with a navigable stream such as the Pamlico river at Washington, from one designated point on its banks to another above or below on the same bank, must be so located as to extend, not ad flum aquæ, but only to the low-water mark along the margin of the stream. This court having uniformly interpreted such calls in grants to individuals as designating the low-water line, we know of no recognized rule of construction that would sustain us in giving a widely different meaning to the same language, when used by the legislature to define the limits of a town. Gould, in his work on Waters (sec. 202), says, in ascertaining the boundaries of towns: "The same rules of construction apply as in the case of a grant from one individual to another." A municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as are expressly granted by its charter, or are necessarily implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 89; Thompson v. Lee County, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 327, 18 L. ed. 177; Thomas v. Richmond, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 349, 20 L. ed. 453. "Any ambiguity or doubt arising out of the terms used by the legislature must be resolved in favor of the public." Minturn v. Larue, 64 U. S. 23 How. 436, 16 L. ed. 575. A municipality being thus restricted to the exercise of powers clearly intended to be delegated, it would seem that, if the same rigid rule of construction does not obtain in determining the territorial limits to which its authority extends, the location of the geographical limit of its territorial jurisdiction should, at all events, be determined just as similar calls of grants to individuals are located. "Because the local jurisdiction of the incorporated place is, in most cases, confined to the limits of the incorporation, it is necessary [says Dillon] that these limits be definitely fixed." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 182 (124). But the legislature unquestionably had the power to extend the jurisdiction of the town, for police purposes, to the middle of the river or to the opposite bank; and had the line been described as crossing to the other side when it reached the river, and running thence along that shore to a point opposite the beginning, thence to the beginning, the effect would have been to extend the boundary for the exercise of the power to prohibit nuisance, delegated to the town, across the adjacent bed of the river, while the territorial limit of its authority for all purposes other than the exercise of police powers would have been the low-water mark on the north bank. Barber v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205; Palmer v. Hicks, 6 Johns. 133; Ogdensburgh v. Lyon, 7 Lans. 215. We are aware that the authorities in this country are conflicting as to the location of boundaries along inland navigable streams, whether the controversy grows out of fixing the limits of a town or locating the lines of grant. We find that as a rule, however, the courts, in ascertaining the limits of towns, have followed their own rulings as to riparian grants. The common-law doctrine was recognized and applied at an early day by the courts of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Maryland, and Virginia, and later by Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and some other states. Angell, Watercourses, § 547. On the contrary the common-law rule was repudiated by Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Michigan, and other states, and a doctrine somewhat similar to the rule of the civil law was substituted for that adopted in England. Id. §§ 548-552; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 505; 16 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 236 et seq.; Id. p. 249 et seq.

In the comparatively recent case of Gilchrist's App., 109 Pa. 600, the supreme court of that state held that the limit of a municipality bounded by a navigable river is the low-water mark of that river, unless express language to the contrary is used in the act of incorporation. The question involved was whether the city of Wilkes Barre had the power to levy and collect a tax upon the coal beds under the bed of the river opposite to that city. The right of the city was denied by the court, and the decision rested upon the ground that a grant to an individual was construed to run with the low-water mark of a navigable stream, and the same rule should be applied in locating the boundaries of towns. The supreme court of Michigan, in Coldwater v. Tucker, 36 Mich. 474, 24 Am. Rep. 601, said: "The general doctrine is clear that a municipal corporation cannot usually exercise its powers beyond its own limits. If it has in any case authority to do so, the authority must be derived from some statute which expressly or impliedly permits it. There are cases where considerations of public policy have induced the legislature to grant such power." See also People v. Bouchard, 82 Mich. 158, 9 L. R. A. 106; Gould, Waters, § 86. In Palmer v. Hicks, 6 Johns. 133, and Stryker v. New York, 19 Johns. 179, cited for the plaintiff, it appeared that the legislature, in both instances, had extended the line of a city or town across the bed of a navigable stream, to the opposite bank; and the court decided that the statutes extended the jurisdiction of the city for police purposes, with the extended line. Any remark from which an inference may be drawn as to the location of a town limit, where the stream is called for, was therefore obiter, if, indeed, such inference is deducible from the language used by the court. The bed of a navigable stream, said the supreme court of New York in Ogdensburgh v. Lyon, 7 Lans. 215, "is still state, not United States, territory; and the state, or its municipalities under its authority, may pass laws or ordinances" not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, or the laws of congress enacted within its constitutional powers. In the case last cited, the question was whether the state could empower a city council to pass ordinances to prevent the casting into the adjacent harbor of matter calculated to obstruct it, where the authority had been delegated to the town by virtue of an express statute conferring it, not as an incident to the usual municipal powers, in the absence of a direct grant, expressly or by fair implication, of that particular power. In the section of Horst & Bemis (1 Mun. Ord. § 142) cited for the prosecution, it seems that the author, after embodying a sentence from Coldwater v. Tucker, supra, in which the supreme court of Michigan declared that a municipality could extend its police jurisdiction beyond its territorial limits only by virtue of a statute conferring such authority expressly or by necessary implication proceeds, in the same section, to state, as an inference drawn from the two cases already cited from Johnston's Reports, the proposition that, where two towns are situated on opposite banks of the same river, and the boundaries of both run with the river, though it is navigable, the dividing line will be the thread of the stream. No such conclusion was fairly deducible from those decisions, because, in both instances, as already stated, the whole bed of the stream had been expressly placed by statute under the police jurisdiction of one of the two riparian municipalities. Indeed, after a patient investigation of the whole subject, we have found but a single authority for the position that a grant calling for a navigable stream should be confined to the low-water mark, while a similar line in the boundaries of a municipality should run with the thread of the stream, and the opinion in that case was evidently not well considered, as the point was decided without any discussion whatever.

We think the rule laid down by the court of Pennsylvania, and approved by Gould, is the correct one,—that the same construction which is given to the description of the locus conveyed in deeds and grants to individuals must be placed upon similar language when used to define the boundaries of a municipality. We conclude, therefore, that where the state confers municipal powers upon a corporation, and describes the boundary as running with a navigable river, the jurisdiction of the municipality does not extend beyond the low-water mark, in the absence of some other language in the charter extending the limit of its jurisdiction expressly or by fair implication. We can readily conceive how the decayed fish and offal thrown into a river like the Pamlico, in front of Washington, where the influence of the tides is felt, may become an almost unendurable nuisance. But further annoyance might have been prevented by a proper amendment of the charter of the town, and may still be obviated by legislation in the future. Meantime, unless the powers of the commissioners of navigation, under section 3587, can be invoked to protect those who suffer from the stench by this offensive matter floating upon the river or lodging on the banks, we deem it more important that the court should be reasonable and consistent in its rulings, so as to inspire confidence in their justice and stability, than that some of its citizens should be relieved, without delay, of even so sore a grievance. We think, therefore, that there was no error in the ruling of the court below that, even upon a warrant sufficient in form, the defendant could not be convicted for a violation of the ordinance prohibiting the throwing of fish or offal into the river beyond the limit of its jurisdiction, the low-water line, and the judgment must be affirmed. In view of the peculiar hardship to the people interested, of enduring this annoyance, we suggest, also, an investigation of the question whether the facts as to the conduct of this particular defendant, or the facts in any other case of creating a stench in the river, which is a public highway, by casting fish or offal into it, would sustain an indictment for nuisance at common law. Com. v. Sweeney, 181 Mass. 579; State v. Wolf, 112 N. C. 889.

Counsel on both sides discussed the question whether the court had the power, after verdict, to amend the warrant, which before charged that the defendant "did on the 20th day of September, 1893, in violation of ordinance 11, §—, of the ordinances in force of the said town of Washington, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state," by inserting the specific charge of throwing dead fish into Pamlico river. As the ordinance embraced eight distinct charges that might have been made,—seven others besides that set forth in the amendment,—we deem it a matter of such importance as to make it proper to say that the question is still an open one, which we refrain from discussing, because it is not essential to the final disposition of this particular case to do so.

Affirmed.

v.

City of ELIZABETH.

(.....N. J.....)

*1. The Act of the legislature of this state entitled "An Act Concerning the Maintaining of Race-courses in This State, and to Provide for the Licensing and

*Headnotes by LIPPINCOTT, J.

Regulating of the Same," passed February 27, 1893 (P. L. 1893, p. 23), is a special law, regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties, and also a special law granting to corporations, associations, or individuals exclusive privileges, immunities, or franchises, and is therefore unconstitutional and void.

2. Municipal government is a creation of the statute, and the powers of municipal government may extend to almost every feature of regulation not inhibited by the constitution within the area over which it extends. Such powers then become matters regu-

NOTE.—Special legislation as affecting municipal corporations or territorial divisions of a state is a subject that has been much considered in recent years under the constitutional restrictions of some of the states and is especially perplexing in many of its phases. The opinion in the above is a valuable addition to the subject which had already been treated very fully in some earlier cases in this series, viz.: Ayar's App. (Pa.) 2 L. R. A. 577, and note; Re Washington Sreet (Pa.) 7 L. R. A. 193, and note; King v. State (Tenn.) 8 L. R. A. 28 L. R. A.

lating the internal affairs of such municipal governments.

3. This statute affords no proper and appropriate classification of race-courses between those in use prior to January 1, 1893, and those set up after that date, as will support the application to each of a system of legislation so distinctive and different as the two methods of licensing provided by this act.

(January 6, 1894.)

CERTIORARI to the City Council of the City of Elizabeth to review certain resolutions purporting to grant a license to the New Jersey Jockey Club to maintain a race-course in said city. Resolutions set aside.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Depue, Lippincott, and Abbott, JJ.

Messrs. R. V. Lindabury, John R. Emery, and Joseph Cross, for prosecutors.

Mr. Allan L. McDermott, for defendants:

Before the passage of the Act of 1893 the things authorized to be done under these licenses could be lawfully done on any race-course owned by an incorporated association.

Laws 1890, p. 196, §§ 1, 2.

If the license granted by the municipal authorities should, in these proceedings, be set aside, and the law under which that license was granted be held unconstitutional, the association could, nevertheless, proceed to do all those things which this license purports to authorize.

McLean v. State, 49 N. J. L. 471; Haring v. State, 51 N. J. L. 386.

If these licenses are nullified, these defendants will not thereupon be placed at any disadvantage. They will not, by such invalidation, become indictable or punishable for doing the things licensed by the municipal authorities.

The authority to license is properly reposed.

State v. Morris County Common Pleas Ct. 36 N. J. L. 76, 18 Am. Rep. 422.

The constitutionality of the Act of 1893 is assailed "because notwithstanding it is private, local, and special, it purports to regulate and does regulate the internal affairs of towns and counties."

It provides that there shall not be any track licensed within the municipal limits of a city "having a population of more than one hundred thousand, according to the census last taken," before application is made for a license. It is not open to the objections sustained in State v. Jersey City, 45 N. J. L. 298.

The legislative declaration is that there shall not be, in our largest cities, any race-tracks where horses shall be run for prizes. In all other municipalities such race-courses may be licensed. The only question here is whether there is such a relation between the subject-matter of this legislation (i. e., the maintaining of race-courses within this state), and the magnitude of the population of the places from which such courses are excluded, as will justify such exclusion. If such exists the line of demarcation is for legislative location. State v. Wood, 49 N. J. L. 85; State v. Hoagland, 51 N. J. L. 62; Moriland v. State, 52 N. J. L. 521; State v. Clayton, 53 N. J. L. 277.

It is within the legislative power to prohibit the maintenance of these race-courses anywhere in the state, to regulate or prohibit the competitions of speed or the awarding of prizes.

The law does not attempt to differentiate the repository of the licensing power. The system of granting licenses under the Act of 1893 is not open to the objections held in State v. Morris County Common Pleas Ct. 43 N. J. L. 631, and State v. Trenton Board of Licenses & Excise, 48 N. J. L. 439, and other cases where statutes have been invalidated because of unconstitutional repose of the licensing power. Here the power may be exercised by the same municipal authorities in all counties.

In State v. Gloucester County Circuit Ct. Judge, 1 L. R. A. 86, 50 N. J. L. 609, Justice Van Syckel says: "The inhibition in the constitution is not intended to secure uniformity in the exercise of delegated police powers, but to forbid the passing of a law vesting in one town or county the power of local government not granted to another."

The objection of the prosecutors is that the act "purports to grant, and does grant to certain corporations and individuals therein mentioned an exclusive privilege, immunity, and franchise."

The section is another exercise of police power, to say within what grounds racing shall be allowed for purses, etc. It is as though the legislature should say that no place not heretofore licensed for the sale of liquor shall be so licensed if two thirds of the licensing power shall not agree.

It is a regulation of the number of places for which licenses may be granted. The law is not regarding ownership, but regulating the places which may be used for purposes properly the subject of police regulation. If, however, the court shall deem this section unconstitutional, it may be rejected without invalidating the balance of the act.

State v. Kelsey, 44 N. J. L. 1; Central R. Co. v. State Board of Assessors, 49 N. J. L. 1; Williams v. Bettie, 51 N. J. L. 512.

Messrs. Samuel Kalisch, Chauncey H. Beasley, and James A. Connolly also for defendants.

Lippincott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ brings into this court for review and adjudication certain resolutions of the city council of the city of Elizabeth, passed at a meeting of the city council on April 1, 1893, purporting to grant a license, or to be a license, to or for the New Jersey jockey club, to maintain a race-course in said city, for running, racing, trotting, or pacing horses, mares, or geldings, for a purse, plate, stake, or other thing. On that day the New Jersey jockey club presented a petition to the city council of the city of Elizabeth requesting that a license be granted to them under and by virtue of the provisions of chapter 16, Laws 1893, to maintain a race-course for racing, running, trotting, or pacing of horses.

mares, or geldings, for a purse, plate, or other thing to be run, paced, or trotted for by such horses, mares, or geldings, on their grounds, in the city of Elizabeth, as named in said act. Upon the presentation of his petition, the city council adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, that the New Jersey jockey club is hereby licensed for a period of five years to maintain and use a race-course in this city for the running, racing, trotting, or pacing of horses, mares, or geldings, for a purse, plate, stake, or other thing; the said race-course being the one used by the New Jersey jockey club for such running, trotting, or pacing prior to the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-three." In addition to this resolution there were some other resolutions adopted at such meeting, imposing conditions as to the management of such race-course, and requiring the payment to the city of Elizabeth of the sum of $5,000 for the privilege granted under and by virtue of the license, and also limiting the time in each year of racing on such race-course to a period of thirty days in the fall and thirty days in the spring of each year during the continuance of the license. The adoption by the city council of those resolutions is attempted to be justified by the defendants under the provisions of an Act of the legislature of this state, entitled "An Act Concerning the Maintaining of Race-courses in this State, and to Provide for the Licensing and Regulating of the Same," passed February 27, 1893 (Pub. Laws 1893, p. 28). By the first section of this Act it is provided "that the board of chosen freeholders of any county in this state, or board of aldermen, common council, township committee, or other body having general charge of the affairs of any city, township, or municipal division of this state, in which there is situated and maintained a race-course for the racing, running, trotting or pacing of horses, mares or geldings, for a purse, plate, or other thing to be run, paced or trotted for by such horses, mares, or geldings, shall have power and is hereby authorized to license the owners of such race-course to maintain and use the same for any running, pacing or trotting of any horses, mares or geldings, for any purse or stake, plate or other thing; such license shall be for a period of not more than five years, and no license shall be granted for the maintenance or use of a race-course within the corporate limits of any city having a population of more than one hundred thousand people according to the census last taken." By the third section it is provided "that it shall be unlawful for any person or incorporated body or association to maintain or use a race-course in this state, for the racing, running, trotting or pacing of horses, mares or geldings, for a purse, plate, or other thing, or to permit such running, racing, trotting or pacing upon any grounds owned or leased or controlled by such person or incorporated body or association, unless license for that purpose shall be granted as in this act provided. Any license granted under this act shall become void upon any breach of any condition upon which it shall be granted." By the fourth section it is provided "that it shall not be lawful for any person or incorporated body or association to maintain or use in this state, for the running, trotting or pacing of horses, mares or geldings, for a purse, plate or other thing to be run, paced or trotted for by such horses, mares or geldings, any race-course which was not used for such running, trotting or pacing, prior to the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, unless such person or incorporated body or association shall first file with the secretary of state a certified copy of a resolution adopted by three fourths of the members of the board of chosen freeholders of the county in which such race-course is proposed to be maintained, which resolution shall declare that the maintaining of such race-course is a public necessity."

The question whether this act is one which regulates the internal affairs of towns and counties has been extensively discussed in the arguments and briefs of counsel in this cause, and it has been seriously contended by the defendants that this act is not within the meaning of the language of paragraph 11, section 7, article 4, of the Constitution of this state, referring to laws "regulating internal affairs of towns and counties."

It will be perceived by the first section of this act power to license is conferred upon the boards of chosen freeholders, or the board of aldermen, common council, township committee, or other body having general charge of the affairs of any city, township, or municipal division of this state in which there is situated and maintained a race-course of the character named in this section, and it also provides that no license shall be granted for the maintaining or use of a race-course within the corporate limits of any city having a population of 100,000 people, according to the census last taken. The second section provides that these licenses shall be granted only upon certain expressed conditions, and the third section provides that it shall be unlawful for any person or incorporated body or association to maintain or use a race-course of the character named in the act unless the license for that purpose shall have been granted as in the act provided, and that any license granted under this act shall become void upon the breach of any condition upon which it shall be granted. This act undoubtedly confers power upon the municipalities named in the first and fourth sections in a direction in which it has not been heretofore exercised. It may be that, primarily, racing within this state is not a question which concerns the internal affairs of towns or counties, but it cannot be well contended that a statute which confers power upon these municipalities to restrict, limit, or extend racing is a statute which does not demonstrably affect the internal affairs of such municipalities, within the meaning of the express inhibition of the constitution forbidding the enactment of a certain character of statutes regulating such affairs. The statute, on its face and by its express conditions, renders racing of a certain character unlawful unless the powers conferred on these municipalities are exercised to permit it. The third section of the act expressly declares that racing of the character mentioned in the act shall be unlawful unless it be legalized by a license which can only be granted by the governing body having general charge of the affairs of such municipalities, and certainly the statute in this respect is dealing with a question of municipal government, and whether it be one of police, revenue, or some other power of municipal government is quite immaterial. Municipal government is a creation of statute, and the powers of municipal government may extend to almost every feature of regulation not inhibited by the constitution within the area over which it extends. It becomes a matter of the internal regulation of the affairs of the municipality by force of the statute, and it cannot be claimed, so far as the statute is concerned, to be a question any longer of state policy, but a matter relating to the internal affairs of the municipality to which it applies. It becomes the power of the municipality. If the general subject-matter here, as contained in this statute, be one over which the legislature has power and jurisdiction, then it cannot be contended, when its power is conferred upon any municipality, aside from the question of whether the statute be invalid or not, that such matter does not become the internal affair of such municipality. It may be superfluous to pursue this subject further, but on decided authority there can exist no question but that this statute is one regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties. In State v. Camden, 40 N. J. L. 187 (in this court), Justice Reed says: "The establishment of a municipality, whether by custom, royal charter, or legislative grant, carries with it certain incidental powers essential to its existence as a body politic. In addition to these incidental powers, others are granted, or the incidental powers regulated by express provision in their respective charters. All these matters which are the subject of control by the municipality incidentally, or which already exist, or may thereafter be conferred by grant, concern the internal affairs of the city. Any attempt to strip a city of any such power, or to confer upon it additional power, or to change the manner of exercising the power already existing, is a regulation of such internal affairs. The largest field for the municipal action is afforded in the exercise of the power to suppress nuisances, prevent disorders, preserve the health and safety of the citizens, by virtue of its right to invoke and administer the police power of the state. The control of the vending of spirituous liquors has been the subject of such regulation almost from the beginning of government." The cases of State v. Camden County Common Pleas Ct. 41 N. J. L. 497; State v. Morris County Common Pleas Ct. 42 N. J. L. 632; Highstown v. Glenn, 47 N. J. L. 105-108; State v. Gloucester County Circuit Ct. Judge, 50 N. J. L. 809, 1 L. R. A. 86; State v. Newark, 40 N. J. L. 550; State v. Hammer, 42 N. J. L. 440; Hammer v. State, 44 N. J. L. 667,—all illustrate and enlarge this principle. Here under this statute, the machinery provided to accomplish the purposes of this act is municipal. The board which exercises the power conferred by the act is a municipal board. The revenues derived by the resolutions of the city council of Elizabeth, resulting from the granting of this license, go into the city treasury. And, within the authority of the adjudicated cases in this state this statute regulates the internal affairs of towns and counties by conferring upon them powers which before this time they did not possess, and placing within their control and regulation matters over which previously they exercised no control. These matters are such as affect the public welfare. Practices affecting the public are made lawful or unlawful by the exercise or nonexercise of a power conferred upon the municipal governing bodies. This power, then, becomes a part of the municipal government. This statute is one which, so far as this case is concerned, clearly regulates the internal affairs of the city of Elizabeth. The contention here, then, on the part of the prosecutors, is that this statute is unconstitutional, in that it is a local or special law, contrary to paragraph 11, section 7, article 4, of the amended Constitution of this state, which provides that "the legislature shall not pass private, local, or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases: . . . Regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties; . . . granting to any corporation, association, or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever." I think it requires but a cursory examination of this statute to conclude beyond question that it is affected by both these vices, and is upon these grounds unconstitutional, and therefore invalid.

There was much discussion upon the question whether the Act was not invalid upon the ground that, by the first section thereof, it could have no operation in cities having a population of more than 100,000 people, according to the census last taken. This objection to this statute is not here either discussed or determined. By the first section of the Act, power is conferred upon the governing body of any county, city, township, or other municipal division of this state, in which there was situated and maintained a race-course of the sort therein named to grant a license to the owner of such race-course to use and maintain such race-course for any running, etc., in the manner therein characterized; but this power to thus license is, by the fourth section of the Act, restricted to race-courses used for such purposes prior to the 1st day of January, 1898. This fourth section prohibits any person or incorporated body or association from maintaining or using any race course for the running, trotting, or racing of horses, mares, or geldings, for a purse, plate, or other thing to be run, paced, or trotted for by such horses, mares, or geldings, which was not used for such purposes prior to January 1, 1898, unless such person or incorporated body or association shall obtain a resolution adopted by three fourths of the members of the board of freeholders of the county in which such race-course is proposed to be maintained, which resolution shall declare the maintaining of such race course is a public necessity, a certified copy of which resolution shall be filed with the secretary of state. It will be seen that a discrimination is at once made by this act in favor of localities, and race-courses therein situated, maintained, and used prior to the 1st day of January, 1898, and against race-courses to be maintained and used after that time. In the former, and with respect to race-courses therein licenses may be granted by the governing bodies of the municipalities named in the first section of the Act, without qualification or restriction; but with respect to the latter—i. e. race-courses to be maintained and used after the 1st of January, 1898—a condition is imposed; that is, a resolution must be adopted by three-fourths of the chosen freeholders of the county, which shall declare the race-course a public necessity. Besides the requirement that a race-course proposed to be maintained and used after the 1st day of January, 1898, shall be licensed by a three-fourths vote of the board of chosen freeholders of the county, there is added the exceedingly onerous condition of a declaration on the part of the board of chosen freeholders that the race-course proposed to be maintained is a public necessity. In passing upon the constitutionality of such discriminative restrictive acts, and the classifications thereby created, the substance of the legislative provision is regarded, giving only secondary consideration to the form in which it is expressed; and while, under the clause of the constitution just cited, objects may be classified for the purposes of legislation, such classification must be founded upon some natural or substantial difference, and such classification must include all the objects to which the legislation enacted for the particular class is appropriate or necessary. State v. New Brunswick, 43 N. J. L. 51. The rule of law applicable is stated in the language of the chief justice in State v. Parsons, 40 N. J. L. 1, as follows: "Within the sense of these prohibitory clauses of the constitution, a general law, as contradistinguished from one special or local, is a law that embraces a class of subjects or places, and does not omit any subject or place naturally belonging to such class. . . . Interdicted local and special laws are all those that rest on a false or deficient classification. Their vice is that they do not embrace all the class to which they are naturally related. They create preference and establish inequalities. They apply to persons, things, or places possessed of certain qualities or situations, and exclude from their effect other persons, things or places which are not dissimilar in these respects." In State v. Hammer, 42 N. J. L. 440, the chief justice again says: "The true principle requires something more than a mere designation by such characteristics as will serve to classify, for the characteristics which thus serve as the basis of a classification must be of such a nature as to mark the objects so designated as peculiarly requiring exclusive legislation. There must be a substantial distinction, having a reference to the subject-matter of the proposed legislation, between the objects or places embraced in such legislation and the objects or places excluded." And in the same case, in the court of errors and appeals (Hammer v. State, 44

N. J. L. 667), the chancellor declares that, "normally, there can be under our constitution no such thing as local or special legislation to regulate the internal affairs of municipalities, but all legislation to that end must be general, and applicable alike to all; nor can any departure from the rule be justified, except where, by reason of the existence of a substantial difference between municipalities, a general law would be inappropriate to some, while it would be appropriate to and desirable for others. There it would be warranted, not only by the necessities of the situation, but by a reasonable construction of the constitutional provision. In such a case the municipalities in which the peculiarity exists would constitute a class, and the legislation would in fact be general, because it would apply to all to which it would be appropriate. But distinctions which do not arise from substantial differences—differences so marked as to call for separate legislation—constitute no grounds for supporting such legislation." State v. Sloane, 49 N. J. L. 362; State v. Bloomfield, 47 N. J. L. 442; Lodi Twp. v. State, 51 N. J. L. 404, 6 L. R. A. 56. These rules have been continuously declared by the courts ever since the adoption of our amended constitution. In the latest case on the subject, in State v. Somer's Point, 52 N. J. L. 82, 6 L. R. A. 57, Mr. Justice Depue says: "As applied to legislation of this character, a law is special or local, as contradistinguished from general, in the sense of the prohibitory clauses in this paragraph of the constitution, which embraces less than the entire class of persons or places to whose condition such legislation would be necessary or appropriate, having regard to the purpose for which the legislation was designed. A law which so particularizes, and by such means is restricted in its operation to persons or places which do not comprise all the objects which naturally belong to the class, is 'special' or 'local' within the meaning of the constitutional interdict."

It has been inquired, upon what principle can a classification of race-courses into those used and maintained before, and those used and maintained after, January 1, 1898, be sustained? What, in this view, is the substantial difference between them, which requires a different system of legislation applicable to each? Where are the characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them distinct classes? I can perceive no such differences and no such characteristics; nor can I perceive any reasonable ground on which one class should require any different legislation from that which the other requires. To make a classification good, it must be founded upon differences and characteristics sufficiently marked and important to make them naturally a class by themselves. State v. Parsons, 40 N. J. L. 128; State v. Trenton, 42 N. J. L. 486; State v. Plainfield, 54 N. J. L. 529. There are no qualities in race-courses which are sufficiently marked and important to distinguish those in use prior to January 1, 1898, from those set up after that date. Legitimate classification rests on the quality of its members, not on the particular time when those qualities were acquired. State v. Jersey City, 45 N. J. L. 297; State v. O'Connor, 54 N. J. L. 36; State v. Trenton, Id. 444. This statute affords no proper and appropriate classification of race-courses which will support the application of a distinctive system of legislation applicable to each class, so distinctive and different as the two methods of licensing appearing in this act. The act is simply special legislation of the most palpable character, and plainly within the interdicting provision of the constitution against special laws regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties, and it must, upon this ground alone, be declared unconstitutional and invalid.

But there is still another obvious defect in this statute. It is not alone special in its character, but it also distinctly and substantially grants to certain corporations, associations, or individuals exclusive privileges, immunities, or franchises. It is clear that this act is a grant of an exclusive privilege to race-courses used before January 1, 1893, to obtain a license without complying with the onerous conditions embraced in the fourth section of the Act. Under the provisions of this latter section, the board of chosen freeholders, supposably exercising only public functions for public welfare, before they could exercise the power conferred upon them of granting a license to a race-course, must declare, in any event, upon their judgment in behalf of the public, that the race-course is a "public necessity." Now, it is manifest that this provision of the statute operates to create such a classification as not to confer upon all race courses alike the benefit which inures from the exercise of the powers under the first section of this Act. The act creates and confers privileges upon one class of race-courses, and grants to certain corporations, associations, and individuals privileges and immunities which can be rarely, if ever, conferred upon others under its provisions. The conditions imposed are not even similar. One class of race-courses may be established without regard to conditions at all; another class can only be established by submitting to the imposition of a condition which may be either of difficult or impossible performance. One class is privileged to the point almost of monopoly, and the other class is discriminated against almost to the point of absolute prohibition; and this is a vice of statutory enactment declared against, and plainly interdicted by the provisions of the constitution against the passage of local or special laws granting to any corporation, association, or individual any exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise. In the case of State v. O'Connor, 54 N. J. L. 36, where the act under review provided that "no person now holding an appointive position in any city or county of this state, and receiving a salary from such city or county, who is an honorably discharged Union soldier, etc., shall be removed from such position, except for cause," Mr. Justice Knapp, speaking for this court, said: "This law is hopelessly void, because only those members of the designated body of men who held office at the time of the passage of the act are given the benefit of its provisions. The great body of this deserving class of our citizens is shut out from its benefits." So far as adjudicated authority can go, it would appear that an analogous point to the very one in this case under consideration has been settled in this court in the case of State v. Post, 26 Atl. Rep. 683 (decided at the November term, 1892); and that case is so important in this relation that it may not be amiss to draw at length from it. In that case the act considered read as follows: "Any person or persons, citizens of this state, now using or occupying any grounds lying under the tide water of this state, for the planting or cultivation of oysters thereon, said grounds not being natural clam grounds or natural oyster seed beds, and the same shall have been so used and occupied since January the first, one thousand eight hundred and eighty, shall be confirmed in their right to use such grounds for the purpose of planting and cultivating oysters, and the oysters planted and grown thereon shall be the personal property of the person or persons using or occupying the grounds aforesaid, provided the said grounds shall have been marked by proper stakes, buoys or suitable monuments during the time aforesaid and oysters shall have been actually planted upon the grounds so marked." This act made it a misdemeanor to take oysters from beds so used and marked without the permission of the occupant. Mr. Justice Van Syckel says: "The right to plant oysters on lands of the state for the sole use of the occupant is a privilege, and, inasmuch as it [the act] excludes all others from taking them, it is an exclusive privilege, which cannot be granted by special, local, or private laws. . . . The state may grant rights in some of the lands without disposing of all its possessions, but it cannot select individuals or corporations, as the objects of its bounty to the exclusion of other citizens of the state." In the opinion, establishing a principle which seems to be thoroughly applicable to the present case, Mr. Justice Van Syckel continues: "This act does not confer its benefits upon all the citizens of the state who may elect to accept them upon the terms prescribed by the lawmaker. It does not shield the property of all who now or hereafter occupy and plant, but is expressly restricted in its operation to those who have used and occupied from January 1, 1880, and who were in occupancy on the passage of the Act in 1890. The law can never apply to any person other than those to whom it applied at the time of its enactment. Occupancy, claiming and staking grounds, constitutes the meritorious ground for the grant and is the basis of the classification upon which a law to be valid must be formed. The legislature in order to increase the product of oysters may declare that all who shall now or hereafter elect to plant and make oyster grounds shall be protected in the enjoyment of such property, but it cannot limit immunity to those who had planted and staked the ground at the passage of the Act in 1890. That is the vice of this law. It does not embrace all of the class according to a legal basis of classification, and the adjudicated cases condemn it."

The court has not considered the other objections urged against the validity of this act. Both upon the ground that it is a special law regulating the internal affairs of towns and counties, and also upon the ground that it is a special law granting to certain corporations, associations, and individuals exclusive privileges, immunities, or franchises, it is held to be unconstitutional and invalid.

Therefore the resolutions of the city council of the city of Elizabeth in this matter, and the license therein and thereby granted, are set aside, and declared to be null and void.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

George Q. WHITNEY, Appt.,
v.
HANOVER NATIONAL BANK et al.
(Two Cases.)

George Q. WHITNEY, Appt.,
v.
BANK OF GREENVILLE et al.
(.....Miss.....)

1. A person has no right to intervene as defendant in equity against the objection of the complainant.
2. The appointment of a receiver of a national bank on the ex parte application of the directors is utterly void.
3. In a suit by general creditors who have no judgments or specific liens, a chancellor's appointment of a receiver is not so unauthorized and void as to be subject to collateral attack for want of jurisdiction,—especially where the managers of the bank had abandoned it and the chancellor had previously attempted on their application to appoint a receiver, and the constitution of the state has provided that a chancellor may grant relief in equity cases, although the legal remedy may not have been exhausted and that any mistake in respect to the question whether the case was one for equity or common law shall not render the judgment or decree subject to reversal or annulment.

(April 9, 1894.)

A PPEALS by complainant from decrees of the Chancery Court for Washington County in favor of defendants in proceedings brought to reach the assets of the Bank of Greenville in the hands of G. D. Thomas, its receiver, to intervene in a proceeding already instituted against the bank in which a receiver had been appointed, and to set aside prior proceedings in reference to the disposition of the assets of the bank, and for an injunction against interference therewith. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Nugent & McWille and S. H. King for appellant.

Messrs. Yarger & Percy for appellees.

Campbell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These three cases were argued and submitted together, and will be so considered. Their history is this: The Bank of Greenville was found to be insolvent, and came to a stop, on the 23d day of December, 1891, when the directors, headed by the president, applied, by petition to the chancellor, to take charge of the assets of the bank, by appointing a receiver to collect and manage its affairs. The chancellor appointed the president of the bank receiver, and, on his application, enjoined all persons from proceeding by suit against it. The receiver appointed entered upon his duties as designated, and continued until he resigned, on the 6th of July, 1892. On the 11th July, 1892, the Hanover National Bank and other creditors of the Bank of Greenville exhibited their bill, in the chancery court in which the receiver had been appointed, against the Bank of Greenville, and averred the foregoing facts, and that since the 23d December, 1891, the officers and directors of the bank had ceased to manage it, and that its affairs had been managed wholly by Pollock, as receiver, who had collected a large sum of money due said bank, and that the appointment of another receiver was necessary for the preservation of the assets of the bank and the protection of the rights of its creditors; with other specific allegations, designed to show the necessity for the immediate appointment of a receiver. Upon due notice to the defendant a receiver was appointed in this proceeding on the 18th July, 1892, and the former receiver was directed to deliver to him all the assets of the bank in his hands. On July 28, 1892, George Q. Whitney and others, creditors of the Bank of Greenville, united in a bill against the bank and G. D. Thomas, who had qualified and was acting as receiver by virtue of his appointment on July 18th, and against other defendants, in said chancery court. This bill set forth the suspension of the bank on the 22d December, 1891, and the appointment by the chancellor of Pollock as receiver on the application of the president and directors of the bank, and that Pollock took exclusive control of all the assets of the bank, and acted as receiver, but that defendant Thomas, at the time of exhibiting said bill, claimed to be receiver of said bank by virtue of an appointment by the chancellor of said court; that the application to the chancellor on December 22, 1891, and all the proceedings had, including the procurement of the appointment of Thomas as receiver, were devices to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and "invalid and void." Discovery was sought by the bill as to all the assets of the bank, of whatever kind, and a lien upon them prayed to be established from the date of filing the bill, and their appropriation to the demands of the complainants. The Bank of Greenville interposed a plea to this bill of the proceeding by the Hanover National Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, and the appointment in that case of Thomas as receiver, and that he had qualified as such, and was in possession of the assets of the bank under that appointment, and relied on this plea as a bar to the bill filed 23d July, 1892. The plea was set down for hearing upon its sufficiency, and was sustained, and the bill dismissed. From that decree an appeal was taken, and case No. 7,460 on the docket of this court is that appeal.

NOTE.—The question of the power of a court of equity to appoint a receiver of a corporation on the application of the corporate officers on the ground that such action will be for the interest of the corporation and its creditors also is raised and decided in the negative in the above case and also in the case next following, post, 584.

For an exhaustive note on the power of a court to appoint a receiver when no other relief is asked including some authorities as to appointment on application or consent of the corporation, see Supreme Sitting of the Order of Iron Hall v. Baker (Ind.) 20 L. R. A. 210.

On October 4, 1892, George Q. Whitney petitioned the chancery court of Washington county, in which these cases were pending, and which had been consolidated, setting forth that he was a creditor to a large amount of the Bank of Greenville, and had recovered judgment for a large sum against it in the court of the United States at Vicksburg, Miss., July 28, 1892, which had been duly enrolled, and, he claimed, was a paramount lien on all the assets of said bank, notwithstanding all the various proceedings in the said chancery court, which are set forth with detailed particularity, and denounced as void, and no obstacle in law to the application of the assets of the bank to the claim of the petitioner, who prayed to be allowed to be made a party defendant to said cause. At the same time he presented a petition and bond for removal of said cause, in which he prayed to be made a defendant, to the United States court at Vicksburg. The complainants in the cause in which Whitney sought to intervene as a defendant opposed his application, and it was denied by the court, and from this he appealed, and that appeal is contained in No. 7,459 on the docket of this court.

Defeated in his effort to be made a defendant as stated, Whitney made an abortive effort to have the United States court at Vicksburg take charge of his suit, and enforce his claim to be paid out of the assets of the Bank of Greenville in preference to other creditors; but with that we have no concern, and state the fact historically only, being in the record before us. On February 6, 1893, Whitney, who had been baffled in all his efforts to obtain payment as a creditor entitled to precedence out of the assets of the Bank of Greenville, exhibited an original bill in the chancery court of Washington county against the complainants in the bill of the Hanover National Bank and others against the Bank of Greenville, exhibited July 11, 1892, and the Bank of Greenville and W. A. Pollock, receiver, and G. D. Thomas, receiver. In this bill is narrated with detail the history of the dealing by and with the bank from the time of its suspension and taking refuge from creditors in the chancery court to the filing of this bill, which also relates the persistent, but ineffectual, efforts of the complainant, in state and federal courts, to secure recognition of his right, as claimed, to be first paid out of the assets of the Bank of Greenville. It assails the action of the chancery court of Washington county as void for want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter dealt with, and seeks to vacate all orders that stand in his way, and the payment of his as a preferred claim out of the effects of the bank. The bill seeks injunction, which was obtained. This bill was answered, and most of its allegations admitted, but the claim made by it to the right of the complainant to priority of payment out of the assets of the bank was denied. A motion was made to dissolve the injunction, and some affidavits were taken, and some facts were agreed on for the hearing of the motion to dissolve, and it was agreed that the case should be heard on the motion to dissolve, and for final decree on such hearing. The respondents gave notice of a claim for damages to be allowed on dissolution of the injunction to amount of $2,500 for attorney's fees in defense of the suit. The case was heard in accordance with the agreement, and a decree was made dissolving the injunction, dismissing the bill, and awarding damages against the complainant in the sum of $2,000 as attorney's fees, the decree reciting that the court had heard testimony in open court as to the attorney's fees, and taxed the costs against the complainant, who appealed, and this is No. 7,749 of the docket of this court.

From this complete but succinct history of this litigation, as disclosed in voluminous form in the three cases before us, it is apparent that the only question presented for decision by the appeal in No. 7,459 is as to the propriety of the action of the court in refusing to permit Whitney to intervene as a defendant in the case of Hanover National Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, against the objection of the complainants, who protested earnestly against it. The court did right in this refusal. "No such practice is known in equity as making a person a defendant to a suit upon his own application over the objection of the complainant." 1 Dan. Ch. Pl. & Pr. 287, note 2, and cases cited; Stretch v. Stretch, 2 Tenn. Ch. 140,—where the subject is fully treated, and the action of the court in the case before us is fully vindicated on principle and authority.

The question presented by cases 7,460 and 7,749 is whether the chancery court of Washington county was so wanting in jurisdiction of the case of Hanover National Bank and others exhibited against the Bank of Greenville, July 11, 1892, as to render its action in the case void, and liable to be assailed collaterally, and treated as a nullity, whenever and however called in question; for, if it be conceded that the action of the court was erroneous, unless it was void, the fact that it had assumed jurisdiction, and taken control of the assets of the Bank of Greenville, and appointed receiver in the case, was an answer to the original bill exhibited by Whitney and others on the 28d July, 1892, and likewise to Whitney's bill of February 6, 1893. We regard the action of the chancellor on the 22d December, 1891, appointing a receiver on the ex parte application of the directors of the bank, and his subsequent action in pursuance of that appointment, as utterly void, and of no legal effect. It could be assailed collaterally, and disregarded with impunity, by anybody. The proposition that an insolvent debtor can take refuge in a chancellor's decree on his or its own application, and obtain protection against pursuing creditors, who may be enjoined from pursuing their ordinary remedies, is without foundation. We cannot account for the mistake fallen into in the proceeding of December 22, 1891, and all that was done under it, except by supposing that what is provided for by statute in other states was considered admissible in the absence of statute in this state. The suit of Hanover Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, instituted July 11, 1892, is evidence of the fact that it was considered necessary to strengthen the grasp of the chancery court on the assets of the bank, and that it was a timely proceeding for the purpose of the complainants in that suit, for it results from what we have said that all that went before was of no legal validity; and, but for that suit, there would have been no barrier to his proper proceeding by any creditor, the injunction issued to the contrary notwithstanding. But, if the court was not wholly without jurisdiction in that suit, it was inadmissible to inject into it other suits, as sought to be done by the bill of July 23, 1892, and that of February 6, 1893.

The question, then, is as to the case of Hanover Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, begun by original bill July 11, 1892. Was the action of the court as to that case void? It is to be observed that the bill in that case is not one to secure any priority or advantage to the complainant in it, to the injury of other creditors, but it is for all creditors of the Bank of Greenville, as shown by its prayer for the appointment of a receiver to preserve and collect the assets, and distribute the money among all the creditors, according to their rights as ascertained. There was no time when Whitney could not join in this suit as a complainant, or assert his right of priority as claimed, if he had chosen to do so; but his persistent effort was to obtain priority over other creditors and secure full payment, if the assets were sufficient; and he was unwilling to make common cause with all creditors, but, asserting the voidness of all the proceedings in the chancery court as to these matters, he sought, as he had a right to do, to obtain precedence as a creditor by getting judgment against the bank, and enforcing it. He got judgment, and, if that entitled him to be paid out of the bank's assets in the hands of the receiver he might have propounded his claim of priority in the chancery court, and demanded its recognition and payment by an order therefor, but he maintained his attitude of asserting the nullity of all the proceedings in this matter of the chancery court, and attacked them as void; and the maintenance of his bill of February 6, 1893, depends on maintaining the legal proposition on which it rests. His learned counsel has been not only persistent, but consistent, in the many methods employed to obtain for his client an advantage over other creditors. It remains to be stated whether or not he shall succeed in securing the reward of his industry in behalf of his client. By his bill of February 6, 1893, he has pursued the proper course to obtain an adjudication of the question on which the claim made by his client depends. This bill attacks the validity of the proceedings in the chancery court in the case of Hanover Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, on the ground that it is not the province of a court of chancery to dissolve a corporation, or interfere with the exercise of its franchise, or displace its officers, or appoint a receiver, or otherwise exercise jurisdiction over it, at the instance of creditors who have no judgment against it. In this case there was no interference by the court with the bank or its franchise, and the performance of the ordinary functions of its officers. There was no attempt to dissolve or restrain the corporation. Its directors had voluntarily surrendered its assets to the keeping of the chancellor, and ceased to perform their duties as to them. The chancellor had accepted the trust, and designated a receiver to take charge of these assets, and care for them, and had enjoined all creditors of the bank from suing it, and had proceeded in the administration of the trust he had accepted, as if there had been a creditors' bill; and, although this fell little short of being a mere farce, saved from it only by the seriousness of the performance with judicial gravity, in good faith, it was, nevertheless, the condition in which the complaining creditors found the affairs of their debtor on the 11th July, 1892, when they instituted their suit representing the deplorable conditions existing, and prayed the interference of the chancery court to take charge of the assets of their debtor, the bank, thus abandoned by it, and surrendered to the chancellor, who, though without authority to receive them, had yet taken control of them as if he did have the right to receive them, and had been dealing with them accordingly. The bill urged the necessity for the immediate appointment of a receiver for the preservation of the assets of the bank, which had suspended, and ceased to care for them since December 22, 1891. It is true that none of the complainants was a judgment creditor of the bank, and none had a specific lien on the assets of the bank. Yet these assets constituted a trust fund, in a general sense, for the payment of the creditors of the bank, and, having been abandoned by the managers of that corporation, and transferred to the chancellor, who was dealing with them as of right, when he had no more legal authority over them than a private individual, who might have found them, if it may be said that, under these circumstances, it was erroneous for the chancellor to entertain the suit of general creditors of the bank, and appoint a receiver it certainly cannot be maintained that this proceeding was wholly unauthorized and void, so as to be subject to collateral attack for want of jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Vanfleet, Collateral Attack, § 100; Brown v. Lake Superior Iron Co. 134 U. S. 530, 33 L. ed. 1021; Mellen v. Moline Malleable Iron Works, 131 U. S. 352, 33 L. ed. 178; Graham v. La Crosse & M. R. Co. 102 U. S. 148, 26 L. ed. 104; Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410, 38 Am. Rep. 13; Barbour v. National Exch. Bank, 45 Ohio St. 133; Rouse v. Merchants Nat. Bank of Cincinnati, 48 Ohio St. 493, 5 L. R. A. 378.

Many other books might be referred to in support of the proposition asserted, but, if the doctrine announced did not prevail elsewhere, there can be no doubt as to the law here since the Constitution of 1890. By section 160 of that instrument, "in all cases where said court [chancery] heretofore exercised jurisdiction, auxiliary to courts of common law, it may exercise such jurisdiction to grant the relief sought, although the legal remedy may not have been exhausted, or the legal title established by a suit at law." This is in harmony with the scheme of the constitution reversing the former relations of the courts, in which the circuit court possessed general jurisdiction, and was the repository of the power to administer legal remedies, and the chancery court had jurisdiction of certain designated matters, and where there was not a full, adequate, and complete remedy at law. Now the circuit court has original jurisdiction "in all matters, civil and criminal, in this state, not vested by this constitution in some other court." Section 156. A residuary grant is thus made to the circuit court. This manifests the policy of enlarging the domain of chancery, and limiting that of the court of law. What may be the effect of the provisions mentioned in widening the scope of the courts of chancery cannot be determined now, and is not necessary to be decided; but that they will be influential in considering the class of cases in which chancery courts may entertain jurisdiction is undeniable. When we look to section 147 of the Constitution, all doubt as to the proper resolution of the question presented by this case vanishes. Because of that section, error is not predicable of "any error or mistake as to whether the cause in which it was rendered was of equity or common-law jurisdiction." "No judgment or decree in any chancery or circuit court, rendered in a civil cause, shall be reversed or annulled on the ground of want of jurisdiction to render said judgment or decree, from any error or mistake as to whether the cause in which it was rendered was of equity or common-law jurisdiction," is the mandate of the fundamental law, and sweeps away all distinction between equity and common-law jurisdiction, after it has been entertained, in a civil cause in the chancery or circuit courts. It may be an action of crim. con., or for libel or slander, or trespass, or any other civil cause in the chancery court, or an equity matter in a court of law; if entertained there, error is not predicable, and the decree or judgment shall not be annulled for want of jurisdiction. The chancellor or circuit judge conclusively and finally settles the question of jurisdiction, as between equity or common-law jurisdiction, of the particular case; for it would be the height of absurdity to hold that, while error may not be affirmed of it, such judgment or decree is void. The reason we do not apply the provisions of the constitution mentioned to the matter of December 22, 1891, and uphold it, and what followed, is that it was not a cause. There was no suit or action, and no parties plaintiff and defendant, but a mere ex parte surrender by the bank to the chancellor of its affairs, for which there is no authority in law, and therefore the constitution does not apply, but relates to a civil cause, as properly understood, and not to all that a chancellor or judge may do. The case of Hanover National Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville is a suit regularly begun by bill against a defendant, and regularly proceeded with to a final decree; and, while we will not be understood to hold that there was even error in the action of the chancellor,—which question is not before us for decision,—we are sure his action cannot be held void or annulled, and that disposes of cases Nos. 7,749 and 7,460.

The decree allowing $2,000 for damages in the way of attorney's fees is complained of, but, as the evidence on which the chancellor decided this sum to be reasonable was not put in the record, and is not before us, we cannot disturb the decree for this.

The result is that the decree in each of the three cases hereinbefore mentioned must be affirmed.

APPPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to restrain the defendant Judge and others from interfering with certain property over which the Circuit Court of Stoddard County was alleged to have appointed a receiver. Writ granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. S. Priest for relator.

Messrs. John W. Noble, George D. Reynolds, M. R. Smith, Alexander & Green, Dickson & Smith, and R. B. Oliver for respondents.

Brace, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an application for a writ of prohibition. On the 3d of March, 1893, the relator, who is the holder of $76,200 of the bonds of the St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Ft. Smith Railway Company, secured by deeds of trust on portions of the railway and other property of said company, instituted a suit in the circuit court of Stoddard county against said railway company, Leo Doyle, the trustee in said deeds of trust, and the Mercantile Trust Company of New York, trustees in other deeds of trust made by said company on its property, to recover defaulted interest on said bonds under the following provision contained in said deeds of trust: "That if the interest on any of the bonds so to be issued shall not be paid by the party of the first part when the same shall become due, and if such interest shall remain in arrears for three months, or in case the principal of said bonds, or any of them, shall not be paid at their maturity, then it shall be lawful for said party of the second part, his successor or successors in trust, on the written request of the holders of not less than one-fourth part of said bonds then outstanding, to take possession of all and singular said premises, property, and franchises so conveyed, and, as the attorney in fact or agent of the said party of the first part, by himself, his agent or agents or substitutes, duly constituted, have, use, enjoy, and operate the same, making, from time to time, all needful repairs, alterations, and additions, and after deducting the expense of such use, repairs, alterations, and additions, and the costs and charges of such taking possession, and a reasonable compensation for the services of said trustee in such taking of possession and while in possession, which shall not exceed $1,500 per annum, apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds issued hereunder remaining unpaid, and which have or may have become due, and upon the written request of the holders of at least one fourth of said bonds issued hereunder, and then outstanding and unpaid, shall cause said premises, real and personal estate, rights and franchises, to be sold at public auction in the city of Cape Girardeau, giving at least twelve weeks' notice," etc. The petition setting forth the plaintiff's cause of action, verified by affidavit, together with certified copies of said deeds of trust, were on that day presented to the Honorable John G. Wear, judge of said circuit court, at chambers, in vacation of said court, and thereupon he made a provisional order in writing appointing Eli Klotz receiver of said railway company, directing him forthwith to take possession of said railway and restraining said company and its officers from in any manner transferring or disposing of the property, and directing the clerk of said circuit court to issue a summons or notice to said defendants returnable Monday, the 13th of March, 1893, to appear at Bloomsfield, the county seat of said county, before the said circuit court, and show cause, if any they have, why the appointment of said receiver should not be confirmed. The petition, together with the exhibits and the said order, were on said 3d of March, 1893, filed in the office of the clerk of said circuit court. On the next day (March 4th) George Houck, an attorney, and a brother of Louis Houck, the president and general manager of said railway company, and the principal owner of its stock, telegraphed to the latter, advising him of the institution of said suit, and that Klotz had been appointed receiver, and the amount of bond required.

On the same day the following petition was presented to the defendant, the Honorable Alexander Ross, judge of the Cape Girardeau court of common pleas, in chambers: "In the Cape Girardeau Court of Common Pleas within and for the County of Cape Girardeau and State of Missouri. St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Railway Company, Plaintiff, vs. Leo Doyle, Ed. Hidden & Mercantile Trust Company of New York, Defendants. In the Court of Common Pleas of the County of Cape Girardeau, Missouri, May Term, 1893. Your petitioner, the said St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Railway Company, states that the St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Railway Company was organized under the laws of the state of Missouri in 1880; that it was originally organized under the name and style of the Cape Girardeau Railway; that afterwards its name was changed to the Cape Girardeau Southwestern Railway; and that more recently the name of said railroad was changed to the St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Ry. Co., under the laws of said state of Missouri. Your petitioner further states that said railroad issued $100,000 of first mortgage bonds—bonds under the name and style of Cape Girardeau Railway—on its division of road from Cape Girardeau to Delta, and that Leo Doyle is trustee in said deed of trust securing said bonds, and that said deed of trust is hereto attached and made a part of this petition. Your petitioner further states that it issued $80,000 of bonds on its line of railroad from Delta to Lakeville, a large portion of which bonds are outstanding, and that Leo Doyle is trustee of and in the deed of trust by which said bonds are secured, and said deed of trust is hereto attached and made a part of this petition. Your petitioner further states that it issued $300,000 in bonds on its line of railroad from Lakeville to the St. Francois river, and that Leo Doyle is trustee in the deed of trust by which said bonds are secured, and said deed of trust is hereto attached and made a part of this petition. Your petitioner further states that it issued $230,000 of bonds on its division of road from the St. Francois river to the main line of the Iron Mountain Railroad, and that Leo Doyle is trustee in the deed of trust by which said bonds are secured, and said deed of trust is hereto attached and made a part of this petition. Your petitioner further states that a large number of the said bonds, and a large number of the coupons of the said bonds, are still unpaid, and held by various parties to your petitioner unknown, to wit, the sum of $500,000 and that the said coupons and bonds are an underlying security upon the said property. Your petitioner further states that afterwards, in 1888, $1,000,000 of consolidated bonds were issued upon the said entire railroad of petitioner for the purpose of taking up the said underlying bonds and constructing the said railroad from the main line of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railroad to Hunter, a junction with the Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis Railroad, and that many persons to your petitioner unknown are large owners of the said bonds, to wit, the amount of $1,000,000, and the Merchantile Trust Company of New York is trustee in said bonds for the benefit of the holders thereof; and said deed of trust is hereto attached and made a part of this petition. Your petitioner further states that afterwards, to wit, in 1890, a second mortgage income bond of $150,000 was placed upon the said railroad, and that the said mortgage income bonds have been issued, and that Edward Hidden is trustee in said bonds for the benefit of the holders of the same, and that said deed of trust is hereto attached and made a part of this petition. Your petitioner further states that an Arkansas extension on bond of $850,000 is authorized on its road, and $225,000 of said bonds have been issued on said railroad, and said deed of trust is hereto attached and made a part of this petition. Your petitioner further states that the said St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Railway Company is about one hundred miles long, extending through the counties of Cape Girardeau, Bollinger, Stoddard, Wayne, and Carter, and has an equipment of cars and locomotives, the cost of which was $250,000, and that the value of the same to the company is as much. Your petitioner further states that the St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Railway Company is indebted in the sum of $180,000 on floating debts to various parties, paid out in its behalf, and that for a part of said sum of $180,000 the said company has issued a first lien upon the steel rails between Williamsville and Hunter, the junction of its road; and, further, that it owes on pay rolls about $25,000 to its employes. Your petitioner further states that the said company is unable to pay its interest, and has not paid the same for a number of years, and that various parties are now making claims against the said company on account of the said interest, amounting to about $250,000, all of which, on said various bonds, is unpaid. Your petitioner further states that the said property is of great value, to wit, of the valuation of $1,500,000; and amply sufficient to pay all it owes, if judiciously and carefully managed so as to preserve the same. Your petitioner further states that it is informed that certain parties with small claims to it unknown are now endeavoring to secure control of the said property by useless and expensive litigation, and to so handle it as to be used to the detriment of its bondholders, stockholders, and creditors interested in the same, and to the irremediable injury of all the said bondholders and other creditors. Your petitioner further states that it has been informed that certain parties to it unknown now, without any immediate necessity, are about to institute suit on coupons due from your petitioner, and otherwise to harm it, all of which will be a detriment and injury to a great many of its creditors. Your petitioner further states that these suits instituted for the said purpose will very greatly damage the owners of all of the said bonds, and impair the value of the said property, injure the stockholders, and otherwise create expense and detriment to the same, and do great and irreparable harm to the creditors as a body. Your petitioner further states that it is willing to pay its debts, that it has ample property to pay the same, and that if it has an opportunity to do so, and the same property is handled under the order of the court, as directed by the court, that the same will ultimately pay all liabilities. Your petitioner further states that the said effort to involve this property into litigation by parties to it unknown is made, as it verily believes, for the purpose of greatly injuring the same and destroying its value. Wherefore, your petitioner prays that your honorable court may appoint a receiver for the said railway, its equipment, and all property of whatsoever kind belonging to it, to manage the same for the benefit of all the creditors thereof, represented by the trustees in said deeds of trust heretofore set out, and hereto attached and made a part of this petition, and the trustees made defendants to this petition; and that all parties and individuals, their servants, agents, and attorneys, whatsoever they may be, be restrained and enjoined from in any way interfering with the management and control of the said property; and that the said railway, by its receiver, appointed by your honorable court, use, operate, and control the said property for the benefit of all said creditors, bondholders, and stockholders, as aforesaid, of said railroad company; and for such other and further relief as to your honorable court may seem meet and just. St. Louis, Cape Girardeau and Fort Smith Ry., by Louis Houck, President."

Thereupon the said Ross, judge, made an order in writing appointing the said Louis

Houck receiver of said railway, approved his bond as such, and at half past 7 o'clock in the evening of the same day filed said petition, order, bond, and approval in the office of the clerk of said court of common pleas, and on the same day the said Louis Houck made and filed his oath of office as such receiver in the office of the clerk of said court, took possession of, and since has been holding and managing, said railway as receiver thereof, under and by virtue of such appointment. On Monday, the 6th day of March, 1893, which was the day appointed by law for the opening of the March term of the Stoddard county circuit court, Judge Wear failing to appear to open and hold said court, the said George Houck was duly elected special judge of said court, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such. On the same day the answer of Leo Doyle, trustee, entering his appearance in the suit in the common pleas court, and consenting to the appointment of Louis Houck as receiver, was filed in the office of the clerk of that court. On the 7th of March, Klotz filed his oath of office and bond as receiver, which was approved by the clerk, and a notice issued from the office of the clerk of said court, pursuant to the order aforesaid of Judge Wear, addressed to the defendants aforesaid in relator's said suit; and a summons in said suit, returnable to the next term of said court, to be holden on the second Monday in September, 1893, was also issued and delivered to the sheriff on the same day, and the summons and notice of the rule to show cause on the same day served on a station agent of the railway company. On the same day a writ of injunction was issued by Judge Ross, of the common pleas court, directed to said Klotz, and a like writ to the relator, E. G. Merriam, prohibiting them from in any way interfering with the said Houck as receiver of said road. On the 8th day of March, Edward Hiden, as trustee, filed his answer in the office of clerk of the common pleas court, entering his appearance in the suit in that court, and consenting to the appointment of Houck as receiver. On the same day another writ of injunction was issued by Judge Ross, directed to the attorneys of the relator, of like tenor of those theretofore issued against Klotz and Merriam, and on the same day all three of these injunction writs were served upon the parties to whom directed; and on the same day Klotz appeared before Judge Ross in chambers, and presented his petition, together with a certificate of his appointment by Judge Wear as receiver, praying for the cancellation of all orders made by him (the said Ross) as judge of the common pleas court in the proceedings aforesaid. Thereupon Judge Ross ordered the petition to be filed, and continued until the next term of said court. On the 10th day of March the summons in the suit of relator in the Stoddard circuit court was duly served on Louis Houck and Leo Doyle. Special Judge George Houck continued holding the March term of the Stoddard circuit court until the morning of the 18th of March, when the defendant railway company and Leo Doyle, each by their attorneys, appeared in said court, and filed separate motions to vacate the provisional order theretofore made by Judge Wear, appointing Klotz receiver, as aforesaid, in the said cause of the relator, Merriam, in said court. Said motions to vacate were immediately taken up, heard before said special judge, and sustained, and it was thereupon ordered and adjudged by said court: "that said provisional order made on the 3d of March, 1893, appointing Eli Klotz receiver of the St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Ft. Smith Railway Company, be, and the same is hereby, vacated, set aside, and for naught held." Thereupon the railway company and Doyle, by leave of court, filed separate applications for a change of venue in said cause, which were continued until the next regular term for determination, and thereupon, by a general order entered of record, said circuit court was adjourned until court in course. On the same morning, and a short time after said court had been thus adjourned, Judge Wear arrived at the county seat, repaired to the court-house, opened court, and caused an order to be entered of record, after reciting his reasons therefor, "that all minutes heretofore made this day by said George Houck, pretending to act as judge of this court, be expunged and stricken from the records, and all proceedings pretended to have been made in this court by said George Houck, as pretended judge, on this day, be also stricken and expunged from the record;" and thereupon proceeded to reconsider the rule to show cause in the case of Merriam v. Railway Co. et al., returnable that day, confirmed the appointment and qualification of Klotz as receiver, and overruled the application for change of venue for want of notice. On the 16th of March, Klotz made application to this court for a peremptory writ of mandamus commanding the respondents to deliver to him, as receiver as aforesaid, the railway property, effects, and credits of the St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Ft. Smith Railway aforesaid. An alternative writ directed to the respondents, to show cause why such writ should not be granted, was issued on the 25th of March, to which return was duly made, the issues heard and determined by this court in banc on the 27th of June, 1893, and the writ denied; the court holding, in an opinion written by Gantt, J. (23 S. W. Rep. 196), that the provisional order of Judge Wear appointing the said Klotz receiver of said railway had been legally vacated by the circuit court of Stoddard county, presided over by Special Judge Houck, on the 18th of March, 1893, and that the subsequent action of Judge Wear on that day, after the adjournment of said court by Judge Houck, was void and of no effect. Consequently, the said Klotz had no standing in this court for the relief prayed for. Afterwards, on the 25th of July, 1893, there was filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Stoddard county another order made by the Hon. John G. Wear, judge of the said court in vacation, appointing Klotz receiver of said railway, together with his oath of office and bond as such receiver approved by said judge. In the mean time, Louis Houck continued in the management and control of said railway under his appointment as receiver by Judge Ross, by whom many orders were made at his instance in relation thereto, until the May term of said common pleas court. During said term, and on the 22d of May, 1898, the railway company filed an amended petition. On the 26th, Leo Doyle, trustee, filed his answer thereto. On the 29th, the appointment of Houck as receiver in vacation was confirmed. During the term, many orders were made in respect to said property by said court, and answers were filed by Hidden, trustee, and the Mercantile Trust Company. On the 27th of July, 1898, the relator presented to the chief justice of this court, and filed herein, his suggestion for a writ of prohibition directed to the said Alexander G. Ross, judge of the Cape Girardeau court of common pleas, the said railway company, Louis Houck as president and as receiver thereof, Leo Doyle, the Mercantile Trust Company, and Edward Hidden, prohibiting them, and each of them, from further pursuing and holding cognizance of pleas in said cause in said court of common pleas. A rule upon said respondents was thereupon issued to show cause why such writ should not be issued, returnable to the October term of this court. At the September term, 1898, of the Stoddard county circuit court, the railway company and Leo Doyle, trustee, filed their answers in the suit in that court, and by agreement the venue thereof was changed to the circuit court of Iron county. From the foregoing summary, the condition of affairs when the respondents made return to the rule to show cause at this term of court will sufficiently appear, as well as the issues to be thereupon determined.

Is the power and control which the Cape Girardeau court of common pleas has assumed, and is exercising, over the corpus and affairs of the St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Ft. Smith Railway Company, through a receiver appointed as aforesaid, authorized by law? and, if not, has this court power, under the constitution and laws, to prohibit the further exercise of such control at the instance of relator?—are the principal questions to be determined in this controversy. The relator contends: That the common pleas court never acquired jurisdiction to appoint a receiver of said railway company's property for two reasons: First, because there was not, at the time the judge of said court assumed the authority to make such appointment, nor since has been, an action pending in said court in which a receiver could be appointed; and, second, because, at the time said judge assumed authority to make such appointment, a receiver had already been legally appointed in a cause pending in the circuit court of Stoddard county, a court of competent jurisdiction to make such appointment. That the property of the railway company is partly within the jurisdiction of the Cape Girardeau court of common pleas, and that, in a proper action pending in that court, it had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver thereof is conceded. Was such an action pending at the time Houck was appointed? A receiver is an indifferent person appointed by the court to receive and protect the property or fund in litigation pendente lite. The appointment is not the ultimate end and object of the suit, but is merely a provisional remedy or auxiliary proceeding. High, Receivers, § 1; 20 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 17; Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2198.

No authority is given by the statutes of this state to its courts, or to judges thereof in vacation, to make such an appointment, except in a pending suit, nor does it inhere in any of them under their general jurisdiction as courts of equity. To ascertain whether there was such a suit pending, it becomes necessary to look at the petition filed in the common pleas court, for there could not be a suit pending unless there was a suit commenced. In this state a suit is instituted "by filing in the office of the clerk of the proper court a petition setting forth the plaintiff's cause or causes of action and the remedy sought." Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2018. When the petition is filed, the suit is commenced. South Missouri Lumber Co. v. Wright, 114 Mo. 826. The petition filed in the common pleas court is the petition of the railway company, and sets forth, in substance that it possesses certain property which is incumbered in different ways and to secure different amounts, and owes defaulted interest and floating debt to a large amount and is insolvent; that certain small creditors are about to institute suit on interest coupons due from your petitioner, for the purpose of injuring the same, and doing great harm to creditors as a body, which will interfere with the operation of the road, and impair the value of the security of the bondholders and other creditors; that the value of the property is such that, if handled under the order of the court, it will ultimately pay all liabilities. The court is thereupon asked to take possession of the railroad and its property through a receiver, to enjoin all persons from interfering with the same, and to use, operate, and control the property for the benefit of creditors, bondholders, and stockholders. Where, in this paper called a petition, is to be found a cause of action stated against anybody? What wrong is there complained of, calling for the exercise of the remedial jurisdiction of a court of law or equity? What right of the petitioner, or of anybody else, for that matter, is therein alleged to have been infringed, or even threatened? None whatever. The whole scope of the paper is to inform the judge of the common pleas court in vacation that the railway company is in debt, in embarrassed circumstances, some of its creditors are about to sue upon its overdue obligations, and to pray the court to take charge of its property, and administer it for the benefit of all concerned; in other words, it is simply a petition by a debtor for the appointment of a receiver to manage and carry on its business, so that its creditors cannot enforce their legal rights in the courts of the country, and not a petition stating a cause of action, either at law or in equity, in which, as incident thereto, a receiver might be appointed. The filing of that petition no more instituted an actual controversy between contending suitors in court than would the filing of a copy of the Lord's prayer. It laid no foundation whatever for the exercise of the jurisdiction of the court to appoint a receiver, unless some ground for the exercise of that jurisdiction can be found other than an actual pending controversy in the court which undertook its exercise. Counsel for respondents Houch and the railway company argue that the jurisdiction of the common pleas court to appoint a receiver on the facts presented in the petition can be maintained on the authority of Brassey v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 19 Fed. Rep. 663, and the Wabash St. L. & P. R. Co. Cases, 22 Fed. Rep. 269, 23 Fed. Rep. 518, 865, and 29 Fed. Rep. 618.

It must be conceded that the dicta of Judge Shipman in Brassey v. New York & N. A. R. Co., supra, as quoted in the brief of counsel, would tend strongly to support their contention, producing, as it does, the impression that in that case the action was by an insolvent railroad company, and the relief sought was the appointment of a receiver. This idea is, however, at once dispelled by a correct reading of the extract from the judge's opinion in connection with its context. That was an action by a bondholder against the railroad company. The learned judge, after reciting the contents of the bill, said: "I am of the opinion that when a railroad corporation, with its well-known obligations to the public, has become entirely insolvent, and unable to pay its secured debts, unable to pay its floating debt, and unable to pay the sums due its connecting lines, unable to borrow money, and in peril of the breaking up and distribution of its business, and confesses this inability, although no default has yet taken place upon the securities owned by the orator, but a default is imminent and manifest, a case has arisen when, upon a bill for an injunction against attacks upon the mortgaged property, and a receivership to protect the property of the corporation against peril, a temporary receiver may be properly and wisely appointed. It is next said that this was a case of collusion between the orator and the railroad corporation. There is no claim that there was any collusion on the part of the second mortgage trustees. If by collusion it is meant that the preparation for, and institution of, the suit were known and desired by the directors, or some of them, in the belief that the granting of the prayer of the bill would be prudent and wise, then there was collusion. If by collusion it is meant that the institution of the suit or its management was marked by fraudulent design or purpose, there was not collusion. The complainant was the actual owner of five mortgage bonds. They were not placed in his hands, and were not transferred to him fictitiously, and were not bought by him for the purpose of this suit." The court refused to remove the receiver that had thus been appointed in a suit pending by a creditor against the debtor corporation, and gave no support to the proposition that a debtor can come into court by petition in the form of an action against its creditors, and have a receiver appointed,—a proposition that finds support in no adjudication in this country, so far as we are advised, except in 23 L. R. A.

the single instance of the Wabash receivership.

In the several cases to which we have been cited, growing out of that receivership, the validity of the original appointment seems not to have been directly raised or passed upon but rather accepted as an accomplished fact. The original complaint does not appear. Its substance is, however, recited in Quincy, M. & P. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 84, 36 L. ed. 632. In Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 29 Fed. Rep. 618, Treat, J., briefly states the nature and origin of the proceeding as follows: "In order that this matter may not be misunderstood, for it is important in its vast-reaching consequences, it should be stated that it was not an application by a mortgagee to foreclose. It was an application by the corporation itself, concerning which a great deal of comment has been made elsewhere. The application was originally made to myself, in this circuit, which is limited in extent. I hesitated. I found that Judge Shipman, a very learned and able judge, had gone over in extenso that class of thought. After further consideration with respect thereto, I reached the conclusion that his views were correct, to wit: Here is a vast system, extending through many states and many judicial districts. A default, it was certain, would have been made in a few days. What should be done? The interests of all concerned required that some judicial action should be had for conservation of those interests,—stockholders, bondholders, creditors at large, etc. And after patient thought I reached the conclusion that Brother Shipman was right. Since that time, fortunately, the Supreme Court of the United States has said that it is right. Now, if any one in or out of judicial position chooses to dispute the action of this court, that party may settle that controversy with the Supreme Court of the United States, which is authoritative, so far as the action of this court is concerned."

However prudent and wise the action of Judge Treat, concurred in by Judge Brewer, may have been from a business standpoint, in taking charge of this great railroad system, we have failed to discover that the Supreme Court of the United States has ever said judicially that upon such an application he had power to appoint a receiver to do so. In the only cases to which we have been cited by counsel as supporting this assertion (Quincy, M. & P. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 82, 36 L. ed. 632; and St. Joseph & St. L. R. Co. v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 105, 36 L. ed. 640), the question of the validity of the appointment of the receiver was neither raised nor passed upon by the supreme court. In one of the cases it was suggested that the bill was without precedent; but the court said, "We are not called on to inquire as to how that may be," nor were they so called by the issues in the other case. The fact is, the Wabash Case is sui generis. There is no such source of equity jurisdiction as is supposed therein to have been discovered. It is without precedent, and we have found no published case that supports it. The single case cited by counsel, of Pressley v. Lamb, 105 Ind. 171, which the appointment of a receiver in an action by one partner against another for settlement of partnership affairs came collaterally before the court for consideration, manifestly does not support it. Cox v. Volkert, 96 Mo. 505. That a court of equity has no inherent power, except in some few cases of particular jurisdiction, to appoint a receiver, except as an incident to and in a suit pending, has hitherto, with the exception of the Wabash Case, been a universally accepted doctrine; and outside of that case the doctrine that a court of equity, without statutory authority, has jurisdiction, upon the application of an insolvent corporation, to take charge and administer its affairs through a receiver, not only has no support, but whenever suggested has been repudiated. The following are a few of the many authorities that might be cited in support of these positions: Jones v. Bank of Leadville, 10 Colo. 464, French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495; Smith v. Los Angeles Super. Court (Cal.) 82 Pac. Rep. 322; Hugh v. McRea, Chase, Dec. 466, Fed. Cas. No. 6,840; People v. St. Clair Circuit Judge, 81 Mich. 456; Kimball v. Goodburn, 32 Mich. 11; Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 145, 76 Am. Dec. 508; French v. Gifford, 80 Iowa, 160; Whitehead v. Wooten, 48 Miss. 523; Atty. Gen. v. Utica Ins. Co. 2 Johns. Ch. 371, 1 L. ed. 412; Ex parte Whitfield, 2 Atk. 815; Wait, Insolvent Corp. § 183; Gluck & B. Receivers, § 27.

There being no statutory authority in this state for the appointment of a receiver in such a proceeding, the appointment of Houck receiver by the common pleas court was a nullity, as appears from the foregoing authorities and what has been said; and it follows, as a consequence, that his appointment is subject to collateral attack. Is the relator in a position to make the attack? By his petition filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Stoddard county on the 3d of March, 1898, he became the plaintiff in a suit in that court, as one of the creditors of the railway company, in a mortgage security made by the company to trustee for the benefit of such creditors. He sued for himself and all those similarly situated; he sued to enforce a contract by which the company agreed that, in case of default in the payment of interest, the trustee might take possession of the mortgaged property, and apply the income to the payment of the interest, and alleged the default. It was an equitable action in rem, of which the court had jurisdiction, and in which a receiver might be appointed. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 2193; Gluck & B. Receivers, § 15. It was a real controversy, of which the court had jurisdiction. The court, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, took cognizance of the case, and having taken cognizance of the case "is entitled to retain jurisdiction until the end of the litigation, and incidentally to take possession of the subject-matter of the controversy, to the exclusion of all interference by other courts of concurrent jurisdiction." Id. § 80. The subsequent proceedings in that court in that case are important only for the purpose of showing that the jurisdiction thus obtained has been retained, asserted, and maintained from the beginning. Whatever irregularities, if any, that may have occurred in the exercise of that jurisdiction, can be corrected only in that court, and, to insure such correction, whatever question may arise as to the manner of its exercise by that court may be determined here on appeal or writ of error, but cannot be the subject of the present inquiry, which goes no further than to the jurisdiction of these two courts. What we have to do with here is, on the one hand, a suitor in a court of competent jurisdiction, seeking a legal remedy against the property of his debtor, and, on the other, the debtor, having notice of that fact, fleeing to the shelter of another court of concurrent jurisdiction, and invoking its power to defeat the exercise of jurisdiction by the former court, and to deprive the suitor of the legal remedy to which he may be entitled. We have here no race of diligence between two creditors, seeking to subject their debtor's property to the payment of their demands in courts of concurrent jurisdiction, and between whom many of the interesting questions as to priority of right and jurisdiction between such courts, so learnedly discussed by counsel in their briefs, might have arisen. We have a debtor going through the mere form of bringing a suit against his creditors, against whom he had no right of action, by presenting a paper in the form of a petition to the judge in vacation, in which the representatives of the debtor and his creditors, the trustees in the securities, are named as defendants, against whom the debtor had no cause of action, nor made any pretense of having, and praying the court to take possession of its property and administer its affairs upon the sole ground that it would be a good thing for the company and its creditors, some of whom are about to sue upon its obligations. It is folly to attempt to disguise the fact that this proceeding was taken before Judge Ross for the express purpose of defeating the legitimate exercise of the jurisdiction of the circuit court of Stoddard county in relator's suit in that court. That of some such purpose he was advised in the beginning, appears upon the very face of the petition; and that, after full knowledge that such was the object and effect thereof, he has and does still assert and maintain his right, and the jurisdiction of his court over the subject-matter of that suit, so as to impede and hinder the relator in the prosecution of his suit, and the exercise of the jurisdiction of that court therein in his behalf, in a due and orderly manner, is beyond question. The only excuse for so doing that can be found in this voluminous record is that the relator, in bringing his suit, was influenced by a malicious motive, which is alleged in the amended petition, and which is no excuse at all; for it goes without saying that "a malicious motive in asserting a legal right to do a particular thing will not give a right of action." 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 179.

The only precedent for the assertion or maintenance of the jurisdiction of the common pleas court is the case of the Wabash receivership, which is without precedent, and ought to have no following. The exercise of such jurisdiction is not authorized by any statute of this state, and is not found within any source of equitable jurisdiction with which we are familiar, or of which the books speak, and, being without warrant of law, its further exercise ought to be prohibited. By the constitution, this court is invested with "a general superintending control over all inferior courts, with power to issue writs of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, certiorari and other remedial writs, and to hear and determine the same." Const. art. 6, § 3. The writ of prohibition is a familiar mode of the exercise of this power, and is an appropriate one to restrain the exercise of jurisdiction by a subordinate court over a subject-matter when it has none, and is loudly called for when such jurisdiction is asserted against a court that has jurisdiction and is asserting it, and when the officers of each, acting under its orders, are liable at any moment to come into physical conflict over the possession of the subject-matter in controversy. The writ of prohibition, as prayed for, should go. The grounds upon which this conclusion has been reached obviate the necessity of discussing the many questions raised and argued by counsel, growing out of the action of the parties and the courts after these two proceedings were commenced, none of which go to the question of jurisdiction, upon which this case turns.

*It is therefore ordered that the writ of this court issue, prohibiting the said respondent Ross, as judge of the common pleas court aforesaid, from entertaining any further pleas, or taking any further judicial action, in said so-called suit, entitled the "St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Railway Company v. Leo Doyle, Ed. Hidden, and the Mercantile Trust Company of New York," of said court of common pleas, and prohibiting the other respondents from further prosecuting any further pleas therein, and commanding the said Houck to turn over all the property of said railroad company that has come into his hands as de facto receiver thereof, under the orders of said common pleas court, to the receiver de jure thereof, who has been or may be appointed by the circuit court in which this suit aforesaid of relator is pending, and that he account therefor to such receiver under the supervision of said circuit court.*

Black, Ch. J., and Sherwood and Macfarlane, JJ., concur.

Barclay, J., dissenting:

This is an original proceeding for a writ of prohibition. It was begun in July, 1893, during the vacation of the court. A petition was filed by Mr. Merriam the relator, and submitted to the Chief Justice, who then made a rule or order upon the defendants to show cause, at the opening of the ensuing October term of the court, why a writ of prohibition should not be awarded, requiring them to no further hear or prosecute a certain cause entitled "St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Fort Smith Railway Co., Plaintiff, v. Leo Doyle, Edward Hidden, and the Mercantile Trust Company of New York, Defendants," pending in the Cape Girardeau court of common pleas. The defendants in the case at bar are the judges of that court, the said railway company, Louis Houck, as president and as receiver of that company, and the three trustees just mentioned. To this rule, defendants filed returns, setting forth at length the proceedings in the suit in the common pleas court, and asserting the jurisdiction of the latter to determine that suit. To some of these returns "exceptions" have been taken, but upon all of them the relator has moved to make absolute the rule for a prohibition. The facts which we consider decisive of the present application are admitted by all the parties in their respective statements to the court. The merits of the controversy have been fully discussed at the bar and in the briefs, so it is not necessary to further refer to the formal steps by which the merits have been reached. The record here is, however, embellished with a mass of details, many of which are not relevant to the precise issue for determination now. The St. Louis, Cape Girardeau & Ft. Smith Railway Company (which for convenience we shall call the Cape Railway) filed a petition, March 4, 1893, in the Cape Girardeau court of common pleas, against Leo Doyle and the other above-named trustees in the three deeds of trust in the nature of mortgages, then existing as liens upon the real and other property of that railway. The petition recited fully the history of the railway, and of mortgages and other indebtedness thereof, its present inability to pay its obligations as they matured, that default upon the interest coupons of the bonds secured by the mortgages had occurred, but that the property was ample to meet its debts if "handled under the order of the court," and praying that its property be applied to the discharge of its debts under the direction of the court, to which end the appointment of a receiver for the railroad and all its appurtenances was asked, as well as an injunction against all persons from interfering with the management and control of its property, and for general relief. The petition, without further enlarging upon its contents, may be briefly described as one in which the railway company gracefully sought the refuge of the court to have its own mortgage foreclosed, and meanwhile to remain in charge of a receiver, with a view to prevent seizure of its property, piecemeal, by its creditors. It was modeled after certain noted precedents, the soundness of which, in point of law or equity, we shall not necessarily have to discuss at this time. Upon consideration of that petition Judge Ross of the common pleas court on the same day made an order appointing Louis Houck receiver of the entire railway property in question. Mr. Houck qualified as receiver by giving an approved bond and filing his oath of office. He forthwith took possession of the property, and has remained ever since in possession, operating the railway as such receiver. March 8, 1893, Mr. Hidden, as trustee, filed an answer in the cause consenting to the appointment of Mr. Houck as receiver. On March 7, 1893, an injunction was issued by Judge Ross to Mr.

Klotz and Mr. Merriam, the present relator, prohibiting them from interfering with Mr. Houck as receiver. On the next day a like injunction was issued to the attorneys of Messrs. Klotz and Merriam. On the same day (March 8, 1898) these injunctions were served on the parties to whom they were directed. On that day Mr. Klotz appeared before Judge Ross, and presented a petition reciting his appointment as receiver of the Cape Railway property by Judge Wear, as judge of the Stoddard county circuit court, and praying for an order of delivery of the property to him as receiver. This petition was by Judge Ross ordered filed, and continued to the next term of the common pleas court. May 22, 1898, the railway company filed an amended petition in that court, to the same general effect as the first, but somewhat more elaborately framed. To this the defendant Mr. Doyle, as trustee (who had entered his appearance immediately on the filing of the original petition), appeared, May 26, 1898, and interposed an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, setting up at large his interest as trustee in the property under the mortgages, approving the receivership, asking a sale of the mortgaged property of which he is trustee, and the application of proceeds to the secured debts. The court of common pleas, May 27, 1898, acted upon the amended petition and the answer or cross-bill by entering a renewed or confirmatory order of appointment of Mr. Houck as receiver of all the railway property covered by the mortgages represented by Mr. Doyle as trustee, and made several subsidiary orders respecting the administration of the receivership. At this stage of the suit Mr. Merriam applied to this court for a prohibition, as first above stated. Mr. Klotz had previously applied for a mandamus, with the result shown by the report of that litigation. State v. Ross (1893) 23 S. W. Rep. 196. The facts of the proceedings before Judge Wear and in the Stoddard county circuit court in the suit of Mr. Merriam against the Cape Railway and the three trustees above named have been given in the opinions in the mandamus case (23 S. W. Rep. 196), and need not be repeated; but some have since transpired which are supposed to have relevancy to the issue before us. July 24, 1898, Judge Wear, in vacation, reappointed Mr. Klotz as receiver of the railway property, and he qualified as such on that day. Since then that proceeding has been transferred, by change of venue, to the circuit court of Iron county, and in it the Cape Railway has filed an answer, setting up fully the proceedings in the common pleas court, above described, and asserting that because thereof, and of the possession of Mr. Houck as receiver, and of other facts recited, the common pleas court has complete possession and jurisdiction of the property, and should not be disturbed therein by any other court of co-ordinate jurisdiction. Mr. Merriam has at no time appeared, specially or otherwise, in the court of common pleas, or filed any objection to its course of action or jurisdiction in the matter of the receivership. The defendants, however, claim that he is legally represented there by Mr. Doyle, trustee in the mortgages, securing the bonds held by Mr. Merriam. The foregoing is a sketch of the substance of the controversy. Any other facts that may seem to bear materially on the result will be mentioned in the course of this opinion.

1. The Cape Girardeau court of common pleas, by the law of its creation, has concurrent original jurisdiction with the circuit court of the county "in all civil actions at law." Laws 1851, p. 201; Rev. Stat. 1889, p. 2219. This language was held, in Reich v. Tiedeman (1878) 53 Mo. 489, to confer jurisdiction co-extensive with that of the circuit court over all civil actions of whatever nature; and in Fulenwider v. Fulenwider (1878) Id. 489, it was expressly decided that such civil actions included suits involving equitable rights and remedies. These decisions have stood unreversed for thirty years, and we adhere to them without discussion, as expressing the law touching the right of the common pleas court to hear and adjudicate suits of the general class to which the receivership proceeding in that court belongs. The allegations of the original, as well as of the amended, petition, show that the real property of the Cape Railway lies partly in the city of Cape Girardeau. So that, upon the law and facts shown by the record in that case, that court had originally authority to entertain and decide a suit of that nature at the time it took possession of the property in litigation through the agency of Mr. Houck as its receiver. It hence had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of that proceeding, as has been held by this court in many decisions, of which we cite but a few. Walker v. Likens (1857) 24 Mo. 298; State v. Weatherby (1869) 45 Mo. 17; Rosenheim v. Hurlstock (1886) 90 Mo. 365; Hope v. Blair (1891) 105 Mo. 93.

2. It is, however, claimed in this connection that the common pleas court had no power to appoint its receiver, because the original petition invoking its authority in that behalf was so deficient as to state no cause of action, and that consequently the appointment must be treated as a nullity. It may be well to repeat what was said in a recent case in the first division, without dissent, that, "where enough facts are alleged to disclose that the case falls within a class of proceedings which the court is lawfully authorized to hear and decide, the question of the sufficiency of the showing made for the purpose of setting the court in motion is one of law for the determination of the court itself to which the showing is addressed whatsoever its rank." Dowdy v. Wamble (1892) 110 Mo. 284. In State v. Tate, (1892) 109 Mo. 270, it was unanimously held by the first division that the omission to state a cause of action was not even an irregularity in procedure justifying the setting aside of a judgment on motion after the lapse of the judgment term. If that proposition be correct, for a stronger reason would not such omission furnish ground to treat the action of a court on such a defective pleading as a nullity upon a collateral attack? In State v. Southern R. Co. (1899) 100 Mo. 61, it was remarked, in the discussion of the main point involved, that it would be manifestly improper to issue a writ of prohibition against a court having jurisdiction of a cause upon an application alleging that it was about to pronounce judgment on a petition which did not state a cause of action, but which the trial court had held sufficient. In the case before us the common pleas court had lawful judicial power to appoint a receiver of the property in question upon a proper state of facts. If the original application for the exercise of that power was defective, even defective in substantial respects,—it was subject to amendment, which would relate back to the time when the pleading which it amended was filed. It was expressly so held by the first division in Lilley v. Tobbein (1890) 103 Mo. 477. The general rule has long been recognized in this state that proceedings which are defective or insufficient, but yet amendable, are not void merely because of such insufficiency. It was said in Hardin v. Lee (1873) 51 Mo. 241, that the fact that the court can make the amendment shows "that the proceedings are merely erroneous or irregular, and that the court had jurisdiction." That ruling has been repeatedly followed in this state. In one of the decisions applying it, we note that it is further added, in the argument of the court, that a judgment could not be declared void in a collateral proceeding because based upon a defective petition. Burnett v. McCluey (1887) 92 Mo. 230. The same idea was advanced again in Dollarhide v. Parks (1887) 92 Mo. 178. It cannot, we think, in view of these positive expressions of principles in former cases, be correctly held that, if the court of common pleas had lawful power to appoint a receiver of the property in question upon a proper showing of the facts, its act in making such appointment is necessarily void in this collateral assault upon it, because the showing on which that court acted was insufficient, in the estimation of some other court, to warrant the ruling which the former court saw fit to make upon that showing.

3. But it must further be remembered that the original petition for a receiver was amended in some particulars during the proceedings, and that Mr. Doyle, one of the defendants therein, interposed an answer in the nature of a cross-bill, uniting in the request for the receivership, and praying such action by the court in that matter as he claimed was equitable and proper, in the interest of the creditors secured by the mortgages in which he is trustee. Whatever opinion may be entertained of the correctness of the ruling of the court in originally appointing a receiver at the instance of the corporation itself, it is plain, we think, that the joinder of the trustee in that application, as indicated, gives the proceeding a far more certain and safe foundation for judicial action than the case at first possessed. The trustee certainly had the right, upon the facts submitted by the company, to ask the intervention of a court of equity for the foreclosure of the mortgages of which he was trustee, and for the appointment of a receiver in aid of that result. The action of the court in granting that request of the trustee and of the corporation severally is very clearly one which the common pleas court had jurisdiction to take in the exercise of its general powers as a court of equity. This proposition is too self-evident to require argument. Quincy, M. & P. R. Co. v. Humphreys (1892) 145 U. S. 82; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Union Rolling Mill Co. (1884) 109 U. S. 702, 27 L. ed. 1081.

4. It appears, then, from the record of the court, whose right to proceed is called in question, that it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the litigation. The next point for consideration is whether or not its right to deal with that subject-matter is affected by the proceedings which took place before Judge Wear, or in the circuit court of the neighboring county. The real issue sought to be submitted, as decisive of the application for a writ of prohibition, is, Which of these two receivers has the better title or right to possession of the railway line? The decision of that issue depends upon the views of law that may be adopted, upon several mooted points, by the authority which shall finally determine that issue, after a finding of the exact facts bearing thereon from the conflicting evidence concerning them. The main position taken by Mr. Merriam, as relator, now is that, by virtue of the proceedings before Judge Wear, Mr. Klotz became invested, as receiver, with a right of possession of the railway property now in custody of the receiver of the common pleas court, and that consequently the latter court has no jurisdiction to entertain or adjudicate the pending cause there. On the other side, defendants insist that the original appointment of Mr. Klotz as receiver was void for several reasons, one of which is because, as they allege, the appointment was made by Judge Wear beyond the territorial limits of Stoddard county, but that, if valid, it was afterwards vacated by the Stoddard circuit court. They also assert that the later appointment of the same receiver in July was void because of the then pending applications on file for a change of venue, based on an alleged disqualification of the judge to act in that proceeding. In reply, the relator urges that the jurisdiction to proceed with the foreclosure and incidental receivership belongs to the court in which the first formal steps were taken to that end, and that they were taken in the Stoddard circuit court. This last-mentioned fact the defendants deny, and also seek to avoid by the contention that the right to proceed belongs properly to the court which has subjected the property in question to its process by seizure. The case is further complicated by charges of fraud and conspiracy, as indicated in the report of the proceeding in this court for a mandamus, 23 S. W. Rep. 196. We are asked by relator to solve all these questions of law here and now, and incidentally to decide the questions of fact on which the former depend. If, upon doing so, we should conclude that the receivership of Mr. Klotz has priority of right over that of Mr. Houck, it is supposed that such a conclusion, founded on our view of facts, entirely outside the record of the court of common pleas, would have the legal effect to annihilate its power, as a court of equity, to entertain the application for a receiver upon which it has acted, and to render all the proceedings in that cause void from the beginning. Ordinarily, we would think that the mere statement of such a suggestion would sufficiently reveal the inherent weakness of the proposition. It is no new or unusual thing in jurisprudence that the same property is found so situated as to form the subject of litigation in several jurisdictions. Conflicts of rights depending upon the proceedings of different courts with respect to the same property are of frequent occurrence, as the reported cases show. Brown, Jur. § 95. In Missouri, by the express provisions of our Code, the fact that "there is another action pending between the same parties, for the same cause, in this state," is an objection to a petition which may be interposed by a demurrer if it appears from the petition itself. If it does not so appear, that defense must be made by answer. If it is not submitted to the court, either by a demurrer or answer, it is waived, and cannot be insisted upon thereafter as a defense. Rev. Stat. 1889, §§ 2043, 2047. The sections of our statute law just cited indicate, as plainly as language can, that jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a cause does not depend on whether or not another action is already pending between the same parties for the same property. They also indicate that the court in which the second action is brought for the same property is vested with authority to determine the validity of that objection to the proceeding, either upon demurrer; if the fact is conceded, or by trial of the issue as to such fact, if set up first by an answer.

In the case at bar, both proceedings, as they now stand, are, in substance, to foreclose mortgages. The receiverships are ancillary to that main purpose. Giving relator the benefit of the view he takes (though it is stoutly disputed by arguments founded on the terms of the three mortgages on the various parts of the railway property), namely, that the two proceedings are, in their general scope and purpose, identical (though we do not decide that point), it is nevertheless within the judicial power of each of the courts to determine whether or not a prior action of the same nature was pending when that before it was commenced, if the sections above cited from our Code of Procedure were not written in vain. Jurisdiction to hear and determine a controversy includes the power to hear and decide all questions of law or fact which bear upon that controversy, subject to the right of review (if any) provided by law, unless that jurisdiction is in some wise limited by the law creating or regulating it. The right of a court to entertain and adjudicate a subject of litigation lawfully committed to its judicial power cannot be made to depend upon the fact (outside of its record) whether or not some other court has entertained a similar proceeding touching the same subject. Its ruling, after due consideration of such a fact when submitted to it, may decisively affect the correctness of the court's action upon the subject involved, or infect it with reversible error; but it cannot take away its power to deal with the matter committed by the law to its consideration and decision. This proposition was directly decided in State v. Withrow (1891) 108 Mo. 1, with the concurrence of all the judges of the second division. That case is plainly decisive of this, and the principles on which it is founded have been repeatedly recognized and acted upon by many courts whose opinions are entitled to great consideration. Joseph v. Henry (1850) 1 Lown. M. & P. 388; Re Charkish (1873) L. R. 8 Q. B. 197; Broad v. Perkins (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 533; Ex parte Fassett (1892) 143 U. S. 479, 35 L. ed. 1087; followed in Re Engles (1892) 146 U. S. 357, 36 L. ed. 1004; Morrison v. United States Dist. Ct. 147 U. S. 14, 37 L. ed. 60. In our judgment, it is important to adhere to the principles above declared. The writ of prohibition has not been regulated by statute in this state. In determining when it shall issue, we are left to follow the principles and usages of the common law concerning it. The true function of the writ is to check the exhibition of judicial power beyond the lines marked out by law as the limits for its exercise. It may be used to prevent action by a court in excess of its legitimate authority in the course of a cause whose subject-matter lies within the general cognizance of the court, as well as to forbid assumption of authority over causes not committed by the law to its decision; but it cannot be applied to compel a judicial officer to substitute the opinion of some other court for his own upon such an issue as that involved in the case in the Cape Girardeau common pleas court, namely, whether or not another action is pending between the same parties for the same property in some other forum. Under our statutes already cited, the determination of such an issue belongs rightfully to the court in which that issue is raised in any action. Hence a ruling thereon would not be a proper subject for a prohibition; certainly not where, as here, the facts supposed to affect or defeat the right of the court to proceed are outside the record or judicial cognizance of the court and the latter has never been called upon to rule upon them. State v. Judge of Third City Ct. (La., 1892) 11 So. 985; Hudson v. Judge of Super. Ct. of Detroit (1879) 42 Mich. 239. If, whenever a question of priority of right to property depends on the priority in legal force and effect of process or orders of different co-ordinate courts of Missouri, this court is to take up the controversy, and settle it by a writ of prohibition, before the courts of first instance have passed upon it, this court would soon find itself called upon to decide a great number and variety of cases and issues which the trial courts are equally authorized to determine, and which their machinery gives them greater facilities to determine conveniently. We should certainly assume, in advance of the submission of any such issue or controversy to a trial court, that it will decide it fairly, impartially, and in obedience to the principles of law. The suggestion that the use of prohibition may be necessary to prevent a physical conflict between the parties or officers of these courts we regard as of little weight. The parties in possession of any property that forms the subject of litigation are entitled to retain it until there is an adjudication of the right to possession, or until finally ordered by competent authority to surrender that possession. Any hardship there may be to one wrongfully kept from the possession of his own during the pendency of legal proceedings to assert his rights is one which is unavoidable under our system of jurisprudence, and cannot be made the basis for a departure from the usual and orderly mode of administering justice according to existing laws. Porter v. Sabin, (1893) 149 U. S. 473, 37 L. ed. 815. We conclude that the writ of prohibition should be denied, and the preliminary rule upon defendants discharged. Hence we dissent from the judgment of the majority of the court granting the writ, and acting upon the present right to the possession of the property in the custody of the receiver of the common pleas court.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

City of PHILADELPHIA, Appt.,

v.

MASONIC HOME OF PHILADELPHIA.

(160 Pa. 572.)

A home open only to free masons is not public so as to come within a constitutional provision exempting from taxation institutions of "purely public charity."

(Williams and Green, JJ., dissent.)

(April 2, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the A Court of Common Pleas, No. 4, for Philadelphia County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to compel payment of certain taxes. Reversed.

Defendant's charter was as follows: "Section 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general assembly met, and it is hereby enacted, by the authority of the same, that Robert A. Lamberton, Christian F. Knapp, Henry B. McKean, Michael Nisbet, John A. Wright, D. W. C. Carroll, Jeremiah L. Hutchinson, Samuel B. Dick, James M. Porter and James H. Hopkins, their associates and successors, be and they are hereby created a body corporate and politic, with perpetual succession, by the name and style of 'The Masonic Home of Pennsylvania,' and by that name are made capable in law and equity to sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, contract and be contracted with, and to make, have, and use a common seal and the same to break, alter, renew, at pleasure, ordain by-laws, and shall have the right to take and hold by purchase, gift, or devise, real and personal estate, free from all taxation, for the purposes hereinafter named, and to sell, convey, or exchange the same at pleasure.

"Sec. 2. The object of said institution shall be to provide and sustain in the state of Pennsylvania one or more houses for destitute widows and orphans of deceased free masons of the state of Pennsylvania, and an infirmary or infirmaries for the reception and care of sick and afflicted free masons in indigent circumstances, and all such as may be placed under its charge by its managers.

"Sec. 8. The membership of said institution shall consist of life members, active members and representatives of masonic bodies, under such regulations as the committee of management may prescribe—all of whom shall be free masons.

"Sec. 4. There shall be a meeting of the members of the institution called within three months after the passage of this act, for the purpose of electing members of the committee of management, prescribing its constitution and general rules and regulations for the government of the institution."

The by-laws, which are of material importance in this case, were as follows:

"OBJECT OF THE HOME.

"Section 1. The masonic home shall have for its object, to provide and maintain a home for indigent, afflicted, or aged free masons, and for the destitute widows and orphans of free masons in the state of Pennsylvania, and for such others as may be placed under its charge.

"CORPORATION.

"Sec. 2. This corporation shall be composed of individuals as representatives of such masonic bodies as are recognized by the grand lodge of free and accepted masons of Pennsylvania, and of such master masons as may become members thereof by complying with the by-laws.

"ADMISSION OF INMATES AND FEES.

"Sec. 41. Every nomination for admission into the home as an inmate shall be made in writing, at a stated meeting of the board of managers, setting forth the name, age (not less than fifty-five years), residence, social condition, and masonic membership of the nominee, with such other information as the board of managers may require.

"All nominations shall be recorded in a book kept for that purpose, in the order in which they are presented, and shall be referred by the board of managers to the committee on admissions.

"Sec. 42. Inmates shall be admitted into the home after report of the committee on admissions; those under sixty years of age requiring a two thirds, and others a majority, vote of the board of managers.

"Sec. 43. Each representative shall be entitled to make as many nominations for admission into the home as inmates as he may deem advisable, at the request of the masonic body represented by him; but not more than one nominee of a representative shall be admitted as an inmate while other nominees are upon the list from bodies which have at the time no inmate, and whose admission is approved by the board of managers.

"Individual members may also make nominations, subject to the same restrictions as to inmates as hereinbefore stated.

"In the event of an inmate withdrawing from the home, for any cause whatever, within three months after admission, so much of the fee paid into the funds of this corporation as shall remain after deducting five dollars ($5) per week for his board during his residence in the home, and, in addition, such other expenses as may be incurred in his behalf, shall be returned to the masonic body or individual member that paid the same.

"The preference for admission shall always be given in the following order, viz.:

"1. To such nominees as are members of masonic bodies represented in the corporation, and nominated at their instance.

"2. To such nominees as may be placed in nomination by a representative of one masonic body, where the nominee is a member of some other masonic body which is also represented.

"3. To master masons nominated by individual members.

"4. To master masons belonging to masonic bodies located within the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, but not represented in this corporation, who may have been nominated as aforesaid.

"5. To master masons of other jurisdictions upon such nomination.

"Sec. 44. There shall be paid into the funds of this corporation, as the admission fee of an inmate, the sum hereinafter named, according to the age of the brother so admitted as follows:

"If the applicant be fifty-five years of age, and not exceeding sixty years $250.00

"If the applicant be sixty years of age, and not exceeding sixty-five years 200.00

"If the applicant be sixty-five years of age, and not exceeding seventy years 150.00

"If the applicant be over seventy years of age 100.00

"Sec. 45. Any master mason wishing to secure a home for himself in his declining years shall, upon becoming a member of this corporation and the payment of four hundred dollars ($400) in addition to his membership fee, be at once nominated by a majority vote of the board of managers for admission into the home, in accordance with section 41 of these by-laws. He shall be exempt from the payment of annual dues, and upon reaching the age of sixty (60) years or upwards, shall have precedence, according to date of nomination, of all other master masons nominated by either representatives or by individual members, subject, however, to the restrictions of section 43 of these by-laws; provided, that any member of this corporation, becoming an inmate of the home, shall thereby forfeit and terminate his membership in the corporation.

"PERMANENT FUND.

"Sec. 46. The permanent fund shall consist of the fees for life membership and admission of inmates, and of all donations and bequests, when not otherwise designated by the donor or legatee and such other amounts as may be voted to the fund by the board of managers.

"All investments in the permanent fund shall be made under the supervision and direction of the committee on finance, who shall make a report of the investments in the fund annually, or whenever required, to the board of managers and the corporation.

"The interest from such investments shall be paid to the treasurer for the general uses of the corporation."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Isaac H. Shields, James Alcorn, and Charles F. Warwick, for appellant:

As the legislature could not go beyond the power conferred by the constitution, the Act of 1874 cannot be construed to extend the exemption from taxation to any associations or institutions other than institutions of purely public charity.

By the use of the phrase "public charity" the constitution recognizes a charity which is not public, and only exempts from taxation that charity which is wholly, entirely, and completely public.

The latest and broadest definition of a public charity is, "whatever is gratuitously done or given in relief of the public burdens, or for the advancement of the public good."

Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 565.

The public character of the charity, then, is determined not from the motives or sect of the donors or those in control, but from the donees or beneficiaries.

A purely public charity is one for the benefit of the public and not for the members of an order, sect, or denomination. It must be founded, endowed, and maintained by public or private charity.

A preference, as in Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, supra; Burd Orphan Asylum v. Upper Darby School Dist. 90 Pa. 35; Donoghue's App. 86 Pa. 306,—does not prevent the charity from being purely public, nor does the fact that the beneficiaries pay part of the expenses of the institution as in Northampton County v. Lafayette College, 123 Pa. 132; Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Assn. 125 Pa. 573.

In Delaware County Inst. of Science v. Delaware County, 94 Pa. 163, where a library was established for the use of the members only, it was held not to be a purely public charity.

So in Miller's App., 10 W. N. C. 168, where the school was erected for the education of the children of catholic parents.

Section 2, article 9, of the Constitution, repealed all special exemption laws.

Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 397, 35 Am. Rep. 670; Perkins v. Slack, 86 Pa. 270; Lehigh Iron Co. v. Lower Macungie Twp. 81 Pa. 484.

Mr. Robert H. Hinckley, for appellee: The Act of May 14, 1874, Pamphlet Laws, 158, does not, by any of its terms, repeal the previous Statute of 1871.

A general affirmative statute will not repeal a previous particular statute upon the same subject, though the provisions of the former be different from those of the latter.

Bell v. Allegheny County, 149 Pa. 381, 30 W. N. C. 194.

The exemption contained in the Act of 1871, whereby the masonic home was incorporated, conferred a special privilege upon the home, and this privilege cannot be repealed by any general law without words of express repeal.

Williamsport v. Brown, 84 Pa. 438; Sifred v. Com. 104 Pa. 179.

The provisions of the Constitution of 1874 "did not execute themselves so as to repeal any existing laws, providing for the assessment and collection of taxes;" they merely impose restrictions upon the future legislation when it should be enacted.

Coatesville Gas Co. v. Chester County, 97 Pa. 476; Erie County v. Erie, 118 Pa. 367; Allegheny County v. Gibson, 90 Pa. 411, 35 Am. Rep. 670; Evans v. Phillips, 117 Pa. 237.

The true test, whether a charity is a purely public one within the meaning of the Act of 1874, is whether there is any gain or profit to any class of persons or corporation who can assert a right to be beneficiaries.

Burd Orphan Asylum v. Upper Darby School Dist. 90 Pa. 21.

As in that case a limit of the bounty of the asylum to those who were Episcopalians was not held to detract from its public character, so surely the fact that the benefits of the masonic home are limited to those who become masons could not be held to detract from its public character.

Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Asso. 125 Pa. 572.

What right has the city to say to the charitably disposed persons, "We will take the money you intended for the support of these poor helpless inmates, and apply it to the use of the city?"

Donohugh's App. 86 Pa. 313.

The case of Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 565 (1892), is one of a purely denominational school, supported by fees received from those who are educated.

In Blenon's Estate, Brightley (Pa.) 338, the testator left property "to the different institutions of charity and beneficence constituted and established at Philadelphia for the relief of the unfortunate and for those who live under the influence of infirmities and of every sort of privation, without any distinction of sect or religion."

It was held by the court that societies of a religious character, whose charities were exclusively confined to a particular sect, were not excluded from the benefits of the charitable bequest.

a free, pure charity for the benefit of that indefinite class of the public who might become free masons. A man is as likely to become a free mason as he is to become a seaman, and yet a charity founded as a sailor's snug harbor for sailors only was sustained.

Atty Gen. v. Pearce, 2 Atk. 87.

So a charity to the poor of a particular township.

Lawrence County v. Leonard, 83 Pa. 206.

A trust to educate male, white orphans, or for the assistance and encouragement of young mechanics, or to procure food during the winter for poor housekeepers who are widows, or for the help of those placed in a hospital during the existence of yellow fever, or to pay premiums to ingenious men and women who make useful inventions, or for a hospital for the relief of the indigent blind, or for a trust to renew shade trees, or for a trust for the poor of the northern liberties, or for a trust for poor widows as are not assisted by any public charity, or a trust to pay money to soup societies, or a trust for the benefit of widows whose husbands have died within the limits of Southwark, and to no other description of widows, is a valid public charity.

Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 172.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is nothing of doubt in this case except the question as to whether the appellee is an "institution of purely public charity," within the meaning of section 1, article 9, of the Constitution of 1874. If it be not, nothing in its charter or the statutes can avail to exempt it from liability to taxation. The contention turns on the constitutional meaning of the words "purely public charity."

"Words in a constitution, that do not of themselves denote that they are used in a technical sense, are to have their plain, proper, natural, and obvious meaning." Monongahela

Nac. Co. v. Coons, 6 Watts & S. 114.

The legal definition of the word "charity" has been the subject of much discussion in the courts, especially in those of England, but its meaning here, discarding all technical sense, is "a gift to promote the welfare of others." The appellee clearly is a charity. It provides for and maintains in the "Masonic Home" indigent, afflicted, and aged free masons. This, too, from voluntary contributions, without charge to the beneficiaries, and with no profit either to the corporation or to its officers. Not one of the corporate officers receives a cent of compensation for administering its affairs. Such unselfishness excites the admiration and approval of all friends of humanity. Gen. Wagner, president of the home, testifies: The number of inmates at present is thirty. Their average age is seventy-two years. All are decrepit. If they could support themselves, they would not be admitted. The money to support them is contributed by different masonic lodges, individuals, masons, men and women. The receipts are always less than the expenses, and a deficit has to be made up at the end of each year. No one is benefited except the inmates. They are fed, clothed, and lodged during life and buried at death, at the expense of the home." Of course if this be not purely charity, nothing is. But is it a public charity? The word "public" relates to or affects the whole people of a nation or state. Gen. Wagner further testifies: "The home is open only to those who are masons. A man, to be admitted, must be a mason." When the eligibility of those admitted is thus determined, it seems to us the institution is withdrawn from public, and put in the class of private, charities. A charity may restrict its admissions to a class of humanity, and still be public. It may be for the blind, the mute, those suffering under special diseases; for the aged, for infants, for women, for men, for different callings or trades by which humanity earns its bread; and, as long as the classification is determined by some distinction which involuntarily affects or may affect any of the whole people, although only a small number may be directly benefited, it is public. But when the right to admission depends on the fact of voluntary association with some particular society, then a distinction is made which concerns not the public at large. The public is interested in the relief of its members, because they are men, women, and children, not because they are masons. A home without charge, exclusively for Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Catholics, or Methodists, would not be a public charity. But then to exclude every other idea of public, as distinguished from private, the word "purely" is prefixed by the constitution. This is to intensify the word "public," not "charity." It must be purely public; that is, there must be no admixture of any qualification for admission, heterogeneous, and not solely relating to the public. That the appellee is wholly without profit or gain only shows that it is purely a charity, and not that it is a purely public charity. Nor does the argument that to the extent it benefits masons it necessarily relieves the public burden, affect the question. There is no public burden for the relief of aged and indigent masons. There is the public burden of caring for and relieving aged and indigent men, whether they be masons or anti-masons; but age and indigence concern the public no further than the fact of them; it makes no inquiry into the social relations of the subjects of them. Burd Orphan Asylum v. Upper Darby School Dist., 90 Pa. 21, is cited as sustaining a different view. The test there, as to whether the defendant was a purely public charity, was whether there was any gain or profit to any class of persons or corporations who could assert a right to be beneficiaries. As there was not, and as the administrators of the charity could, in their discretion, select those who should be the recipients of the benefits, giving only a preference, the court held it to be a purely public charity. While concurring in the judgment in that case, because the facts showed it was administered as a purely public charity, I do not concur in the reason given for distinguishing a quasi public from a purely public charity. I would put the distinction on firmer, as well as on what seems to me more clearly defined, ground: Is any member of humanity—that greater public of whom the commonwealth is constructively the parent or trustee—excluded because he has not a particular relation to some society, church, or other organization, which relation is dependent on his wholly voluntary act? If so, if he be excluded in fact, because he is not a Presbyterian, free mason, or a member of some one of the innumerable religious, social, or beneficial organizations of the commonwealth, then, however pure may be the charity, however commendable its purpose, it is not "purely public," and its property must, under the constitution, be taxed; not because this court says so, but because the people have said so in their fundamental law. Here, while the charter and by-laws of the institution do not show that it is not "purely public," the undisputed facts as to the administration of the charity show that none were admitted except free masons; of course excluding all other aged and indigent men, because they had not chosen to become members of a particular society. This made admission depend on an artificial badge of distinction, and not on one incident to humanity, and therefore it is not "purely public." If this be purely public, then what is not purely public? This is not a question to be decided on sentiment. If it were, our inclinations would prompt to a different conclusion. But there is not much sentiment in the constitution. It is a barrier erected by the whole people against encroachments on the rights of the people as a whole. They have forbidden an annual appropriation of their money in a sum equal to the amount of taxes here imposed, for the benefit of a favored few. The duty of a court, when called upon to decide such a question, is so plain, that "he who runs may read." As to the argument that the Act of 1871 exempted the home from taxation, the Act of 1874, when read in connection with the Constitution of 1874, repealed all such exemptions enacted after the constitutional amendment of 1857. It is so decided in Wagner Free Inst. v. Philadelphia, 183 Pa. 612, and Philadelphia v. Pennsylvania Hospital, 184 Pa. 171.

The judgment is reversed at costs of appellee, and a new trial is awarded.

Williams, J., dissenting:

This appeal depends on a definition. Its decision will affect many of the noblest charities in the state. The words requiring definition are the words "purely public," as used in section 1, art. 9, of the Constitution of Pennsylvania. The paragraph in which the words occur is as follows: "But the general assembly may, by general laws, exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes, actual places of religious worship, places of burial not used or held for private or corporate profit, and institutions of purely public charity." A majority of this court holds that the defendant, the masonic home, is not an institution of purely public charity, and for that reason is subject to taxation like all other property held by private persons or organizations for private purposes. The correctness of this decision depends on the result of two preliminary inquiries: First. What is the meaning of the words "purely public," as used in the constitution? Second. What is the character of the masonic home, and its work? In reply to the first of these questions it should be noticed that the legislature has undertaken an interpretation of the constitutional provision, and of these particular words, by a law passed at the same session at which the adoption of the constitution was formally declared. The law was passed for the express purpose of giving effect to the constitutional provision authorizing the exemption of certain property from taxation, and to guide the taxing officers of the state in determining what property was entitled to the exemption authorized by the constitution. This purpose made it necessary to consider and determine the exact extent of the limits within which the exercise of legislative power was permissible under section 1, article 9; and to define accurately each class of property to which the privilege of exemption was extended by it. Our present concern is with the fourth class, viz.: "Institutions of purely public charity." The Act of 1874 interpreted these words, and enumerated the institutions embraced by them, so as to include "all hospitals, universities, colleges, seminaries, academies, and institutions of learning, benevolence or charity, . . . founded, endowed, and maintained by public or private charity." This definition is broad enough to include the masonic home, and all similar institutions of charity; and, unless the constitutionality of the act can be successfully assailed, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. It should be noticed, in the next place, that this court has adopted and followed the legislative definition in several cases in which the question was fairly raised and squarely decided. The first of these was Burd Orphan Asylum v. Upper Dorby School Dist., 90 Pa. 21. The Burd Asylum was founded and endowed under the will of Mrs. Burd, "to establish an asylum for poor white female orphans." But not all poor white female orphans were entitled to admission. They were required to be of legitimate birth, not less than four nor more than eight years of age, and baptized in the Protestant Episcopal Church; preference being given to such orphans in the city of Philadelphia; after them, to such orphans in the state of Pennsylvania. If both city and state failed to fill the asylum with those who met all the requirements, then poor white female orphans within the required age might be admitted without regard to the place of their birth or the fact of their baptism. This was not a public asylum in the sense of being open to the general public. It was a denominational institution, under denominational control, open, in the first instance, to children baptized in the churches of the denomination, and, if enough such could be found, then to no one else. We held that such an institution was a charity. As it was administered in the interest of the helpless in the city and the state, it was a public charity; as there was no element of private or corporate gain in its organization or management, it was a purely—that is, wholly—public charity. It was within the letter of the Act of 1874, and within the spirit or intention of the constitutional provision. In Mrs Ins. Patrol of Philadelphia v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 624, 1 L. R. A. 417, we held that an organization whose purpose was to save life and property endangered by fires, without charge to the persons or to the owners of the property rescued by the efforts of the members and employees of the organization, was a charity. It was supported by contributions made by insurance companies and others, and rendered its services gratuitously whenever and wherever a fire occurred in the city. It was, therefore, a public charity; and, as there was no profit or gain to its projectors or managers contemplated, and no return received from those benefited by its labors, it was wholly—that is, purely—a public charity. The same doctrine was held in Philadelphia v. Women's Christian Asso. 125 Pa. 581; in Northampton County v. Lafayette College, 128 Pa. 183; and Episcopal Academy v. Philadelphia, 150 Pa. 565. In each of these cases the Act of 1874 was treated as a correct exposition of the constitutional provision. Other questions were raised and considered, but in no one of these cases has this court given expression to the slightest doubt about the constitutionality of the Act of 1874, or attempted to give any other definition of the words "purely public charity" than that given by the legislature in that act. The same definition may be found in substance, in Donohugh v. Library Co. of Philadelphia, 86 Pa. 806, in which we said that a purely public charity "is not necessarily one solely controlled and administered by the state, but the phrase extends to and includes private institutions for purposes of purely public charity, and not administered for private gain." We defined the word "purely" in the same manner in that case as in the latter cases above referred to, as meaning "completely," "entirely." The institution must not be administered for private gain, but completely, entirely, purely, in the interest of the charity. Upon this distinction the property of the Delaware County Institute was held liable to taxation. Delaware County Inst. of Science v. Delaware County, 94 Pa. 168. The advantages of that institute were confined to its members, and it was for that reason a private charity, if it could be regarded as a charity at all. The benefits came back to the members, who were necessarily the contributors, and no one else shared in them. It was not intended to serve the public, or to relieve in the slightest degree the public burdens, but to minister to the tastes and the intellectual improvement of those whose money purchased the books and provided for their care. A provision for one's self, or for those for whom he is legally bound to provide, is private and personal in its object. It has no public purpose or work. So a hospital or school designed to secure to a town or a region better medical attention or better education than would otherwise be within the reach of such town or region, may be a charity in an important sense, but if it is conducted with a view to private or corporate gain it is a private charity. If it is conducted and maintained by the gifts of individuals or the public, for the benefit of its inmates, it is a public charity; and, being free from the element of private or corporate gain, it is a purely public charity, within the meaning and the letter of the Act of 1874, and is protected from taxation by the list of decided cases already cited.

But let us suppose that the legislative definition of a purely public charity had not been made, and the decisions cited had not been rendered, and the question was now to be considered as one of first impression, how, in such case, ought it to be determined? The subject before the framers of the constitution was taxation. They declared this should be uniform, and levied under general laws, but some property ought not to bear taxation, and so exemption from the public burden came to be considered. This also must be regulated by general law, and not left to the caprice of favoritism or prejudice of the lawmakers. Where may the legislature draw the line that shall separate the taxable from the nontaxable property of the state? This question was answered by the adoption of the well-understood distinction between public and private uses. The words employed were "public property used for public purposes,"—that is, property the title to which is in the public, and which is actually used for some public purpose; "actual places of religious worship," no matter who may own them or worship in them, for the support of public worship tends to the public improvement; "places of burial, not used or held for private or corporate profit," for the gift of land to the public for purposes of burial is a gift to a public use; and, finally, "institutions of purely public charity," or, in other words, institutions that are already ministering to the public, and so ought not to pay taxes, because public in the ends they serve, and without any element of private gain in their organization or management. This is the plain, obvious meaning of the consecutive sentences devoted to the subject of exemption from taxation. Moreover, the reason for any exemption should be considered. Why ought any property to be exempt? Taxes are levied and collected to provide the public purse with money for the support of public institutions conducted by it, and to defray public expenses, in the preservation of order, the administration of justice, and the support of public schools. A woman like Mrs. Burd, or a man like Stephen Girard or Isaiah Williamson, devotes a large fortune to the founding and endowment of an institution intended to relieve the public burden and advance the public good, by taking up some part of its work, and doing it with more thoroughness and fidelity than the public could do it through its officers. The property of such an institution is not simply contributing, like taxable property in general, to the public good, but is devoted absolutely and irrevocably to it. The title may remain in trustees, but it is, in effect, dedicated wholly to public uses, with no element of private gain whatever. To levy taxes on property so given to a charitable use is unjust towards the benevolent giver, and is coldly cruel to the beneficiaries. This will be conceded as to the Burd orphan asylum and Girard college. To deny it, would be to shock the public sense of justice. A majority of this court, however, deny exemption to the masonic home, and the reasoning on which that denial rests would logically lead to a denial of it to all social, denominational, or trade organizations providing for the education, support, medical treatment, and burial of its members, their widows, and orphans. What is the masonic home? It is a corporation, whose object is set out in its charter, its constitution, and its by-laws. In the constitution it is stated thus: "The object of said institution shall be to provide and sustain in the state of Pennsylvania one or more houses for destitute widows and orphans of deceased free masons of the state, and an infirmary or infirmaries for the reception and care of sick and afflicted free masons in indigent circumstances, and all such as may be placed under its charge by its managers." In the by-laws it is stated in these words: "The masonic home shall have for its object to provide and maintain a home for indigent, afflicted, or aged free masons, and for the destitute widows and orphans of free masons, in the state of Pennsylvania, and for such others as may be placed under its charge."

It is conceded by my brethren that this is a charitable object, and that the home is a charity. The point taken is that it is a private, and not a public, charity. It was founded and endowed, as the evidence clearly shows, and it is maintained, by voluntary gifts. Out of the contributions made to it the grounds and buildings have been paid for, and the maintenance of its inmates provided. It is supporting, nursing, and caring for thirty or more aged men, who would otherwise be dependent upon the almshouse or other forms of charity supported by taxation. No profit is possible to any person, corporation, or society. The entire plant, and the stream of voluntary gifts on which it is dependent, are devoted wholly to the charitable work described in the constitution and by-laws of the home. The contributors get nothing for their money but the approval of their consciences, and the knowledge that they are increasing the happiness of the aged, indigent, and afflicted. I see nothing private about such a charity. It is not limited in its work to the donors or their children. It brings no pecuniary benefit or return. It is done in relief of public taxation, and in the interest of humanity, and that brotherly love that becomes the children of a common father. Preference is given to members of the masonic fraternity, their widows and orphans, but it is also open to all persons, regardless of their relation to the masonic body, who may apply for admission, and be found by the managers to be suitable persons "to be placed under its charge." Its doors are as wide as those of the Episcopal academy, or the Burd orphan asylum, or the Girard college. The requisites to admission are fewer and simpler. They are, first, masonic connection, and helplessness; next, helplessness, and suitability for admission to an institution conducted in the manner adopted by the managers for the home. The qualifications in both instances are to be judged of by the managers. So in any almshouse or hospital or asylum, the fitness of the applicant for admission must be determined by the proper officer before the doors will open to him or her. But it will perhaps be said that the purpose that moved the contributors was to provide for masonic brethren and their families, and that this ought to subject their gifts and their noble charity to taxation. Then every denominational hospital, school, or asylum should be taxed for the same reason. All contribute alike to the public good; all alike relieve the public burden and the taxpaying property of the commonwealth; but all give, to some extent, preference to a particular class of the public, and then open their doors to those outside the class who are within the general purpose of the charity. The women's christian association has for its beneficiaries young unmarried women. The snug harbor for seamen provides for sailors. The bricklayers' union for a limited subdivision of house builders. The homes for mechanics, apprentices, newsboys, sewing women, actors, disabled clergymen, and the like, all limit admission to the class of persons described in the names they have adopted. Indeed, in all charitable institutions, whether founded and maintained by private beneficences or by public taxes, some principle of selection prevails. The county poorhouse is for the care of those whose legal settlement is within certain geographical lines, and the wretch who cannot show his title to admission on the map must starve on the outside. A member of the great public may, like Lazarus, subsist on crumbs, or die for want of them at the gateway of a "public charity," if he belongs to another "poor district." Such a thing as a charitable institution that is open absolutely to the general public without limitation or restriction is not to be found in our state or country. Sailors and soldiers are cared for by the public in separate homes and separate hospitals. The state cares for injured miners in hospitals devoted to them exclusively. The deaf are in one institution, the dumb in another, the blind in a third. Hospitals are provided for consumptives, for persons afflicted with contagious or infectious diseases, for invalids whose diseases are of a nervous origin, and so on. The feeble-minded are gathered in one place, those crippled or deformed in body in another. The foundling has institutions to which it is admitted, and from which others are excluded. Homes for aged persons, for aged couples, for fallen women, are open only to those for whom the charity was founded. Then, too, there are homes for widows, to admission to which a previous marriage and the death of a lawful husband are the necessary requisites; schools for soldiers' orphans, from which all other children are excluded; homes for decayed merchants, for superannuated and disabled clergymen, for disabled and aged firemen, and a long list of similar charities founded for a class of beneficiaries selected by reference to their trade, occupation, social position, denominational affiliation, age, color, disease, or place of residence. These are all engaged in ministering to the public needs. They all do some part of the work, and bear some part of the burden, that would otherwise fall upon the public. They are all public charities, and, when free from any private or corporate gain, are purely public charities. The institution now made subject to taxation by the decision just rendered is one of the many charities, doing the work of the public without the aid of public money, and doing it more tenderly and more thoroughly than it could be done in charitable institutions supported by taxation. Such institutions not only provide food and clothing and necessary medical attention to their inmates, but they go further, they seek to assuage the sorrows, and cheer the last days of those to whom they minister, and surround them with the comforts of a well-appointed home. For this added liberality and care they are declared to be private charities, and compelled to take part of the gifts of the benevolent from those they were intended to benefit, and use it to pay taxes upon property actually dedicated to the public use. The position of the city of Philadelphia in levying taxes upon such charities is ungracious. It says, in effect, to them: "It is true, your property represents the unselfish gifts of the benevolent; it is true that it is devoted to the relief of suffering, and the care of persons who must otherwise be chargeable to us; it is true that your work is for the public good, and in relief of taxpayers,—but you must do what we do not; you must ask no questions, and take all who come. If you do not, then charity is a luxury which we shall tax you for. You must convert your home into a mere public almshouse, or else pay roundly for the privilege of carrying part of the public burden." The judgment of this court seems to be that the position of the city is correct, and that, notwithstanding the fact that a man or a society devotes a fortune to the care of the helpless and the relief of the taxpayers, the property occupied for the purposes of the charity so founded and maintained must be treated as a business investment, and compelled to pay taxes, though the money used for that purpose is taken out of the mouths and off the bodies of the inmates. I dissent from the judgment and from the reasons on which it is rested. In my opinion, nothing marks the advancement of the age in which we live so much as the growth of organized charity, and the increased care for the unfortunate and the helpless. This growth shows itself in the character of the hospitals, reformatories, and asylums supported by the public funds. It is seen in a still more striking manner in the number and variety of richly endowed charitable institutions that owe their existence and their power for good to the munificence of individuals. So long as sickness and poverty and misfortune are in the world, so long this field for private generosity will offer room for the labors and the fortunes of the benevolent. The better the field is occupied, the better it will be for the public at large, and for the individuals who help to make up the indefinite body we call the public. Now and then some piece of property used for charitable purposes may cease to pay taxes, but for every dollar so withheld from the public treasury many dollars will be saved to it by the relief of the public burdens by means of the charity so established.

But if we lift our eyes from the tax list, and consider the work done by these charities, of which there are several hundreds in this city alone, we shall see that the public gain from their labors and expenditures is incalculable. There is probably no city on either side of the ocean so justly celebrated for the multitude of its charitable institutions as Philadelphia. A distinguished citizen, who is himself actively identified with several of them, places the total number at about 600. Some of these are supported by public funds, but most of them are monuments to the enlightened liberality of private citizens who have given their money with a freedom and discrimination that are without any parallel, at least in this country. It would be difficult to name a form of suffering that has not been provided for by some generous man or woman whose attention has in some manner been drawn to that particular field for charity. The sums thus dedicated to the public service make an enormous aggregate, and the institutions supported by them embellish the city, and honor it. The masonic home is one of these. It now enjoys the undesirable distinction of being the first admitted charity which has no trace of private or corporate gain about its organization or management to be condemned by this court to the payment of taxes as the price of being allowed to go on with its unselfish work of charity. It carries part of the public burden. It lifts what it carries off the shoulders of the taxpayers. It does this with a stream of generous contributions from the pockets of private citizens. But it is now judicially determined that it must take the money contributed for the care of the sick, the infirm, the aged, the afflicted, and use a part of it to pay taxes on the buildings and grounds in which its work is carried on, and in which the homeless and helpless are sheltered and fed. I dissent wholly from the proposition that such charities are private. They are purely public. They are within the Act of 1874, as is admitted. They are within our own cases beyond any doubt. They are within the intent and meaning of the constitution, and are, in my opinion, clearly entitled to exemption from taxation. I would affirm the judgment of the court below.

Green, J., concurs in the foregoing opinion.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Phineas PARKER, Admr., etc., of William A. Parker, Deceased, App't.,

PENNSYLVANIA CO.

(.....Ind.....)

- 1. The act of one who, unacquainted with the plan and uses of an archway covering railway tracks leading into a manufacturing establishment, attempts to pass through it without license, notwithstanding obvious dangers from the narrowness of the arch and the obstructed view of the track, will prevent recovery from the railroad company for mere negligence in propelling into the archway at a speed prohibited by the city ordinance a car, by which he is killed.
- 2. Willfulness is not shown by mere failure to provide for the protection of a possible trespasser in an archway covering railway tracks leading into a manufacturing establishment into which a car is propelled at a negligent speed so as to render the railway company liable for his death notwithstanding his contributory negligence.

(June 6, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bartholomew County

NOTE.—The above case is valuable for its distinction between mere negligence and such willfulness as will preclude a defense of contributory negligence. See in this connection the note to Robinson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (Utah) 13 L. R. A. 765.

In favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate alleged to have been caused by the negligence or willful wrong of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion. Messrs. J. F. Cox and W. L. Cox, for appellant:

The only way to avoid the sufficiency of this complaint, is to hold that before appellee could be guilty of a willful act it must have seen deceased and intended to inflict the identical injury.

Where the negligence of defendant is so gross as to imply a disregard of consequences, or a willingness to inflict injury, the plaintiff may recover though he be a trespasser, or did not use ordinary care to avoid the injury.

Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Adams, 26 Ind. 76; Indianapolis, P. & O. R. Co. v. Petty, 80 Ind. 261; Carter v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 98 Ind. 552, 49 Am. Rep. 780; Palmer v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. 112 Ind. 250; Brannan v. Kokomo, G. & J. Gravel Road Co. 115 Ind. 115; Penso v. McCormick, 9 L. R. A. 818, 125 Ind. 116; Cooley, Torts, 674; 1 Hale, P. C. Am. ed. 475.

Appellee used the archway in loading cars with cereals to be shipped over its road, deceased used it as others did, in passing through negligence. See in this connection the note to Robinson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (Utah) 13 L. R. A. 765.

the building. Where persons are given license to pass through a building,—that is are permitted to do so, there being a footway through, opened to the public,—a person is not a trespasser under such circumstances, not such a trespasser as the law imputes to him negligence.

Whart. Neg. § 349.

A railroad company is not justified in maintaining a footway through an archway that has the appearance of safety, and then recklessly rolling a car into such archway, giving those therein no chance to escape death. The deceased being in the archway under the circumstances did not contribute to his injury.

Groves v. Thomas, 95 Ind. 861, 48 Am. Rep. 727.

The archway assumed the appearance of safety, nothing to warn him of pending danger. Appellant's decedent thought, from the appearance, that if cars were rolled into the archway he could step to one side and be safe. Appellee knew if he was in there he could not escape as the car would fill the archway from wall to wall. So the knowledge of danger was not as well understood by the one as the other. The law does not, under the circumstances, enjoin the same degree of care upon the injured party as upon the aggressor.

Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Selby, 47 Ind. 471, 17 Am. Rep. 719.

In a complaint for willful injury, it is not necessary to show that the plaintiff was without contributory fault or that an animal so injured was rightfully on the track.

Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Nash, 1 Ind. App. 297.

Mr. S. Stansifer, for appellee:

The spirit, meaning, and purpose of the ordinances are the protection of persons on public crossing and streets occupied by railroads, places where the public have a right to be and are expected to be.

By what right or authority was the deceased in the archway? There was the narrow archway with the railroad track through it. Even if in the open country he would have been held to knowledge that the track was a place of imminent peril, much more so situated as it was—a death trap. From all shown, the decedent was there without right, a trespasser, and, therefore the complaint is bad, regardless of the averment that he was free from fault.

To constitute a license it must appear, either expressly or by clear implication, that the owner of the track authorized them to use it.

Palmer v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. 112 Ind. 261.

As a rule of pleading, there must be an averment that the deceased was licensed to be where he was. The footway and habit could but be links in the chain of evidence to prove a license. Even if licensed, the archway was none the less dangerous, and it was negligence to go there without some showing of legitimate excuse for so doing.

The violation of the ordinances belongs to the domain of negligence.

The second paragraph to the complaint falls to show willfulness.

Hackney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant sued the appellee for damages in causing the death of William A. Parker. The complaint was in four paragraphs, to all of which the circuit court sustained demurrers, and this ruling is here presented for review. The theory of the first and third paragraphs is that the death was negligently produced, while the second and fourth paragraphs proceed upon the theory of willfulness in the acts complained of. The controlling facts alleged in any one of the paragraphs are that in the city of Columbus the appellee maintains a railway switch running east and west, and crossing the company's main line south of, and near to, the station building and platform; that opposite the station is located the cerealine mill, on the west side of said main track; that in said mill was an archway 250 feet long, and into which said switch was extended and maintained for the purpose of placing cars within said archway for loading from said mill of the product thereof; that the archway was so narrow that a box car almost filled it from wall to wall; that on the north side of said archway was a walk or footway four feet and two inches wide, used by persons passing through the building; that in the immediate vicinity of said crossing were usually large numbers of people; that said William A. Parker was unacquainted with said building and its surroundings when he walked into said archway upon said footway to a point near the center of the building, and was killed. It is alleged that the appellee then knew that persons were in the habit of passing through said archway, and that to run a car through said archway at great speed would endanger the lives of those who might be therein; that there was then an ordinance of said city limiting the speed of cars to four miles per hour, and requiring that some person should be caused to proceed in advance of any car moved backwards within said city, for the purpose of keeping the track clear of pedestrians; that in disregard of the requirements of said ordinance, and of the situation, with its dangers as described, the appellee's servants caused an engine to push a box car over said switch and into said archway at a speed of twelve miles per hour, unaccompanied by any person, and without the knowledge of, or warning to, said decedent; that said car so running ran upon and killed the decedent there, there then being no means of escape for him. The first and third paragraphs allege that the decedent was free from negligence, and the second and fourth paragraphs omit allegations of the absence of contributory negligence, and allege that the acts complained of were done willfully. There is also an effort to distinguish the charge of negligence from that of willfulness by alleging that there was a curve in the switch which prevented the decedent from seeing the approaching car, and that from the appearance of the archway he believed in good faith that he could pass through in safety.

It is conceded by appellant's learned counsel that the specific facts alleged control in the construction of the complaint, and that the detached phrases, epithets, and conclusions cannot prevail against the facts so alleged. It is further conceded that the failure to observe the ordinance does not constitute willfulness, and it is so held in Sherfey v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co., 121 Ind. 427. And it is conceded that the presence of contributory negligence on the part of the decedent would defeat a recovery on the ground of negligence, and that, if he was a trespasser such contributory negligence existed. Considering the right of recovery as for negligence, we find the complaint insufficient, in that it not only fails to allege a license to the decedent to use the archway, but it appears clearly from the facts alleged that said archway was a place of great danger for one to go into. It was narrow, not of sufficient width to admit a box car and furnish room for retreating. Through it ran a railway switch, and said switch so curved as to prevent a view of a car approaching the archway. The decedent was a stranger as to the conditions then existing in and about said archway, including its uses by the appellee. It is not alleged that it was a public thoroughfare, and the facts alleged would seem to imply that it was not. In venturing into the archway he was confronted with all of the elements of danger that the situation afforded. He was in duty bound to observe the dangers thus surrounding him. While we find it unnecessary to say that the facts show a rash assumption of the dangers incident to the situation, we do feel that it is beyond serious doubt that he was a trespasser upon the appellee's track when he lost his life. "It is not enough that persons do occasionally use the track, for to constitute a license it must appear, either expressly or by clear implication, that the owner of the track authorized them to use it." Palmer v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. 113 Ind. 250. Here it does not appear that the decedent knew of the use by others of the archway in passing through; on the contrary, it is a necessary inference from the allegation that he was unacquainted with the building and its surroundings; that he did not rely on the use of it by others as a license to use it himself. With this conclusion, the first and third paragraphs were insufficient, and the demurrer was correctly sustained to them. Some of the cases supporting this conclusion are: Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hedges, 105 Ind. 898; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Schmidt, 106 Ind. 78; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bryan, 107 Ind. 51; Belt R. & Stock Yard Co. v. Mann, Id. 89; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Ader, 110 Ind. 876; Palmer v. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. supra.

Considering the right of recovery as for willfully causing the death of the plaintiff's decedent, it is proper to observe the absence of an allegation that appellee's operatives knew of the presence of Parker. That one may be held liable for the consequences of a willful act without an actual knowledge of the presence of the object acted upon is urged, and may be conceded, but this liability is never held where the act or the omission is one from which the injury could not reasonably have been anticipated as the natural and probable consequence of such act or omission. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bryan, supra. In this case the rule was correctly stated by the late Judge Mitchell as follows: "Where one person negligently comes into a situation of peril, before another can be held liable for an injury to him, it must appear that the latter had knowledge of his situation in time to have prevented the injury; or it must appear that the injurious act or omission was by design, and was such, considering the time and place, as that its nature and probable consequences would be to produce serious hurt to some one. To constitute a willful injury, the act which produced it must have been intentional, or must have been done under such circumstances as evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others, and a willingness to inflict the injury complained of. It involves conduct which is quasi criminal. Louisville & P. Canal Co. v. Murphy, 9 Bush, 522; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Filbern, 6 Bush, 574, 99 Am. Dec. 690; Peoria Bridge Assn. v. Loomis, 20 Ill. 285, 71 Am. Dec. 268."

While it is admitted that the act complained of is negligence, it is earnestly and ably contended that, under the circumstances, considering the time, the place, and the habit of persons to pass through the archway, the act evinced a reckless disregard for the safety of others. It is not alleged that the appellee did not possess the right to use the switch at the time and place and under the circumstances then existing. The exact point at issue is in the excessive speed of the car through the archway, a place of danger, without affirmative action for the protection of a possible trespasser. While conceding expressly that the same act upon an open switch would have been but negligence, it is argued that the archway gave to one therein no means of escape, and that a different rule should obtain,—a rule whereby such negligence becomes an aggressive wrong. In the decision from which we have quoted the place of injury was a street crossing in a populous city, a place where the injured party was not a trespasser, but had a perfect right to go, and where the company was required to anticipate his presence. The crossing was alleged to be "extra dangerous by the track being hidden from view for some distance by intervening buildings." It was there held that the facts were "in no wise different from those involved in the ordinary case where a locomotive is run over a highway at a high rate of speed, without giving the statutory signals." These are merely acts of nonfeasance, not of aggressive wrong. The consequences of undenied contributory negligence cannot be avoided in such a case by the fact that the track was "hidden from view for some distance by intervening buildings." Willfulness does not consist in negligence; on the contrary, as illustrated by the cases of Bryan and of Mann, heretofore cited, the two terms are incompatible. Negligence arises from inattention, thoughtlessness, or heedlessness, while willfulness cannot exist without purpose or design. No purpose or design can be said to exist where the injurious act results from negligence, and negligence cannot be of such a degree as to become willfulness. Indeed, this court has so often denied the claim which attempts to distinguish between degrees of negligence, that authority or further statement in denial should not be deemed necessary. The railroad company owes to the trespasser no protection against negligence. It does owe him the duty of all reasonable effort to avoid injuring him when his presence and his own inability to avoid injury are known to it; but does it owe such duty when his presence is not known? It would seem that a negative answer is all that the inquiry is susceptible of. The circumstances should be such as to charge the operatives with knowledge, actual or imputed, of the presence of the trespasser, and of his inability to avoid injury, before any duty of the company arises to require of it affirmative acts or effort to avoid injuring him. By imputed knowledge in such case we mean such as should be implied from the conduct of the party or others within the actual sight or hearing of such operatives. It is upon such knowledge that wantonness is held the equivalent of willfulness. To require more would be to deny to railway companies the free use of their lines, and would require of them superhuman vigilance against inflicting injury upon the trespassing tramp who lurks about the yards to steal a ride, or loiters in some dark tunnel, or upon a respected citizen whose curiosity may lead him in such an archway as that of the cerealine mill. To require the companies to presume the presence of trespassers in places of danger, and to use all possible care to avoid injuring them, would destroy the line dividing negligence from willfulness in such cases, or would give no discouragement to trespassers, and would place in the same right the trespasser and those using the railway by a license or by public authority. We have no doubt that the facts as pleaded in the second and fourth paragraphs of the complaint state but causes for negligence, which causes are insufficient, for the reasons and upon the authorities upon which we hold the first and third paragraphs insufficient.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Michael C. HAYES, Appt.,
v.

William D. O'BRIEN et al.

(.....Ill.....)

1. A suit to set aside a deed and specifically enforce a contract for land involves a freehold, within the jurisdiction of the Illinois supreme court.

2. A suit to compel the execution or cancellation of deeds to land may be within the jurisdiction of a court outside of the county in which the land lies, if it has jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.

NOTE—The question of mutuality in a contract which is presented in an interesting manner in the above case is decided in harmony with the conclusions of the note on options with the case of Lits v. Goodling (Ky.) 21 L. R. A. 127.

3. The provision in the Illinois Chancery Act, § 3, that bills for injunction to stay proceedings at law shall be brought in the county in which the proceedings at law are had, does not prevent a court in another county from staying such proceedings at law as auxiliary or incidental relief in a suit to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of land.

4. The privilege of purchasing given a lessee, in case the lessor makes a sale of the premises, is not invalid on the ground that it is wanting in mutuality, since this privilege is part of the consideration for accepting the lease.

5. A description of land as the portion of a specified farm east of the right of way of a certain railroad, which runs in a northerly and southerly direction, is sufficient to identify the land, where the range, township, and section on which the land is situated are given.

6. An agreement in a lease that the lessee shall have the privilege of purchasing the premises upon such terms and at the same price per acre as any other person or purchaser may have offered, although it does not bind the lessor to make any sale, is valid and binding in favor of the lessee, if the lessor decides to sell, and is not incomplete or indefinite.

(March 31, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to compel specific performance of an alleged contract to sell real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Shope, J.:

This was a bill in chancery filed by Michael C. Hayes against William D. O'Brien and Fayette Thompson in the superior court of Cook county to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the conveyance of land situated in Lake county, and, as auxiliary to this relief, to enjoin O'Brien from the prosecution of a forcible entry and detainer proceeding brought by O'Brien against the tenant of Hayes before a justice of the peace of Lake county. O'Brien filed a general and special demurrer to the bill. Thompson entered a special appearance, and moved to dismiss the bill for want of jurisdiction. The motion and demurrer were heard together, which were sustained by the court, and the bill dismissed. From this decree, Hayes prosecutes this appeal.

So much of the contract sought to be enforced, material to an understanding of the opinion, is as follows: "This indenture, made and entered into this eighth day of April, A. D. 1889, by and between Fayette Thompson, of Waukegan, Lake county, state of Illinois, party of the first part, and Michael C. Hayes, of Chicago, Cook county, state of Illinois, party of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinafter mentioned, to be kept and performed by said party of the second part, his assigns, executors, or administrators, has demised and leased unto the party of the second part, the following described land, to wit: Situate in the county of Lake and the state of Illinois, and being a part of the south half of section thirty-four (34) and thirty-five (35) in township forty-six (46) north, of range twelve (12) east of the third principal meridian, more familiarly known as the 'Old Merchant Farm.' Said land is divided into unequal portions by the right of way of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company through said land in a northerly and southerly direction. All of that portion east of said right of way, only, is leased to said party of second part. To have and to hold the same to the party of the second part from the eighth day of April, A. D. 1889, to the eighth day of April, A. D. 1899. Said party of the first part hereby reserves the right or privilege of selling that portion of said land at any time from and after this date; but no such sale of said land shall be made by said first party without first having given said second party the privilege of purchasing said land upon such terms, and at the same price per acre, as any other person or purchaser might have offered therefor." Then follow covenants to pay rent at the rate of one dollar per carload of gravel removed, etc., and that not less than 250 cars per year shall be taken, etc. The bill alleges that in the month of September, 1889, Thompson, without any notice to complainant, and without giving him the privilege of buying, as he covenanted to do, sold and conveyed the land to O'Brien, who, it is alleged, purchased with full notice of complainant's rights. The bill charges fraud and collusion between O'Brien and Thompson to deprive complainant of the benefits of his lease, and his right to purchase, alleges acts of O'Brien and others interfering with complainant in the use and enjoyment of the premises, etc., and seeks to enjoin the same.

Messrs. K. R. Smoot, C. B. Eyer, and Monk & Elliott, for appellant:

The rule requiring mutuality does not apply where the optional agreement is made upon proper consideration or forms part of a lease or other contract between parties that may be true consideration for it.

Estes v. Furlong, 59 Ill. 298; Haworth v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, 90 Am. Dec. 612; Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63; Kerr v. Day, 14 Pa. 112, 58 Am. Dec. 526; Corson v. Mulvany, 49 Pa. 88, 88 Am. Dec. 485; Rogers v. Saunders, 16 Me. 92, 83 Am. Dec. 635; Justice v. Lang, 42 N. Y. 524, 1 Am. Rep. 576; Evins v. Gordon, 49 N. H. 444; Esmay v. Gorton, 18 Ill. 483; Farwell v. Louthier, Id. 252.

The agreement describes the land as being part of the government subdivisions designated "more familiarly known as the Old Merchant Farm." It is then stated that this is divided into two unequal portions by the right of way of the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company through said land in a northerly and southerly direction. The priority of right to purchase also relates to that portion of said land. This description is sufficiently descriptive and if it were not, the possession taken by complainant under the contract locates the land and removes all objection on the score of uncertainty.

White v. Hermann, 51 Ill. 248, 99 Am. Dec. 543; Hurley v. Brown, 98 Mass. 545, 96 Am. Dec. 671; Scanlan v. Geddes, 112 Mass. 15; Spangler v. Danforth, 65 Ill. 152; Mead v. Parker, 115 Mass. 418, 20 Am. Rep. 110; Purinton v. Northern Illinois R. Co. 46 Ill. 297; Ottumwa, C. F. & St. P. R. Co. v. McWilliams, 71 Iowa, 164.

The contract provides a way in which the price and terms are to be ascertained. It binds Thompson in accepting a proposition from a stranger to insert in it a condition that it is subject to an offer of the property, at the same price and on the same terms to appellant. The acceptance of an offer in violation of this duty is no less effectual in fixing the terms and price upon which appellant is entitled to a conveyance than if such duty had been complied with, the sale being to a purchaser with notice of his pre-emptive right.

If the statute applies, Hayes was entitled to a written offer of the land from Thompson before selling to another. In case of sale without such written offer the pre-emptive right remained unimpaired, and the court should direct an inquiry before the master to ascertain the price and terms of sale, and decree a conveyance to Hayes on making payment in accordance therewith.

Birmingham Canal Coal Co. v. Cartwright, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 424.

The statute of frauds does not apply.

An oral offer to Hayes would bind Thompson. The offer contemplated does not constitute part of the contract, but is something to be done in execution of it, proof of which might be made by parol.

Estes v. Furlong, 59 Ill. 298, and cases there cited; Norton v. Gale, 95 Ill. 533, 35 Am. Rep. 173, and cases cited.

The contract is taken out of the statute of frauds by the possession of Hayes and his improvements thereunder.

Morrison v. Herrick, 180 Ill. 631.

The contract is sufficiently certain, definite, and complete in its terms to be enforceable in equity.

Messrs. Whitney & Upton for appellee Thompson.

Messrs. S. M. Meek and O. R. Trowbridge for appellee O'Brien.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellees have entered a motion to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction in this court. The contention is that a freehold is not involved. The complainant, by his bill, seeks to have the deed made by Thompson to O'Brien set aside, and to specifically enforce his contract with Thompson, by compelling the defendants to convey the land described in the contract to him. We are of opinion that a freehold is involved. A decision in favor of either party would determine their right to the land, as between themselves. If adverse to the complainant, O'Brien would retain the title under his deed; if in his favor, the title of O'Brien would be divested. The motion is overruled.

The first point raised by the demurrer and motion to dismiss in the lower court is that the court had no jurisdiction: the land in respect of which specific performance was sought, lying in Lake county, and the bill having been filed in Cook. It is conceded that the court acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendants. We need not enter upon any discussion of this question, for the reason that it has been repeatedly held in this state that jurisdiction of the person invests the court with power to proceed to final decree in all that class of cases where it is sought to compel the execution or cancellation of deeds to land. Where the relief sought does not require the court to deal directly with the estate itself, the proceeding does not affect real estate, within the meaning of the third section of the chancery act; and the court, having the parties in interest all before it, may proceed, although the land to which the controversy relates may lie without the jurisdiction of the court. As said in Johnson v. Gibson, 116 Ill. 294, "the decree in such cases settles the rights of the parties before the court with respect to some contract, conveyance, or fraudulent conduct, and, by attachment or other coercive means compels the offending party to comply with the requirements of the decree." Enos v. Hunter, 9 Ill. 211; Cooley v. Scarlett, 38 Ill. 316, 87 Am. Dec. 298; Baker v. Rockabrand, 118 Ill. 365; Massie v. Watts, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 143, 3 L. ed. 181; De Klyn v. Watkins, 3 Sandf. Ch. 185, 7 L. ed. 818; Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 615, 2 L. ed. 1054, 23 Am. Dec. 669; Hart v. Sansom, 110 U. S. 151, 28 L. ed. 101.

It is also objected that the court was without jurisdiction to restrain the proceeding at law pending in Lake county. Section 3 of the Chancery Act provides: "Bills for injunction to stay proceedings at law, shall be brought in the county in which the proceedings at law are had." Unquestionably, if this was a bill to enjoin proceedings at law, simply, it could be brought only in Lake county. But such is not the primary object of the bill, that being to compel specific performance of the contract for the sale and conveyance of the land. It is apparent that, it having been alleged in the bill that Thompson had conveyed the land to O'Brien, complete relief could not have been afforded without making O'Brien a party defendant. He being a necessary party to the bill, therefore, and residing in Cook county, the bill might properly be brought in that county (Rev. Stat. chap. 22, § 3). and the other defendants brought in by summons in that proceeding. The court, having jurisdiction of the main purposes of the bill, would have the right to grant such auxiliary or incidental relief as would be necessary to make the relief sought complete. Lester v. Stevens, 29 Ill. 155; Baker v. Rockabrand, supra; Winston v. Midlothian Coal Min. Co. 20 Gratt. 686; Muller v. Bayly, 21 Gratt. 521.

The principal contention is that specific performance of the alleged agreement cannot be decreed—First, because it is wanting in mutuality; second, because there is an insufficient description of the premises alleged to have been sold; third, that the contract is so uncertain, indefinite, and incomplete as to be incapable of enforcement.

1. The doctrine of the earlier English and American cases, in which it was held that the want of mutuality of obligation and remedy would render the contract incapable of specific enforcement, has by the more modern cases been so modified that optional agreements to convey, without any corresponding obligation or covenant to purchase, will now be specifically enforced in equity, if made upon sufficient and valuable consideration; and so, where the agreement to convey is a part of a lease or other contract between the parties, for which the agreement to convey forms the true consideration, the want of mutuality will not avoid the contract. Estes v. Furlong, 59 Ill. 298; Hawrally v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, 90 Am. Dec. 618; Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 68; Maughlin v. Perry, 35 Md. 352; Backhouse v. Mohun, 3 Swanst. 434; Olson v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484; Willard v. Taylor, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 557, 19 L. ed. 501, and cases cited. In Willard v. Taylor, supra, it was covenanted in the lease executed between parties that the lessee should, at any time before the expiration of the lease, have the right to purchase the leased premises at a fixed price; and it was said: "The covenant in the lease giving the right or option to purchase the premises was in the nature of a continuing offer to sell. It was a proposition extending through the period of ten years, and, being under seal, must be regarded as made upon a sufficient consideration, and therefore one from which the defendant was not at liberty to recede." When the contract is unilateral, as in the case of an option to purchase, the court will, as said in Estes v. Furlong, supra, exercise its discretion with great care, and scan the conduct of the party claiming the benefit of such a contract; "but an agreement of this character cannot be regarded as invalid, or as one which will not be enforced in equity." In Hawrally v. Warren, supra, it is said: "In taking a lease, a tenant may be willing to pay a high rent for a number of years, provided the landlord will give him an optional right to purchase at a fixed price; and it is not to be presumed, that the landlord would agree to such a concession unless he had a consideration in the lease. Any sufficient consideration would make such unilateral contract binding in equity." We need not further review the authorities. The contract here is under seal, and imports consideration; but, if it were not, it is manifest that the privilege of becoming a purchaser of the premises formed at least a part of the inducement and consideration for the acceptance of the lease by the lessee. There is practical uniformity in the authorities that where the contract is otherwise valid, is fairly entered into, and is upon sufficient consideration, equity will enforce it, where there has been an acceptance of its terms by the vendee in apt time. Such a contract is a continuing obligation on the part of the lessor, running with the lease, which the lessee may accept, at his option, within the time limited. It is alleged in the bill that the sale was made by Thompson to O'Brien without notice to the lessee, and that immediately upon learning the same the lessee offered, and was and still is ready and willing, and offers by his bill, to take the land at the price at which it was sold, and that he demanded of Thompson and O'Brien conveyance of the land according to the agreement. This was all he could, or was required to, do. Estes v. Furlong and other cases supra.

2. The second contention arises, as we regard it, from a misapprehension. The land is described in the lease as a tract of land in Lake county, Ill., and "being a part of the south half of sections thirty-four (34) and thirty-five (35) in township forty-six (46) north, of range twelve (12) east of the third principle meridian, more familiarly known as the 'Merchant Farm.'" The land is then described as divided into two unequal portions by the right of way of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Company through said land in a northerly and southerly direction, and the description concludes: "All of that portion east of said right of way, only, is leased to said party of second part." The land contracted to be sold and conveyed in the land leased. The description given is clearly sufficient to admit evidence allunde the lease to identify the land. White v. Hermann, 51 Ill. 243, 99 Am. Dec. 548; Bowen v. Prout, 52 Ill. 354; Bybee v. Hageman, 66 Ill. 519; Billings v. Kankakee Coal Co. 67 Ill. 489. A deed or other written contract is not void for uncertainty in the description of the land sold or conveyed if, from the words employed, the description can be made certain by extrinsic evidence of facts, physical conditions, measurements, or monuments referred to in the deed. 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 1012; Smith v. Cranford, 81 Ill. 296; Rockefeller v. Arlington, 91 Ill. 375; Choteau v. Jones, 11 Ill. 300, 50 Am. Dec. 460; Lyman v. Gedney, 114 Ill. 395, 55 Am. Rep. 871. And thus a defective description of land may be aided by the conduct of the parties, such as that the vendor put the purchaser in possession of the premises intended to be conveyed. Purinton v. Northern Illinois R. Co. 46 Ill. 297; Ottumwa, C. P. & St. P. R. Co. v. McWilliams, 71 Iowa, 164.

8. The more difficult question arises upon the objection that the contract is indefinite, uncertain, and incomplete in its terms. After providing that the leasehold estate shall continue for ten years, it is stipulated: "Said party of the first part hereby reserves the right or privilege of selling that portion of said land at any time from and after this date; but no such sale of said land shall be made by said first party without first having given said second party the privilege of purchasing said land upon such terms, and at the same price per acre, as any other person or purchaser might have offered therefor." It is clear the latter part of this clause in the lease was inserted for the benefit of the lessee, and was intended to secure some right which he might otherwise not have had. It is urged that the contract is void, as a contract of sale, for the reason that there is no price fixed at which the sale should be made; and it is said, if it is enforced, the court must interpolate that term into the contract. This, it is at once conceded, the courts may not do. Their duty is to enforce contracts as made by the parties. In the construction of contracts, the intention of the parties—to be ascertained from the words employed, the connection in which they are used, and the subject-matter in reference to which the parties are contracting—must control; and courts are powerless to interpolate terms and conditions into the contract, to which the minds of the parties have not given assent. Courts will, however, look to the entire instrument, and, if possible, give such construction that each clause shall have some effect, and perform some office (2 Parsons, Cont. 7th ed. 633), and for this purpose will, as far as practicable, view the contract from the position of the parties at the time it was made, in order to understand their language, in the sense in which it was used. Wilson v. Roots, 119 Ill. 384; Wood v. Clark, 121 Ill. 362. And such construction will be adopted, if it can consistently and reasonably be done, as will render the whole contract operative. Field v. Leiter, 118 Ill. 21; Holmes v. Bemis, 124 Ill. 453; Bishop, Cont. 391-393. The lessor reserved the right to sell the land at any time, but covenanted that no sale of the land should be made by him without first having given the lessee the privilege of purchasing. Thus far there is no uncertainty. It will be seen that the lessee was given the right to purchase the land "upon such terms, and at the same price per acre, as any other person or purchaser might have offered therefor." This language is plain and unambiguous, and admits of no construction other than that the terms and price per acre at which the lessee might purchase was the same as offered by any other person or purchaser, and which the lessor was willing to accept. It is true, as said by counsel, the lessor was not bound to sell at all, nor was he bound to take any price offered. But he covenanted that before he would sell to any other person than the lessee, at any price, the lessee might exercise his option to take the land at the price offered; that is, the lessee might purchase upon the terms and at the price the lessor was offered by another, which he decided to accept. As already seen, the fact that, by the contract, the lessor was not bound to sell, would not render the contract invalid. By the contract of the parties, the lessee had acquired an estate for years in the land; and as parcel of the transaction, and entering into its consideration for the execution and acceptance of the contract, he acquired the right to purchase the leased premises, if his landlord determined to sell. It may well be that the landlord was then unwilling to sell at any price, and that the tenant was willing to accept a lease under him, but wholly unwilling to accept a lease for a term of years, and run the hazard of a sale to one whose interests might be inimical to his own. Indeed, the bill alleges that O'Brien was engaged in the same business as the lessee, and for which the latter was using the demised premises, and charges that the purchase by O'Brien was made for the purpose of harassing the lessee, and destroying his business, and that Thompson, colluding with O'Brien in that unlawful purpose, made the sale without notice to the lessee. It is argued by counsel for appellee O'Brien that reservation of the right of the lessor to sell may be construed as intending that the leasehold should terminate upon a sale of the premises; and it would seem this construction was put upon the contract both by Thompson and O'Brien. That question does not arise in this case, and it is unnecessary to determine it. If, however, that construction can be placed upon the contract, it at once becomes apparent that the right of purchase by the lessee was an important part of the consideration for his acceptance of the lease. It is clear the lessor was not bound to sell, but having determined to do so, at a price and upon terms satisfactory to himself, offered by some other person or purchaser, he covenanted that he would not sell to such other person or purchaser without first giving to the lessee the right to exercise his option to purchase the land upon the same terms; and it cannot be presumed that the tenant would have taken the lease without his covenant, or that the landlord would have granted the concession without each understanding that it entered into, and formed a part of, the consideration moving between them.

We know of no principle of equity that is violated by such a contract, nor are we referred to any case holding that a contract of this character may not be enforced in equity. The contract is that the lessee shall have a right to purchase at a price satisfactory to the lessor: and when fairly entered into, upon a valuable consideration, if the terms upon which the sale is to be made are fixed in the contract, or the parties have, by the contract, provided the means for their ascertainment, no reason is perceived why a court of equity may not compel its performance. The authorities are agreed that the contract must be complete; that is, must contain the terms, by the acceptance of which the grantee will become entitled to a conveyance. In most of the reported cases there has been an offer to sell, or an option to purchase, at a fixed price named in the written contract. But this is not necessary where the written instrument fixes a definite mode of its ascertainment. Thus, in Fogg v. Price, 145 Mass. 513 (being the principal case relied upon by appellees), the covenant was, "If the premises are for sale at any time, the lessee shall have the refusal of them." The court says: "This is simply an agreement to give the lessee the first chance to make a contract,—an agreement to sell if the parties can agree, and not otherwise. It neither fixes the price, nor provides a way in which it can be fixed." And it is manifest, as said by that court, that, to justify specific performance at the suit of the lessee, "a term would have to be added which is not in the contract." And the court, in that case, further says, "The contract certainly does not contemplate a sale to somebody else, as a mode of ascertaining the price at which the lessor will sell to the lessee;" citing Bromley v. Jefferies, 2 Vern. 415. In Bromley v. Jefferies, supra, on the marriage of the plaintiff with the daughter of Sir Rowland Berkley, the latter covenanted that if the plaintiff survived him, and had issue of the marriage, plaintiff "should have, Catheridge £1,500 less than any other purchaser would give for the same." Other disposition was made of the estate by will, the testator bequeathing £1,500 to plaintiff and wife. The court refused specific performance of the covenant "because, if the estate was not to be sold, but the plaintiff was to have it, it was not practicable to know what a purchaser would give for it." The clear intimation of both of these cases is that, had there been a mode of ascertainment provided for, the holdings would have been otherwise. According to the doctrine of some of the later cases, the difficulty found by the court in the Bromley Case would have been overcome; but it is sufficient, for the purposes of this case, that the refusal was placed upon the ground of the impracticability of ascertaining the price at which the plaintiff was to have the land. Practically, these are the only cases cited that are thought to be decisive against the right to enforce the contract. The other case cited (Buckmaster v. Thompson, 86 N. Y. 558) does not involve the question here being considered. On the contrary, where the contract was that there should be a fair valuation of the property, this court, in Estes v. Furlong, supra, said, "This implied a reasonable estimate to be made by the parties, or, if they could not agree, to be determined by the court upon proof;" and it was held that upon bill filed for specific performance, where vendor had refused to yield to an appraisal by other persons, but arbitrarily fixed the price at a gross sum, the court must determine the value upon proof, and enforce performance accordingly; citing Parkhurst v. Van Cortlandt, 14 Johns. 15, 7 Am. Dec. 437. So, in Milnes v. Gery, 14 Ves. Jr. 401, it was held that an agreement to sell at a fair valuation may be enforced, and that, if no means are pointed out in the contract to ascertain the value, the court may resort to any means adapted to the purpose. In Fry on 28 L. R. A.

Specific Performance of Contracts, after stating (sec. 214) that "it is evident that the price is an essential ingredient in the contract, and that where this is neither ascertained, nor rendered ascertainable, the contract is void for incompleteness and incapable of enforcement," the author says (sec. 216): "It is not, however, necessary that the contract should determine the price in the first place. It may appoint a way by which it is to be thereafter determined, in which case the contract is perfected only when the price has been so determined." The principle governing is: When the contract appoints the mode of determining the price, and the price is determined according to that mode, the contract becomes perfect and complete in all respects, as if it had been originally fixed in the writing. Norton v. Gale, 95 Ill. 533, 35 Am. Rep. 173.

The case of Homfray v. Fothergill, L. R. 1 Eq. 567, is an instructive case on this point. The agreement there was that no partner should sell his shares without first offering them or it to the other partners, collectively, after notice. If they refused to buy, the shares were to be offered to the partners desirous of collectively purchasing. If no two desired to purchase jointly, then to the partners individually, after which he might sell them to a stranger. The only limitation as to the price upon the sale to strangers was in the condition providing that he or she should sell the same, fairly, for £500 per share, at least, more than the price at which he or she offered the same to his or her partners collectively or individually. One of the partners offered his shares to the three remaining partners. One of the three refused to join with the other two, so there could be no collective purchase. A bill was filed by the two who were willing to purchase, and the court held that the offer to the partners inured to the benefit of the two who were willing to purchase, and decreed specific performance accordingly. There, it is apparent, the price was in the discretion of the seller, subject only to the limitation that he would not sell to a stranger for less than £500 per share more than he had offered to sell them for to his partners, collectively or individually. By the contract the price was to be fixed by the offer of the seller, and thereupon the right of the remaining partners to purchase became complete. See also, Re Houghton, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 136; Loeving v. Fogg, 18 Pick. 540; De Rutte v. Muldrow, 16 Cal. 518; Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 408; Race v. Groves, 48 N. J. Eq. 284.

Here the parties, by their contract, prescribed a mode by which the price at which the lessee was to purchase was definitely ascertainable. If the lessor received an offer for the land which he was willing to accept, that became the price at which the lessee might purchase, and, if the lessee accepted it, at which the lessor was bound to convey. It follows that the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill. The decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings. Reversed and remanded.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (Div. 2.).

Harry K. FORD, Resp't.,
v.

UNITY CHURCH SOCIETY OF ST. JOSEPH, Appt.

(.....Mo.....)

1. The word "divided" in a deed of "one divided fourth" of certain property will not be rejected so as to make a deed of an undivided fourth, where the result would be to ignore the intention of the grantor by passing an after-acquired title.
2. A deed may pass a subsequently acquired title by virtue of Rev. Stat. 1885, p. 355, § 3, where it appears to convey the fee simple absolute, although it is on consideration of love and affection alone.
3. A recorded deed made by one who has then no title to the land is not within the chain of title so as to be constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser to whom the same grantor conveys after obtaining title by a recorded deed.
4. A statutory provision that subsequently acquired title of a grantor in a deed purporting to convey a fee simple absolute shall immediately pass to the grantee, and "that such conveyance shall be valid, as if such legal authority had been in the grantor at the time of the conveyance," is not effectual to defeat a bona fide purchase by a subsequent grantee from the same grantor in reliance on the records, which do not show any conveyance by the grantor after acquiring title to the property.

(February 27, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Buchanan County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, P. J.:

This is an action of ejectment for the recovery of the south eight feet of lot 6, all of lot 7, and the north two feet of lot 8, all in block 28 in Smith's addition to the city of St. Joseph. The answer admitted possession, and denied each and every other allegation in plaintiff's petition. The case was tried to a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff. At the trial plaintiff introduced a patent from the United States to Fred W. Smith, a plat of Smith's addition to the city of St. Joseph, and a deed from Smith to James Cargill for lots 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, all in block 28 of said addition, of which the land sued for is a part. James Cargill, who is the common source of title, died in 1858, leaving a widow, Nancy G. Cargill (sometimes called Agnes G. Cargill), and four children,—George W. Cargill, John C. Cargill, Agnes Owen, and Abby N. Ford. James Cargill left a will, which was duly NOTE.—Conveyance recorded before grantor obtained title, as notice.

The subject of this note involves the application of two opposing principles of law, and the effect so far as the courts have declared it which is to be given to each.

Thus the question whether a deed with covenants of title given before the grantor acquires title and placed on record is to prevail over a deed given after the title is acquired to a purchaser in good faith for value and without notice of the previous deed was raised in Salisbury Sav. Soc. v. Cutting, 50 Conn. 113, but the decision was made upon other grounds the court saying on this point that the question was one of very serious difficulty inasmuch as in sustaining the later deed it would be necessary to deny the application of the settled principles of estoppel, and in sustaining the prior deed it would be necessary to violate the entire spirit of the registry system.

But few of the cases have discussed the relative extent to which each doctrine should be carried and applied, the great majority of them having been decided upon principles applicable to the one side of the question ignoring those applicable to the other side entirely.

In this note it is not attempted to incorporate all the cases relative either to the law of estoppel or to the law of notice from registration. The intent has been to include such cases and such principles only as relate to or are connected with questions arising out of conveyances made before the person conveying has acquired title. Many have been included, however, which do not relate to notice from registration, with a view to show as near as possible the border line between the opposing doctrines of estoppel and notice from registration.

The doctrine of estoppel.

The doctrine of estoppel as applied to the note is, that, where lands are conveyed with covenants of warranty or quiet enjoyment by one who afterwards acquires title thereto, the after-acquired title inures to the benefit of the grantees and the grantor is estopped to claim that he had no title at the time of making the conveyance. Middlebury College v. Cheney, 1 Vt. 336; Ward v. Willard, 13 N. H. 399; Foss v. Strachan, 42 N. H. 40; McClusker v. McEvey, 9 R. I. 523, 11 Am. Rep. 295, overruling contrary dictum in Gardner v. Greene, 5 R. I. 104; Jackson v. Matsdorf, 11 Johns. 91, 6 Am. Dec. 355; House v. McCormick, 57 N. Y. 310; White v. Patten, 24 Pick. 324; Knight v. Thayer, 125 Mass. 25; Somes v. Skinner, 3 Pick. 52; Trull v. Bigelow, 16 Mass. 413, 8 Am. Dec. 144; Green v. Clark, 31 Cal. 591; Bogy v. Shoab, 13 Mo. 365; Reese v. Smith, 12 Mo. 344; Gochenour v. Mowry, 33 Ill. 331; Jones v. King, 25 Ill. 388; Willis v. Watson, 5 Ill. 64; Rigg v. Cook, 9 Ill. 336, 45 Am. Dec. 482; Rout v. Crock, 7 Pa. 378; Brown v. McCormick, 6 Watts, 60, 31 Am. Dec. 450; Pike v. Galvin, 29 Me. 183; Baxter v. Bradbury, 20 Me. 260, 37 Am. Dec. 49; Lawry v. Williams, 13 Me. 231; Gregory v. Peoples, 80 Va. 355; Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 92; Burners v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 42; Goodson v. Beacham, 24 Ga. 150; Irvine v. Irvine, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 617, 19 L. ed. 800; Ryan v. United States, 136 U. S. 68, 24 L. ed. 447.

Thus when A sells land to B and afterwards sells it to C with warranty, and subsequently B reconveys it, the title thus reconveyed will inure to the benefit of C. Kimball v. Blandell, 5 N. H. 553, 22 Am. Dec. 476.

And where D made a deed to B of premises belonging to A which was duly recorded, and A afterwards conveyed to F whose deed was duly recorded and just previous to that conveyance F had conveyed the lands to D by deed which was not recorded until nearly ten years afterward, and in the meantime F again conveyed premises to C who duly recorded his deed, it was held that the title which inured to B's benefit by reason of the war-admitted to probate in the probate court of Buchanan county, by the second clause of which he gave all his real and personal estate to his wife for life, or until she should marry again. Mrs. Cargill, who survived her husband, lived until 1877, when she died without having married again. By the third clause of James Cargill's will he gave, at the death of his wife, his home place, describing it, to his son George Cargill, whom he appointed as his executor. By the fourth clause of his will it was provided that, at the death of his wife, his executor should take charge of all his property, real, personal, and mixed, and, after setting aside said home place to his son George, he should select three disinterested persons to divide all the remainder into four equal parts, and to each of his four children he devised and bequeathed one of these parts thus to be divided. In 1879, after the death of Mrs. Cargill, the executor selected three persons, who made division of the lands of which James Cargill died seised into four parts, and assigned one of these parts to each of the children named in the will, or to their assigns. The report of these commissioners is too long to be inserted in this statement. The lots sued for appear in that part which was assigned to John Cargill and his assign, the Real-Estate Loan Company, through which defendant's claim of title runs, being named the assignee of this particular portion. Prior to this division, and prior to the death of his mother,—even as early as 1860,—John C. Cargill, in conjunction with his wife, Sarah L. Cargill, conveyed by deed of trust his interest in all the real estate which his father owned at his death to Joseph C. Hull, trustee, to secure the payment of certain debts in said deed of trust described. Having made default, the trustee, Hull, in 1865 sold and conveyed, under the power conferred by said deed of trust, all the interest of John Cargill in said real estate to his mother, Agnes or Nancy, G. Cargill. In 1868, by a deed dated September 5th of that year, Mrs. Cargill, in consideration of one dollar and natural love and affection, made a deed containing covenants of warranty to her daughter Abby N. Ford, purporting to convey to her "the one divided fourth part" of certain described real estate, including said lots 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, of which the lots sued for are a part. To the introduction of this deed in evidence by plaintiff the defendant objected, because it was incompetent and irrelevant, because the deed was void and ineffectual to pass title to ranty in the deed being void because of D's failure to record his deed, B was entitled to recover of D for breach of covenant the amount paid by him for the land. Burke v. Beveridge, 15 Minn. 206.

So when one having no title makes a deed with warranty and the grantee enters upon the premises and the grantor afterwards takes a release from the owner it will operate as a confirmation of the title of the grantee, though neither the owner nor the grantor was in possession at the time of the release. Oakes v. Marcy, 10 Pick. 195.

And an estoppel to assert an after-acquired title takes place whether the prior grantee is seised in fact of the premises or not. King v. Gilson, 32 Ill. 848, 83 Am. Dec. 269.

So also an heir who conveys the lands of his ancestor during his lifetime which subsequently descend to him is estopped from recovering the property from his grantee. McPherson v. Ounliff, 11 Serg. & R. 422, 14 Am. Dec. 642.

And the heirs of one who sold and conveyed lands to which he had no title but to which he afterwards acquired title are estopped to deny the title of the grantee. McWilliam v. Nisly, 2 Serg. & R. 537, 7 Am. Dec. 54.

A covenant of general warranty binding the grantor and his heirs runs with the land and inures to the benefit of all subsequent purchasers. Torrey v. Minor, 18 Medes & M. Ch. 489.

And subsequent grantees as well as the grantor himself are estopped to claim that he was not seised in fee of the estate conveyed at the time of the conveyance to the first grantee. White v. Patten, 24 Pick. 324; Knight v. Thayer, 125 Mass. 25.

And an estoppel vests title in the grantee which is good as against strangers coming in after the estoppel as well as against the grantor and those claiming under him. Somes v. Skinner, 3 Pick. 63.

Thus when an administrator granted lands for the payment of debts conveying also a special privilege of carrying the water of a brook across adjoining lands of the intestate and such adjoining lands were afterwards distributed to the administrator as heir-at-law, and he conveyed them to a third person without making the reservation of the water rights, his grantee is estopped to deny the right to the special privilege. Coe v. Talcott, 5 Day, 88.

The estoppel created by the subsequent acquisition of title to lands which had been previously conveyed, operates the instant the grantor becomes the owner, the covenants in his deed passing the estate to his grantee. King v. Gilson, 32 Ill. 848; Jarvis v. Aikens, 25 Vt. 633; Somes v. Skinner, supra.

And his title is not affected by the failure to record or improperly withholding or the loss or destruction of the deed by which the title is subsequently acquired. King v. Gilson, supra.

In Shaw v. Galbraith, 7 Pa. 111, however, the estoppel against a subsequent grantee was held to take place, when he took with notice of the first deed.

A deed with covenants of warranty or quiet enjoyment operates as an estoppel against a claim of the grantor or his privies to a subsequently acquired estate where he had an interest which passed under the grant as well as where he had no interest at that time. House v. McCormick, 57 N. Y. 310.

Thus when lands of the state held under contract are sold and the grantor thereof afterwards acquires title from the state, it will inure to the benefit of his grantee and estop him and all persons claiming under him to claim adversely to the grantee. Fairbanks v. Williamson, 7 Me. 94.

So if a tenant for life sells the property by a deed which affirms the existence of an estate in fee simple in himself and the remainderman subsequently dies and the life tenant inherits the fee simple absolute, he and those who claim under him are estopped by the deed thus given before his fee-simple title accrued to him. Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 52 U. S. 11 How. 297, 13 L. ed. 708.

So also a deed given with warranty by a widow in connection with the heirs of an estate to secure a debt due from the estate and other purposes will estop her from afterwards claiming dower in the lands conveyed as against persons claiming under that deed, and the fact that the lands have been sold under a decree of the court for the benefit of creditors will not prevent the application of the rule. Hoppin v. Hoppin, 36 Ill. 265.

In Georgia after lands are drawn but before the any real estate, and because no real estate was described therein; but the court overruled said objection, and the defendant saved its exceptions. In fact, defendant objected to the introduction of every instrument except the patent, the plat, and defendant's original answer, read in evidence by plaintiff, on the ground, among others, that such instruments were irrelevant and incompetent, and saved exceptions to the action of the court in overruling defendant's objections thus made. After introducing a deed from Mrs. Abby N. Ford to the plaintiff, who is Mrs. Ford's son, and the admission by defendant to the effect that, at the death of her father, Abby N. Ford was a married woman, and that she continued to be such until February, 1890, when her husband, Erastus D. Ford, died, the plaintiff rested. Defendant demurred to plaintiff's evidence, which being overruled, the defendant duly excepted. The defendant's title, as shown by the deeds introduced in evidence, runs by two chains into Saxton, whence, becoming united, it runs into defendant. One of these chains of title into Saxton passes from John C. Cargill by his deed of trust to Joseph Hull, trustee, conveying his fourth, subject to his mother's life estate in the land; and by the trustee's deed from Joseph Hull, trustee, to Mrs. Cargill; and by the warranty deed from Mrs. Cargill to Sarah L. Cargill; and by the deed of trust from Sarah L. Cargill to James Hull, trustee; and by the trustee's deed from James Hull, trustee, to the Real Estate & Savings Association; and by the warranty deed from the Real Estate & Savings Association to the Real Estate Loan Company, and by it to A. M. Saxton. All these deeds were executed upon valuable considerations. The other chain of title into Saxton passed from Abby N. Ford, by the deed of trust of herself and husband, to Saxton, trustee, and by the trustee's deed from Saxton, trustee, to John D. Richardson, and by the deed from John D. Richardson to Saxton. By these two chains of title, the defendant contends that two fourths of the land (the John Cargill fourth and the Abby N. Ford fourth) passed into Saxton, but that, if only one fourth passed into him, it is sufficient to uphold defendant's title. The chain of title from Saxton to defendant passed through the warranty deed from Saxton to Floyd, Ransom & Steinacker, and through the warranty deed from Floyd, Ransom & Steinacker to defendant, the consideration expressed in the former deed being $3,500, and, in the latter, $4,500. At grant of the state issues, the equitable title is in the drawer and the legal title is in the state for his use, and in such case if the drawer conveys the lands and afterwards obtains the grant the legal title passes through him to his vendee by virtue of the statute of uses clothing the vendee with a complete title leaving the vendor nothing which he can convey to another. Henderson v. Hackney, 22 Ga. 383, 68 Am. Dec. 133; Thursby v. Myers, 57 Ga. 155.

When a person grants lands in which he has a mere equitable interest and afterwards acquires the legal title, he holds the title in trust for the grantee, and if he afterwards conveys it to another without the consent of the former grantee, the latter grantee, if he had notice of the prior deed, will be deemed to be substituted in the place of his grantor as trustee; but if the conveyance is made with the consent of the former grantee, he takes it discharged of the trust. Doyle v. Peerless Petroleum Co. 44 Barb. 230.

The fact that suit has been brought for breach of a covenant of seisin will not prevent a subsequently acquired title from inuring to the benefit of the grantor, if acquired before the assessment of damages is had. King v. Gilson, 82 Ill. 348, 53 Am. Dec. 269.

The above rules apply to mortgages containing covenants of warranty, executed by persons having no title to the mortgaged lands but who afterwards acquire title, the after-acquired title inuring to the benefit of the mortgagee and the mortgagor and his privies in estate in blood and in law, being estopped to question the mortgagor's title at the time of making the mortgage. Tefft v. Munson, 5 N. Y. 7; Christy v. Dana, 34 Cal. 548, 48 Cal. 174; Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 612, 76 Am. Dec. 449; Kirkaldie v. Larrabee, 31 Cal. 455, 89 Am. Dec. 205; Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20; Sherman v. McCarthy, 57 Cal. 507; Vallejo Grand Asso. v. Viera, 48 Cal. 572; Gochenour v. Mowry, 38 Ill. 331; Rigg v. Cook, 9 Ill. 336, 46 Am. Dec. 463; Pike v. Galvin, 29 Me. 183; Baxter v. Bradbury, 30 Me. 260, 37 Am. Dec. 49; Lawry v. Williams, 13 Me. 280; Plowman v. Shidler, 36 Ind. 484; Boone v. Armstrong, 37 Ind. 168; Gotham v. Gotham, 55 N. 23 L. R. A.

Thus when A mortgages to B while the title to the lands remain in the United States and afterwards obtains title by purchasing from C who had purchased from the government, and again mortgages the lands to D, A's title inures to the benefit of the first mortgagee. Warburton v. Mattox, Morris (Iowa) 387.

So, when one mortgages his property and afterwards mortgages it to another with warranty of title, and subsequently the second mortgagee buys in the first mortgage, taking a quitclaim deed after the mortgagor's equity of redemption is barred, and delivers a mortgage deed on the property to a third person, the estate covenanted for by the second mortgage vests in the holder of the mortgage deed by estoppel. Dudley v. Cadwell, 19 Conn. 227.

In Middlebury College v. Cheney, 1 Vt. 286, it was held that the subsequent acquisition of an outstanding title by one who had conveyed lands with covenants of warranty, discharges and satisfies such covenants.

And in Cornell v. Jackson, 8 Cush. 506, it was held that if a grantor of lands with warranty recovers a part of them, of which he was not in fact seized at the time of making the deed, it will go to reduce the damages pro tanto in an action for a breach of the covenant.

When one who has no title conveys to another and afterwards procures the holder of the title to convey to a third person instead of himself for the fraudulent purpose of preventing the title from inuring to the benefit of his grantee, his deed will be treated as a covenant to convey, and where the subsequent grantee takes with notice and without consideration equity will grant relief. Moore v. Crawford, 130 U. S. 122, 32 L. ed. 878.

No title not then in case, however, and no after-acquired title, will pass by a conveyance not containing covenants of warranty, and no estoppel is created thereby. Jackson v. Wright, 14 Johns. 19; Pelletreau v. Jackson, 11 Wend. 110; Dart v. Dart, 7 Conn. 250; Allen v. Sayward, 5 Me. 227, 17 Am. Dec. 221; Ham v. Ham, 14 Me. 351; Brawford v. Wolfe, 103 Mo. 391; Kimmel v. Benna, 70 Mo. 52; Valle v. Clemens, 18 Mo. 436; Bogy v. Shoab, 13 Mo. 365; Kinsman v. Loomis, 11 Ohio, 475; Doswell v.

the close of the evidence the court gave three instructions which peremptorily required the jury to find for plaintiff, to all of which defendant objected and excepted. Defendant asked eight instructions embodying its views of the law, all of which were refused and it excepted.

Messrs. M. A. Reed and B. R. Vineyard, for appellant:

The words "the one divided fourth part of," in the deed dated September 5, 1863, from Mrs. Cargill to Mrs. Ford and on the covenants in which plaintiff relies for inurement of title afterwards acquired by Mrs. Cargill, evidently apply to and limit the interest sought to be conveyed in all the tracts described in the deed, and cannot be restricted in their application to the first tract mentioned. The fourth of A, also B, also C, means the fourth of each A, B, and C.

Happgood v. Whitman, 13 Mass. 464; Wolfe v. Dyer, 95 Mo. 550; Burnett v. McCluey, 78 Mo. 676.

The description is "the one divided fourth part of," etc. The land had not then been divided, and could not have been divided under the fourth clause of the will of James Cargill until after the death of his widow. On the face of the deed it is impossible to tell which "divided fourth" is meant, and if plaintiff had been permitted to try, and had tried at the trial to locate it, he could not have done so. The ambiguity is a patent one, appearing on the face of the deed, and not susceptible of removal by parol testimony, and renders the deed absolutely void, for uncertainty of description.

Campbell v. Johnson, 44 Mo. 247; Goode v. Goode, 23 Mo. 522, 66 Am. Dec. 630; Bell v. Dawson, 82 Mo. 79; Holme v. Strautman, 85 Mo. 298; Hardy v. Matthews, 88 Mo. 121; *Jennings v. If there is no liability upon the covenants of the deed there is no foundation for the estoppel. Smiley v. Fries, 104 Ill. 416.

Thus a subsequently acquired title will not inure to the benefit of the grantee of a married woman though the deed contains covenants of warranty, where the statute provides that no covenant express or implied shall bind the wife or her heirs except so far as may be necessary to effectually pass from her and her heirs all her right, title, and interest expressed to be conveyed therein, but all the interest which she then has, passes. Brawford v. Wolfe, supra; Barker v. Circle, 60 Mo. 259.

As to effect of covenants of married women or estoppel by their deeds, see note to Watkins v. Watson (Tex.), 22 L. R. A. 779.

Covenants of seisin in fee and lawful right to convey in a deed where there is no warranty of title do not estop the grantor from setting up an after-acquired title against the grantee. Allen v. Sayward, supra.

At common law a subsequently acquired title will not pass when the conveyance was by bargain and sale, or by lease and release without covenants of warranty, but under the California statute the conveyance is of all the estate which the grantor then possesses or might thereafter possess and a subsequently acquired title inures to the benefit of the grantee as effectually as if it had originally belonged to him. Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 612, 76 Am. Dec. 449.

In Missouri covenants created by the words "grant, bargain, and sell," do not operate as a warranty to transmit a subsequently acquired title. Gibson v. Chouteau, 39 Mo. 536; Gatewood v. House, 65 Mo. 666.

But in Illinois the rule is that a deed given by one without title to the premises conveyed, containing the words "grant, bargain, and sell," will operate to transfer a subsequently acquired title to the grantee, such words of themselves importing a sufficient warranty to set the rule into operation. King v. Gibson, 32 Ill. 342, 88 Am. Dec. 369; DeWolf v. Haydn, 24 Ill. 585.

A deed of "all my right, title, and interest," is 23 L. R. A.

limited to the interest which the grantor then had, though it contains covenants of ownership and warranty, etc., and the grantor is not thereby estopped to claim a subsequently acquired interest as against the grantee. Butcher v. Rogers, 60 Mo. 138; Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. 47; Allen v. Holton, 20 Pick. 465; White v. Brocaw, 14 Ohio St. 339; Wight v. Shaw, 5 Cush. 56; Miller v. Ewing, 6 Cush. 34; Hanrick v. Patriok, 119 U. S. 156, 30 L. ed. 396.

Neither is an estoppel created where the grantor has an interest in the premises and the warranty is confined to the title granted or released. Comstock v. Smith, 13 Pick. 112, 23 Am. Dec. 670.

A deed, in order to pass a subsequently acquired title, must undertake to convey not merely the grantor's title but the land itself by an indefeasible title in such a manner that the grantee is not to be disturbed by any one. Gibson v. Chouteau, supra.

But whatever may be the form or nature of the conveyance used to pass real property if the grantor sets forth in the face of the instrument by way of recital or averment that he is seised or possessed of a particular estate in the premises, and which estate the deed purports to convey, or if the seisin or possession of a particular estate is affirmed in the deed either in express terms or by necessary implication, the grantor and all persons in privity with him are estopped from ever afterwards denying that he was so seised and possessed at the time he made the conveyance. Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 52 U. S. 11 How. 297, 13 L. ed. 708; Ryan v. United States, 136 U. S. 64, 34 L. ed. 447; Reynolds v. Cook, 88 Va. 817.

Estoppels bind privies in estate, in blood, and in law only. The doctrine is not applicable to persons claiming under a paramount, an adverse, or an independent title. Buckingham v. Hanna, 2 Ohio St. 551; San Francisco v. Lawton, 18 Cal. 465, 79 Am. Dec. 187; Russ v. Alpaugh, 118 Mass. 369, 19 Am. Rep. 464.

Where one person executes a mortgage on lands with covenants of warranty to another where he has no title and to which a third person has a paramount equitable title, and the mortgagor subsequently obtains the legal title, which is taken from him by decree in favor of the holder of the equitable title, it passes to such holder unincumbered by more distinct tracts, the deed is void for uncertainty, and cannot be helped out by parol testimony.

Campbell v. Johnson, Brandon v. Luddy, and Fuller v. Fellows, supra.

In a deed the description of the real estate, where it purports to be a segregated or "divided" portion of a larger tract, must be so definitely described as to enable a surveyor to go upon the ground and measure it off by courses and distances. If it be impossible to do this from the language of the deed, or such reference therein to physical facts as will enable such survey to be made, no legal title will be transferred.

Lamb v. Nelson, 84 Mo. 500.

The deed of Mrs. Cargill to her daughter Mrs. Ford reciting a consideration of one dollar and natural love and affection, could only operate as a deed of gift, and not as one of bargain and sale.

Peck v. Vandenberg, 80 Cal. 11; Salmon v. Wilson, 41 Cal. 595; Bradley v. Love, 60 Tex. 472; 1 Devlin, Deeds, § 11.

Hence only the intention of the grantor must be looked for, just the same as that of a testator in a will.

Long v. Timms, 107 Mo. 513.

Where no valuable consideration passes a grantor cannot be compelled to correct a mistake in a deed, or to carry out an imperfectly executed gift, or to specifically perform a promise, made orally or in writing, to make a gift.

Davis, 108 Ind. 281; Sherwood v. Sherwood, 45 Wis. 857, 30 Am. Rep. 757; Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 487, 36 Am. Rep. 684.

If, as between the parties thereto, the covenants in the deed, of Mrs. Cargill to Mrs. Ford, executed in 1863, would have transferred to Mrs. Ford the John Cargill fourth of the lands by inurement, so soon as it was transferred to Mrs. Cargill by the trustee's deed to her in 1865, yet it could not have such effect as against defendant and said grantors, because they were not bound to search for deeds from Mrs. Cargill, covering or endeavoring to convey the John Cargill fourth, prior to the time of her acquiring title thereto. That lay entirely outside of their chain of title, and the record thereof was no notice to them.

New Orleans & O. R. Co. v. Melien, 79 U. S. 12 Wall. 365, 20 L. ed. 485; Dodd v. Will-any estoppel in favor of the mortgagee. Buckingham v. Hanna, supra.

So where one conveys property in which he has no interest and afterwards inherits the same and it is sold under a judgment against him rendered previous to his unauthorized transfer, title vests in the purchaser under the judgment, the rule that a deed with warranty creates an estoppel and passes an after-acquired estate applying only to the grantee and those claiming under him but not to purchasers under a judgment rendered previous to the conveyance under which the estoppel is claimed. Jackson v. Bradford, 4 Wend. 619.

So also where a person without title conveys by deed of warranty and afterwards acquires title as trustee for the rightful owner for the purpose of transmitting it to a bona fide purchaser, the doctrine of estoppel will not apply to defeat the trust estate. Burchard v. Hubbard, 11 Ohio, 316.

In Jones v. King, 25 Ill. 883, it was held that a subsequently acquired title by a grantor inures to the benefit of grantee unless the new title is derived through a judicial sale as for taxes or otherwise.

The principle which forbids a party to deny the title under which he holds does not apply where the deed under which he holds does not refer to the common source and the record does not convey the information. In such case his title is adverse and he may controvert the title opposed to his. Blight v. Rochester, 20 U. S. 7 Wheat. 547, 5 L. ed. 512.

The doctrine of notice from registration.

The general doctrine of notice from registration applicable to this class of cases is that the registry of a conveyance is constructive notice of its existence and contents only to persons claiming what is thereby conveyed under the same grantor by subsequent purchase and not to strangers to that conveyance. Gillett v. Gaffney, 3 Colo. 351; Kerfoot v. Cronin, 105 Ill. 609; Tilton v. Hunter, 24 Me. 35; Roberts v. Richards, 84 Me. 1; Spofford v. Weston, 29 Me. 140; Corbin v. Sullivan, 47 Ind. 356; Roberts v. Bourne, 23 Me. 155, 39 Am. Dec. 615; Bates v. Norcross, 14 Pick. 224, 28 Am. Dec. 371; Losey v. Simpson, 11 N. J. Eq. 249.

And that a purchaser is chargeable with constructive notice of such instruments of record only as lie in the apparent chain of title or are made by one in some way connected with the property involved in question. Carbine v. Pringle, 90 Ill. 302; Manly v. Petree, 39 Ill. 123; Langworthy v. Golden, 23 Ill. App. 119; Woods v. Farmers, 7 Watts, 353, 33 Am. Dec. 773.

The case of Dexter v. Harris, 2 Mason, 631, which decided merely that notice of facts extrinsic and collateral to a deed was not given by a record of it, has been frequently cited to support the general doctrine as to the record of deeds outside the chain of title.

And that he need not search for incumbrances upon the premises purchased as against his grantor previous to the time such grantor obtained title thereto; and where he pays the purchase price and obtains title before he receives actual notice of such prior incumbrance his legal title will prevail over the incumbrance. *Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Malthy, 8 Paige, 361, 4 L. ed. 462; Way v. Arnold, 18 Ga. 181; Connecticut v. Bradish, 14 Mass. 296; Calder v. Chapman, 53 Pa. 359, 91 Am. Dec. 163; Dodd v. Williams, 3 Mo. App. 273; Corbin v. And if the record of an incumbrance is not within the line within which the subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer is bound to look, he need not notice it. Maul v. Rider, 59 Pa. 167; Harper v. Bibb, 34 Miss. 472, 39 Am. Dec. 397; McLaughan v. Reeside, 9 Watts, 510, 36 Am. Dec. 133.

Nor is the registry of a conveyance of lands executed by one not in possession and who does not appear from the records to have had any connection with the title constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser. *Fenno v. If it was the intention of Mrs. Cargill in her deed to Mrs. Ford, as seems clear in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, to convey only that fourth which Mrs. Ford was to receive under her father's will, title of his grantor. Connecticut v. Bradish, supra; Corbin v. Sullivan, 47 Ind. 356.

When he has traced the title down to one out of whom the record does not carry it, he is protected by the registry acts. Loosey v. Simpson, 11 N. J. Eq. 246.

And he is not obliged to search the records for mere equitable right which might be asserted against a good record title. Odle v. Odle, 73 Mo. 239.

Thus where one who has a mere equitable right to a conveyance of lands mortgages the same and the mortgage is recorded and he afterwards acquires title and conveys portions of the lands for value to innocent third persons, the first mortgagee can enforce his lien against such purchasers only to the extent of the unpaid purchase money which remained due when they received actual notice of such mortgage, the record thereof before the mortgagor obtained the legal title not being constructive notice to such purchasers. Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Maltby, 8 Paige, 361, 4 L. ed. 462.

So where a person enters into a contract to purchase lands whereby a deed is to be delivered after certain payments are made, and the purchaser mortgages the lands to a third person, which mortgage is first recorded, and afterwards he obtains his deed and gives back a purchase money mortgage, the purchase money mortgage is the prior lien, and the prior mortgage simply attaches to the interest which the mortgagor had at the time it was made, the deed and purchase money mortgage being construed together as one contract. Dusenbury v. Hulbert, 59 N. Y. 541.

And when a deed and mortgage for purchase money are executed and afterwards recorded; but in the mean time the grantee executes another mortgage which is recorded a few minutes earlier than the first mortgage and deed, the first mortgage is the prior lien; the vendee's deed not having been registered; the registration of the second mortgage is not notice to the first mortgagee. Boyd v. Mundorf, 30 N. J. Eq. 545.

The rule which protects a purchaser against the operation of a deed of his grantor's property made by a stranger without authority applies to a devise by a testator of property to which he had no title, and when a husband devises property to his wife including lands belonging to her, for life, remainder to his grandson in fee, and she elects to take under the will which is admitted to probate and recorded, but afterwards mortgages her lands thus included in the will, the record of the will is not constructive notice of the mortgage of the equitable interests of the grandson. Hibbs v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 40 Ohio St. 543.

The recording of a deed of trust which gives a lien on the equitable estate made when the grantor had title to only part of the lands conveyed does not impart notice to a subsequent purchaser of the legal title. Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh, 365, 23 Am. Dec. 280.

Nor is the record of a trust deed made by one who had the equitable title to lands conveyed, after which both the legal and equitable title is vested in another, constructive notice to one who takes a trust deed from such holder of the legal and equitable title, and in the absence of actual notice the latter trust deed will have priority. Sands v. Beardsley, 32 W. Va. 594.

Nor is one who purchases from a trustee charged with notice by the record of a deed between strangers to the record title rectifying the execution of the declaration of trust. Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 506, 1 L. ed. 247.

In Wing v. McDowell, Walk. Ch. 175, it was held that in a contest between the holder of a mortgage made by one who held a bond for a deed, and a holder of a subsequent mortgage made by one who owned the premises in fee, where the equities of the parties are equal and neither has the legal title, the prior equity will prevail, and subsequently obtaining the legal title in the right of another will not aid the holder of the postponed equity.

So a recital in a recorded deed of sale under a judgment against the original owner, there being no record of any conveyance from him to the grantor, is not notice to a mortgagee of the premises under a regular paper title duly recorded traceable to the original owner. "A mortgagee is not bound to search for conveyances from a person to whom there was no conveyance on record. Cook v. Travis, 23 Barb. 388, affirmed in 30 N. Y. 400.

And a purchaser of land is not presumed to know of the registry of a will containing a devise of lands which he claims by a paramount or an adverse title. Woods v. Farmers, 7 Watts, 322, 33 Am. Dec. 772.

And the record of a deed from executors of a person through whose heirs the chain of title is properly traced is not constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser under the record title of an equity shown by recitals in such deed. Blake v. Graham, 6 Ohio St. 580, 67 Am. Dec. 380.

The rule that a purchaser is not bound to search the records for incumbrances as against a title not appearing in the direct chain by the records is not applicable where the purchaser has actual notice of the existence of a mortgageable estate in the person against whom the search is made prior to the date of the conveyance by which he received the absolute title. Crane v. Turner, 7 Hun, 357, 67 N. Y. 437.

Several of the states, however, seem to have adopted the rule, laid down by the commission of appeals in New York in the case of Taft v. Munson, 37 N. Y. 97, that a conveyance and the record thereof is notice to subsequent purchasers in good faith though made before the grantor therein had obtained title. In this case a majority of the court held that a recorded mortgage by one who had no title except under a forged deed was valid after he obtained title as against his subsequent grantees since the latter were bound by his estoppel as privies.

Thus in Iowa, where a first mortgage is made and recorded while title remains in the United States, and the second is made after the mortgagor has acquired title, the second mortgagee will be deemed and in which the mother had a life estate, then the covenants in this deed were in no way broken.

If A executed a deed of general warranty to B containing the covenants involved in the words "grant, bargain, and sell," for a tract of land which B already owns, there is no breach of the covenants of A's deed. The covenants only extend to a title existing in a third person, which may defeat the estate granted by the covenantor.

Fries, 104 Ill. 416; Fitch v. Baldwin, 17 Johns. 161.

In such case, an interest afterwards acquired by the grantor will not inure or pass to the grantee.

Smiley v. Fries, supra.

The deed of Mrs. Cargill to Mrs. Ford was a deed of gift, and being such, no suit could be maintained on any of the covenants therein, even though the land "sought to be conveyed" had been sufficiently described.

Calcott v. Elkin, (Tenn.) Jan. 18, 1891.

a purchaser with notice of an outstanding mortgage of record. Warburton v. Mattox, Morris (Iowa) 387.

So in Michigan the record of a mortgage made by one in possession under a contract of purchase is constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer of the legal title, although the contract is not acknowledged or recorded. Balen v. Mercier, 75 Mich. 42.

But in this case the effect of possession as notice may be considered a material factor.

The same was decided in Edwards v. McKernan, 55 Mich. 520, overruling Wing v. McDowell, Walk. Ch. 175, in which it is said that conveyances which are entitled to be recorded are constructive notice to all persons of the interest conveyed by any person in the chain of title from the government to the last purchaser.

In this case the contest was between two mortgages of the equitable title under mortgages both of which appeared to have been made before the mortgagor obtained the legal title.

While the effect of possession of the premises as notice may be sufficient to render a recorded incumbrance made by the possessor constructive notice, an interesting question suggests itself as to the continuation of such record notice after the possession of the premises has terminated, but no decisions on this point have been found.

So in Digman v. McCollum, 47 Mo. 372, it was held that a purchaser must at his peril inquire into the state of his grantor's title even though he purchases nothing but an equitable title, as in case of one holding lands under contract of purchase giving a trust deed to secure the purchase money and afterwards selling and delivering the title to another. But in this case as the purchase was of an equitable title only and the vendor never had or assumed to convey the legal title, the question decided is merely that the purchaser of an equitable title must be charged with notice of prior instruments executed by his own vendor affecting that title. See Dodd v. Williams, infra.

Comparison and limitation of the opposing principles.

In the few cases in which the collision of the opposing doctrines is discussed a decided preference is given to the supremacy of the principle involved in the registry laws, and the same position is taken by nearly, if not all, the text-book writers.

Thus in Bingham v. Kirkland, 34 N. J. Eq. 232, the court holding that a subsequent purchaser is not chargeable under the registry acts with constructive notice of a mortgage made and recorded before the mortgagor had acquired title explained White v. Patten, cited supra, under heading "The doctrine of estoppel," saying that that case involved the doctrine of estoppel only, the effect of the registry laws not having been mentioned.

So in Calder v. Chapman, 58 Pa. 350, 21 Am. Dec. 163, holding that the record of an incumbrance placed upon property before the incumbrancer had 23 L. R. A.

acquired title thereto would not be notice to subsequent purchasers, it was said that the doctrine of estoppel will not be permitted to interfere with the operation of the recording acts.

And in Chew v. Barnett, 11 Serg. & B. 399, it was held that a conveyance which is duly recorded from C who had no title, to D with covenants of warranty, and a subsequent conveyance of the legal title by E to C, does not vest title in D clear of the incumbrance of a mortgage placed upon the property by C, partly to secure the purchase price of the land. But nothing is said in this case about the effect of the record as notice to such mortgagees while it is said that the grantee is chargeable with notice that he was purchasing an equitable title only.

So in Dodd v. Williams, 3 Mo. App. 273, the rule was laid down that the doctrine of inurement and estoppel that covenants of title and warranty operate to transfer an after-acquired estate by operation of law is not to be enforced to the extent of removing the protection designed to be given to purchasers by the registry laws.

And in Dowell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh, 365, 23 Am. Dec. 280, it was said that recording acts are expressly declared to have been made for the protection of subsequent purchasers and ought not to be turned to their injury unless it be in obedience to some express provision contained in them, and under them it was held that a deed, if recorded, passes to the bargainee the title which it purports to convey providing the bargainor had that title, but if he had not the deed cannot pass it.

In Georgia the doctrine that the principles of estoppel should be applied only in subordination to the requirements of the registry acts has been strongly asserted. Thus in Way v. Arnold, 18 Ga. 181, it was held that where lands are sold by any of the modern conveyances, in which the grantor had nothing at the period of executing the deed, the title he may subsequently acquire does not pass to the grantee by estoppel, and the warrantor or his heirs is not debarred from recovering under any right or title not vested in the grantor at the time of making the conveyance. The court was strongly of the opinion that the registry acts under the modern form of conveying is a virtual repeal of the doctrine of estoppel, but no question as to records is presented in the case.

But the doctrine of estoppel by conveyance made when the grantor did not have title is recognized in several later Georgia cases in which no question of registration was raised. See Hennerson v. Hackney, 23 Ga. 383, 68 Am. Dec. 529, and Thurby v. Myers, 57 Ga. 155, cited supra under heading "The doctrine of estoppel."

Where a mortgage is given before the mortgagor acquires title to the mortgaged premises but recorded afterwards it is constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser as he would have found the mortgage had he examined the title of the mortgagor back to the time he received his conveyance, that is to the date thereof. Semon v. Terhune, 40 N. J. Eq. 364.

F. H. B.

The donee must take the subject of the gift in the condition the donor gives it.

Eaton v. Eaton, 15 Wis. 260; Hanson v. Michelson, 19 Wis. 498; Calcote v. Elkin, supra; Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 487, 86 Am. Rep. 634.

In such a deed, the agreement implied in the covenants to transfer what may be acquired in the future by the grantor can be no stronger than an express agreement to transfer what he may so acquire, and such an agreement is not enforceable.

Kaufman v. Cook, 114 Ill. 11; Tunisia v. Bradford, 49 N. J. Eq. 210.

An agreement to give something not in existence, cannot certainly be more efficacious than one to give that which the promisor already has. And yet an agreement, whether verbal or written, to give in the future something already in being is not susceptible of enforcement, and is void for want of a valuable consideration to support it.

Brownlee v. Fenwick, 108 Mo. 420; Anderson v. Scott, 94 Mo. 687.

Hence, the doctrine of inurement of title cannot apply to covenants in deeds of gift.

Re Wilbur v. Warren, 104 N. Y. 196; Kaufman v. Cook, supra; Fink v. Fox, 18 Johns. 145, 9 Am. Dec. 191; 2 Kent, Com. *489; Johnson v. Otterbein University, 41 Ohio St. 527; 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 458.

Messrs. James A. Plotner, Hall & Pike, and Joseph Morton for respondent.

Grant, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's case may be stated in a few words: By the will of his grandfather, James Cargill, an estate for life, only, was given to his grandmother, Agnes G. Cargill, and a remainder of one fourth to each of his children at her death. That fourth was to be set off by commissioners to be appointed by his executor. After his grandfather's death, on September 5, 1868, his grandmother, who had a life estate in all the lands, made a deed with covenants of warranty to his mother, Mrs. Ford, "in consideration of natural love and affection and one dollar," which purports on its face to convey a fee simple absolute to the one divided fourth of the real estate devised by her husband, including the land in controversy. He concedes that at that time no division had been made of James Cargill's lands, and none could have been made under his will prior to the widow's death, and that, if the deed is to be construed as it is written, it is void for uncertainty; but he invokes the rule that where one part of a description is false and impossible, but, by rejecting that part, a perfect description remains, that part should be rejected, and the deed held good and effectual; and he therefore asks that the word "divided" be entirely rejected. That this court has often, in actions at law, rejected inconsistent and repugnant clauses in both deeds and wills, where their retention was evidently contrary to the intention of the parties, is abundantly attested by its decisions. West v. Brattle, 115 Mo. 653; Gibson v. Bogy, 28 Mo. 478; Rutherford v. Tracy, 48 Mo. 326, 8 Am. Rep. 108. In so doing, however, it was seeking to carry out the intention of the grantor or testator by a reasonable construction of the language used. But in Campbell v. Johnson, 44 Mo. 247, while this rule was recognized and approved, it was said: "But, if the land granted be so inaccurately described as to render its identity wholly uncertain, then it is admitted the grant is void. Boardman v. Reed, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 328, 8 L. ed. 415. . . . The ambiguity must be patent." Accordingly, in that case, where the description in the deed was "the southwest quarter of section 11, containing forty acres," the court was asked to reject the words "forty acres." Judge Wagner said: "This description, by rejecting the quantity of acres, would pass the title to the whole quarter section. That such was not the intent of the maker of the deed is demonstrable from the fact that one of the other tracts conveyed is the southwest fourth of the same quarter section. . . . To give effect to the deed according to its literal import, the plaintiff would have eighty acres more than she contracted for. . . . It is not insisted that the plaintiff bought more than the forty-acre tract sued for in this action. . . . The ambiguity is patent, and cannot be removed by the application of extrinsic evidence." Now, if the court had been merely governed by a desire to get a legal description, irrespective of the intention of the grantor or the right of the case, nothing would have been simpler than to have rejected the number of acres, and it could have called to its aid the familiar canon that "a call for quantity must give way to metes and bounds;" but, when it was considered that by rejecting those words the grantor was made to convey four 40 acre tracts instead of one, and his covenants made to convey 80 acres more than he had sold, the court wisely left the parties where it found them, and indicated that the place to reform the deed was in equity, where the rights of both could be preserved. See also Jennings v. Brinsadine, 44 Mo. 382; King v. Fink, 51 Mo. 209.

Now, in this case, what will be the effect of rejecting the word "divided?" If the deed thereby only conveyed what her mother then owned, or only secured to Mrs. Ford, the daughter, the life estate in the one fourth on which she owned the remainder, and thereby enabled her to anticipate her father's will, and realize on her share in remainder, it would be at once conceded that it ought to be done; but when it appears that this is not the purpose, but that plaintiff proposes, if this patent ambiguity is removed, to claim that it conveyed to Mrs. Ford, not her one fourth, free of her mother's life estate, but the fourth in fee simple remainder devised to John Cargill, and subsequently bought in by Mrs. Agnes Cargill under foreclosure sale of John's fourth, it is perfectly evident that a result that never was contemplated by Mrs. Cargill, or Mrs. Ford either, will be attained. That Mrs. Cargill never for a moment considered she had accomplished such a result is fully evidenced by her own warranty deed to Mrs. John Cargill, her son's wife, made after she had purchased his remainder in fee. Putting ourselves in the place of Mrs.

Cargill, and understanding that she only had a life estate in this land, and her daughter Mrs. Ford a remainder in a fourth of it, and that Mrs. Cargill had three other children having the same interest, and that Mrs. Cargill did not acquire the title to John Cargill's fourth interest in remainder for more than two years after the execution of the deed to Mrs. Ford, is it not clear that she had no intention of giving to Mrs. Ford John's share when she should buy it? To reject any part of her deed to reach such a result would be to ignore her intention. If Mrs. Ford was not satisfied with this description, she should have applied to her mother, in her lifetime, to correct it, for it is very clear that, this deed being a simple gratuity, a court of equity would not have enforced it. Mulock v. Mulock, 81 N. J. Eq. 602; Fry, Spec. Perf. p. 71; Brownlee v. Fenwick, 108 Mo. 420; Anderson v. Scott, 94 Mo. 637.

But, granting that the word "divided" should be rejected from the description, and that the deed is construed to convey one "undivided" fourth,—the very opposite of what the grantor declared she was conveying,—can the claim of plaintiff be sustained that the subsequently acquired title of Mrs. Agnes Cargill to the fourth devised to her son John passed to Mrs. Ford by that deed? This claim is based upon the statute as it stood in 1855. "If any person shall convey any real estate by conveyance, purporting to convey the same in fee simple absolute, and shall not at the time of such conveyance, have the legal estate in such real estate, but shall afterward acquire the same, the legal estate subsequently acquired shall immediately pass to the grantee, and such conveyance shall be valid, as if such legal estate had been in the grantor at the time of the conveyance." 1 Rev. Stat. 1855, p. 355, § 3. This section came under review in Bogy v. Shoab, 13 Mo. 365. Judge Napton said in that case, in regard to the words "fee simple absolute:" "It then depends upon the character of the deed whether it is to be affected by our statute. It must be a conveyance purporting to pass the fee simple absolute. . . . The term 'fee simple' is known at the common law as one which defines the quantity of estate. It is used in contradistinction from a fee tail, a life estate, or a term of years. It is evidently not employed in this sense in this provision of the act. It was surely not intended that a quitclaim deed, although the deed uses language to pass the fee, and not any smaller estate, would therefore pass a new title not belonging to the grantor when he makes the deed. It was hardly intended to apply to a deed conveying all the right, title, and interest of the grantor. Such a deed will undoubtedly pass the land itself if the grantor has an estate therein at the time of the conveyance, but it passes no estate which was not then possessed." Brown v. Jackson, 16 U. S. 8 Wheat. 452, 4 L. ed. 432. . . . So, where a party had a vested interest, and also a contingent remainder in lands, and conveyed 'all his right, title, and interest,' the deed was held only to convey his vested interest, although it contained a general warranty." Pelletreau v. Jackson, 11 Wend. 111; Vails v. Clemens, 23 L. R. A.

18 Mo. 486. In Brauford v. Wolfe, 108 Mo. 891, it was held that the doctrine of inurement, whether under the statute or common law, is raised upon the covenants of title contained in the deed under which it operates, and consequently the deed of a married woman only operated to pass all her existing right, title, and interest, citing Barker v. Circle, 60 Mo. 259; Reese v. Smith, 12 Mo. 848; State Nat. Bank of St. Joseph v. Robidoux, 57 Mo. 446. The common-law reason for asserting that the title passed by way of estoppel was that it prevented circuity of action, and hence, where no right of action ever existed on the covenants, and they had been released, extinguished, or otherwise classed, some courts held there was no estoppel, and the after-acquired estate would not pass. To this rule that, where no action existed, no estoppel was created, there are, however, a number of well-defined exceptions. Among these, Mr. Bigelow, in his work on Estoppel (5th ed. 445), mentions as a sixth exception to the rule,—that "wherein the consideration of the grant with warranty was love and affection only." In Robinson v. Douthitt, 64 Tex. 101, the father conveyed to his son for love and affection only. The father had previously mortgaged the land. Under the mortgage it was sold and purchased by a stranger, from whom the father subsequently bought again. The father again sold it to a third person. In a contest between the son and the last purchaser from the father it was held that the father's purchase from the purchaser under his mortgage inured to the son, Stayton, J., saying: "We are of the opinion that the estoppel exists in all cases against a grantor and subsequent purchasers from him with notice of the prior conveyance, when a valid conveyance, having such covenants as are found in the deed before us, is executed." Rawle, Cov. 5th ed. § 257; 8 Washb. Real Prop. 899-407, and cases cited. We think the deed in this case must be considered as founded on a consideration of love and affection alone, and that the mere nominal sum of one dollar does not change it into one for bargain and sale. Hatch v. Straight, 3 Conn. 84, 8 Am. Dec. 152; Peck v. Vandenburg, 80 Cal. 11; Salmon v. Wilson, 41 Cal. 595; Bradley v. Love, 60 Tex. 472; Devlin, Deeds, § 11.

But, notwithstanding it was a pure donation, if otherwise valid, a subsequently acquired title obtained by Mrs. Cargill would inure, by virtue of its covenants, to Mrs. Ford and her grantees, as against subsequent purchasers of Mrs. Cargill with notice of said deed. Conceding, then, that it would carry an after-acquired title as against one having notice, the only notice with which Saxton and his grantees are charged is such as is imparted by our recording acts. When Mrs. Cargill made the deed,—September 5, 1863,—she had no title to the remainder in the fourth of said lands devised to John Cargill, her son; and, construing her deed as not void for uncertainty, it purported to convey a fee simple; it did not and could not pass John Cargill's fourth until she acquired it in 1865 by the trustee's deed recorded December 4, 1865. On March 4, 1871, by a warranty deed, she conveyed this share of John Cargill so purchased by her to Sarah L. Cargill, his wife, which deed was duly recorded. By mesne conveyance, for value, Saxton became the purchaser of this John Cargill's fourth. Mrs. Nancy Cargill died in 1877. Saxton and all the purchasers subsequent to him bought after Mrs. Cargill's death. The question now is: When they came to search the record of conveyances, were they bound to look for deeds by her to this fourth, antedating her purchase of this land at the trustee's sale in December, 1865? Perhaps no more important question affecting the title of real estate could be raised than the effect of this doctrine of inurement of after-acquired title by estoppel, considered with reference to our recording acts, when rights of innocent purchasers for value are involved. Some courts hold that "the obligation created by estoppel not only binds the party making it, but all persons privy to him; the legal representatives of the party, those who stand in his situation by act of law, and all who take his estate by contract stand in his stead, and are subjected to all the consequences which accrue to him. It adheres in the land, and is transmitted with the estate; it becomes a muniment of title, and all who afterward acquire the title take it subject to the burden which the existence of the fact imposes on it. These principles had their origin at a very early period in the common law." Douglass v. Scott, 5 Ohio, 198; Knight v. Thayer, 125 Mass. 25. Now, this language is broad enough, if logically followed, to lead to the result that the after-acquired title vested in the grantee, not only as against the grantor and his heirs, but as against a subsequent purchaser from the latter of the after-acquired title. Mr. Rawle, who has given the subject a most thorough and rigid analysis, says: "This rule, when applied to the case of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, cannot harmonize with the spirit of our registry laws in force in this country, and leads to the position which certainly cannot be considered as tenable,—that a purchaser must search the registry of deeds, not only from the time when his grantor acquired the title, but also for a series of years before that time, in order to discover whether he had previously made any conveyance (though without title) to any other person; for, if he had, that person, according to this doctrine, holds the estate as against this person, and, if the property has passed through several hands, a similar search must be made as to each." He says nothing is more simple than what is termed "the line of title." It is that the first purchaser should search the title for the deed to his vendor, and trace the title thence back to its source. If he finds no title in him, as would have been the case here, then it is his fault if he takes the deed.

Now, as to the second purchaser,—one who buys after the vendor acquires a title. He searches till he finds the deed to his vendor, and traces the title back to its source. He finds it regular, and that since his vendor acquired the title he has not conveyed to any one else. He is not expected to look for conveyances from his vendor prior to the time the vendor acquired the title. "Yet," as Mr. Rawle says, "according to the practical effect of the doctrine now being considered, and apart for counter equities, the purchaser who has brought himself within all the provisions of the registry laws is not protected at all if his vendor had, before he had acquired title, conveyed to another, with covenants, a title which was without existence or value." Judge Hare concurs in Mr. Rawle's views, and says, in a note to Duchess of Kingston's Case, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. 734: "It necessarily tends to give a vendee, who has been careless enough to buy what the vendor has not to sell, a preference over subsequent purchasers who have expended their money in good faith, and without being guilty of negligence." In Crockett v. Maguire, 10 Mo. 84, Judge Scott said: "The registry of a deed is only evidence of notice to after-purchasers under the same grantor." In Dodd v. Williams, 8 Mo. App. 278, the St. Louis court of appeals held that an examiner of titles was not bound to examine for deeds of any person in the chain of title before the date of his record title. In Calder v. Chapman, 52 Pa. 359, 91 Am. Dec. 163, Judge Read said: "It is said 'that if a man sells and conveys land to which he has no right or title, and afterwards buys or acquires the title to the same land, he cannot claim it as against his grantee,' and, whether this rule is based on estoppel or rebutter, or upon the equity as practiced in Pennsylvania, by which that which ought to be done is considered as done, is perhaps immaterial, as the effects of our recording acts must be the same in either case. . . . 'It is a doctrine, . . . when properly understood and applied, that concludes the truth in order to prevent fraud and falsehood, and imposes silence on a party only where, in conscience and honesty, he should not be allowed to speak.' Now, in the present case, in searching for incumbrances or conveyances, the search against Calder would begin with his title from Chapman, and the search beyond would be against Chapman and those through whom he claimed; and a search against Calder during the same period would be considered an utter absurdity." In Ely v. Wilcox, 20 Wis. 523, 91 Am. Dec. 436, it is said: "In Massachusetts it is held that in searching the title it is not necessary to search the record, as against an antecedent grantor of land, further than the registry of a deed duly executed by him, and that, when such a deed has been registered, a purchaser under the grantee will not be affected with notice of his prior deed, recorded subsequently, but before the period of his purchase" (Connecticut v. Bradish, 14 Mass. 296; Trull v. Bigelow, 16 Mass. 418, 8 Am. Dec. 144; Some v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 184, 18 Am. Dec. 406); and the Massachusetts rule is approved by the Wisconsin court. Carbine v. Pringle, 90 Ill. 303; Odle v. Odle, 73 Mo. 289; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 658.

Our conclusion is that a recorded deed by one who has no title, but who afterwards acquires the title by recorded deed, is not constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser in good faith from the common grantor. We think, when he searches till he finds the deed by which his grantor acquires the title, he is not bound to look for deeds made prior to that time. Such prior deeds are not "in the line of title," as that term is used by conveyances and searches. When Saxton and those who claimed under him bought, Mrs. Agnes Cargill was dead. The fourth they bought, on the face of the deed, purported to be John Cargill's fourth. That fourth was conveyed to Sarah Cargill by Mrs. Agnes Cargill. Looking back, then, they would discover that John Cargill's fourth was sold to his mother in December, 1865. The mother was dead. Were they required to look back of the time she acquired John's fourth to see whether she had deeded it to Mrs. Ford in 1863. We think not. But plaintiff claims that, admitting the rule to be as we think it most clearly should be, still Mrs. Sarah Cargill was bound to look back, and see whether Mrs. Agnes Cargill had not conveyed her life estate in John's share which she was conveying to her. For several reasons we think this will not avail plaintiff. First, there are no words in the deed of 1863 to Mrs. Ford that in any manner indicate that Mrs. Agnes Cargill had the slightest intention of conveying the John Cargill share at that time, and, as she was conveying only one fourth out of four, and as she had no title to John's share, there was nothing in that deed which would carry notice as to her life estate in John's share. Gatewood v. House, 65 Mo. 663. But, more than that, John Cargill, by his father's will, only took a fourth in remainder. He only mortgaged a fourth in remainder. His mother only bought what he mortgaged, and by her deed she only conveyed what she purchased at that sale, so that her life estate was not involved in the examination; and we must hold that the subsequent purchasers were unaffected by Mrs. Ford's deed, even if it were not void for uncertainty. The plaintiff and his mother have paid no taxes on this land since obtaining the deed in 1863, have asserted no title, and his claim is wholly without merit.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed. All concur.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

Adaline CARPENTER, Appt.,
v.
UNITED STATES LIFE INSURANCE
CO.

(161 Pa. 3.)

The assumption of parental relations, although without any legal obligation, by a man who sends a girl to school and pays her expenses, is sufficient to give her an insurable interest in his life so as to sustain a policy which he procures and assigns to her.

(April 2, 1894.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Lycoming County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a life insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Watson & McLean, for appellant:

The only question to be determined in this case is whether, as between the parties to this policy and assignment it (viz. the assignment), is void as a gambling contract.

The offers of evidence plainly show that Alanson B. Tyrell intended, in case of his death, that Adaline Carpenter should receive the amount of the policy, viz., $2,000, and here the case of Overbeck v. Overbeck, 155 Pa. 5, is directly applicable.

The supreme court says: "It is certain that Overbeck did not intend the proceeds to go to the appellant in case of his death, although she was his lawful wife. On the contrary, he designated the appellee, Mary Overbeck, as the beneficiary, and as she is living and the first named, she cannot be passed by for 'the heirs at law.'"

It was held in Scott v. Dickson, 108 Pa. 6, 56 Am. Rep. 192, that a man may insure his own life, paying the premiums himself, for the benefit of another who has no insurable interest, and that such a transaction is not a wagering policy.

See also Cunningham v. Smith, 70 Pa. 450; Elliott's App. 50 Pa. 75, 88 Am. Dec. 525; Bliss, Life Ins. p. 85, § 28; 2 May. Ins. chap. 19, § 398A; 1 May. Ins. § 112, 1 Biddle, Ins. chap. 4, § 194; 1 Phillips, Ins. p. 56; 2 Parsons, Cont. p. 479.

An insured has a right to dispose of his policy in any way or to any person he pleases. The fact that his assignees have no interest in his life is no defense to an action.

If a policy of insurance on the life of another is issued to a person having an insurable interest in such life, an assignment of such policy to a person having no such interest does not render the assignment void.

Dean, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Alanson B. Tyrell, a man about sixty years of age, living with his family near Wilkes Barre, had in his house, as a domestic, a poor girl, named Adaline Carpenter. So far as appears from the evidence, prompted solely by a benevolent and kindly disposition, this old man befriended this girl, sent her to school, and paid her expenses. In return, she, at times, for small wages, performed some services for him, such as keeping his books and copying his letters. He was a designer and builder of coal breakers, and seems to have had considerable business. On the 10th of December, 1892, he took out a policy of insurance on his life, in the sum of $2,000, payable to himself, in the defendant company. He paid the first annual premium, $104.84. Thirteen days thereafter, on the 23d of the same month, he assigned the policy, in writing, to Adaline Carpenter, sealed it in a package, and delivered it to her, with the injunction not to open it until after his death. Notice of the assignment, as provided by the policy, was duly given the company; and, without objection, acknowledgment of the notice was made by indorsement on a duplicate. On April 1, 1893, Tyrell died. Adaline Carpenter inspected the package delivered to her, found in it the policy regularly assigned to her, and made proper proof of the death of the insured, and demand for payment. The company, on the ground that the policy was a wagering contract, refused payment. Thereupon, this suit was brought, and the learned judge of the court below, holding that, so far as concerned this plaintiff, the contract was a wagering contract, and therefore void, non-suited her; and from that judgment we have this appeal.

The judgment of the court below is based on Gilbert v. Moose, 104 Pa. 74, 49 Am. Rep. 570; Meily v. Hershberger, 16 W. N. C. 186; Downey v. Hoffer, 110 Pa. 109,—and that line of cases which holds that the absolute assignment of a policy to one having no interest in the life of the insured, the assignor parting with all control over the policy, renders it a wagering contract as to such assignee, and he cannot recover thereon. It seems to us the learned judge's conclusion is not drawn from all the material facts, but only from a part of them. At the trial, counsel on both sides admitted the following facts, which were put upon the record: "Alanson B. Tyrell, after he had made the assignment of the policy in question to the plaintiff, placed the policy and the assignment and the receipt in an envelope, and sealed it, and inclosed it in a package, and delivered it to the plaintiff, and it has remained in her possession ever since; and further, that, at the time the papers in question were delivered to the plaintiff, she was not a creditor of the insured, nor a relative, nor connected by ties of blood or marriage, but only a friend of the insured." The facts, as contained in this admission, were assumed to be all of the material facts bearing on the issue. From them it was inferred the plaintiff had no insurable interest in the life of Tyrell; and as he had, by the assignment and delivery of the policy, relinquished control over it, it was, under the authority of the line of cases already noticed, held to be a wagering contract. But do all the facts of which there was evidence, when taken together, warrant the conclusion that this plaintiff had no insurable interest in the life of Tyrell? If Tyrell, when she was young, had taken this girl into his family, treated her as a member of it, reared and educated her; when she was of age, had assisted her in getting remunerative employment, had watched over her, and interested himself in her welfare,—it could have been truthfully said he stood in the place of a parent to her, not by virtue of the legal relation of a child born to him in wedlock, or by adoption under our statute, but by his voluntary assumption of the paternal relation towards her, with her consent. Without any legal obligation other than friend, he chose to assume all the burdens incident to this domestic relation of parent and child. His conduct and promises for years warranted her in believing the relation would continue while his life lasted. Having thus raised her from the humble station in which he found her, he was continuing his kindness at the date the policy was assigned; for this offer, although rejected by the court as immaterial, must be taken as the facts: Plaintiff, among other facts, offers to prove: "That, during the first two years of her acquaintance with the insured, she was a servant girl in his house, he being a married man with a family, and about sixty years of age; that, about the time she quit his service, he told her that she ought to educate herself, so that she might be fit to earn a living by keeping books and type writing; that he then told her, if she would go to a business college at Wilkes Barre, he would pay her tuition; that she went to a business college, and was there for several months, and studied bookkeeping; that the insured paid her tuition there; that when she left the business college that insured purchased for her a desk and chair, and secured her desk room in the office of Mr. Gunster, of Wilkes Barre; that, when in Mr. Gunster's office, she kept the insured's time book (the insured being a builder of coal breakers, and employing a large number of men); that for keeping said books the insured paid her at the rate of $20 per month; that she left the office of Mr. Gunster in February, 1893, and came to Williamsport, for the purpose of entering Pott's Commercial College, to learn shorthand writing and type writing; that the insured told her before she left Wilkes Barre that he would pay her tuition at said college; that she entered said college, and studied shorthand writing and type writing, and the insured paid her tuition; that after she came to Williamsport she received several letters from S. W. Tyrell, the son of the insured, informing her of his father's sickness, and that she also received two letters in the mean time from the insured, stating the fact of his sickness, and inquiring how she was getting along; that, in response to said letters, she went to the home of her father and mother, in the borough of Edwardsville, near the home of the insured, and while there the insured died."

As this case stood upon the record, the plaintiff, as the assignee of the deceased, stood in his place,—was his representative. So far as appears, she was making no claim adverse to the right of deceased, or any representative of his right. The antagonist was the obligor in the policy. Therefore, she was not incompetent, under clause 4, § 5, Act 1887. Her competency as a witness against some other representative of the deceased assignor could not be properly raised in this issue between these parties. Therefore, the offer was material, the witness was competent, and the facts offered to be proven must be taken as proven. The court below, in the opinion refusing to take off the nonsuit, treats these facts as proven, but considers them wholly immaterial. We think, having in view these facts, as well as those admitted of record, the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the life of the deceased. It does not matter that this interest was one without legal obligation on part of the insured. It was a relation in every other respect parental. Peculiarly and otherwise he assumed a parent's part towards her, and she was justified in expecting the continuance of it. The question in Gilbert v. Moore, supra, was as stated by this court in these words: "Can one having no interest in the life of the insured, and for the purpose of speculation only, acquire, by assignment or otherwise, such title to the policy as the law will enforce?" In Downey v. Hofer, supra, this court assumes, with the court below, that the purchase by Downey was purely for a speculative purpose, and says: "The mischief resulting from a sale of the policy for purposes of speculating on human life is so contrary to the policy of the law, and so in conflict with the just principles of life insurance that it is unsafe to relax the rule that the holder of the policy must have some pecuniary interest in the life of the insured." And so with all the other cases cited by appellee where no recovery by the assignee of a policy was permitted. In each, the holder of the policy was interested in the death, rather than in the life, of the insured, and the policy was speculative. In the case before us the plaintiff's interest was wholly in the life of the insured. From the facts, the benefit to her from his fatherly care and pecuniary aid would, in a very few years, have far more than equalled the $2,000 policy assigned to her. From the severance of this relation by death, she perhaps sustains a greater pecuniary loss than any of his children. There may be an insurable interest not accompanied by kinship. Such interest implies a pecuniary interest, present or prospective. Cooke, Life Ins. § 59. A moral obligation is sufficient to support it. Ferguson v. Massachusetts Mut. L. Ins. Co., 32 Hun, 806. A creditor has an insurable interest in the life of his debtor, who has been discharged in bankruptcy. Says May on Insurance (sec. 107): "The relationship seems to be of but little importance, except as tending to give rise to the circumstances which justify the expectation. Indeed, the doctrine of the latest of the Massachusetts cases before cited is broad enough to cover a case where there is no relationship at all, save one, perhaps, of mere friendship, if the circumstances are such as to show that the loss of the insured life will probably result in pecuniary disadvantage to the person procuring the insurance." Here the plaintiff had nothing whatever to do with the procurement of the policy, or its assignment; paid no part of the premium, and, so far as appears, never expected to pay any, for she was ignorant of its existence during the lifetime of the insured. She had substantial grounds for expecting decided pecuniary advantage from his life. Why, then, should the contract be termed speculative? Her expectancy, except in the one feature,—the absence of legal obligation to enforce it,—was as well founded as that of a wife or creditor. If a voluntary copartnership gives to each partner an insurable interest in the lives of the others; if the relation of superintendent or manager of a business concern gives to his employers an insurable interest in the life of the superintendent or manager, as is well settled,—then the voluntary relation here gave to this plaintiff an insurable interest in the life of one who, in all pecuniary respects, occupied towards her the place of a parent, and the court below ought not to have held otherwise.

The judgment is reversed, and a procedendo is awarded.

v.

John B. SCHLOSSER et al., Appts.

(159 Pa. 480.)

1. An innkeeper is liable for the death of a person who while sick is driven out into the storm without adequate covering and left for about half an hour in a stream of melting ice and snow where he falls from inability to stand on his feet if it was reasonable to suppose that death might follow such sudden exposure in his condition.
2. Evidence of the age, health, and habits of a person is not sufficient to sustain a verdict based on his probable earnings without anything to show his earning power or his business habits or past earnings.

(January 22, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 8, for Allegheny County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, which was alleged to have been caused by the wrongful acts of defendants. Reversed.

NOTE.—An unusual and interesting case reported above adds, we believe, a new point to the law of innkeepers. However clear the liability of an innkeeper might have seemed for any wanton ex-

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Willis F. McCook for appellants. Mr. John Marron for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants are hotel keepers in the city of Pittsburgh. McHugh was their guest, and died in an alley appurtenant to the hotel on the 2d day of February, 1891. Mary McHugh, the plaintiff, is his widow, and she seeks to recover damages for the loss of her husband, alleging that it was caused by the improper conduct of the defendants and their employés. An examination of the testimony shows that McHugh came to the Hotel Schlosser late on Friday night, January 30, registered, was assigned to, and paid for, a room for the night, and retired. On Saturday and Sunday he complained of being ill, and remained most of both days in bed. A physician was sent for at his request, who prescribed for him. He also asked for and obtained several drinks during the same time, and an empty bottle or bottles remained in his room after he left it. During the forenoon of Monday he seemed bewildered, and wandered about the hall on the floor on which his room was. About the middle of the day the housekeeper reported to Schlosser that he was out of his room, and sitting half dressed on the side of the bed in another room. Schlosser and his porter both started in search of McHugh, and Schlosser seems to have exhibited some excitement or anger. He was found, and the porter led him to his room. While this was being done Schlosser said to him, "You can't stay here any longer;" to which McHugh replied, "I'll git." The porter, on reaching his room, put his coat, hat, and shoes on him, and at once led him to the freight elevator, put him on it, and had him let down to the ground floor. He then took him through a door, used for freight, out into an alley some four or five feet wide, that led to Penn avenue. Rain was falling, and the day was cold. A stream of rain water and dissolving snow was running down the alley. McHugh was without overshoes, overcoat, or wraps of any description. When the porter had gotten him part way down the alley he fell to the pavement. While he was lying in the water, and the porter standing near him, a lady passed along the sidewalk on Penn avenue and saw him. She walked a square, found Officer White, and reported to him what she had seen. He went to the alley to investigate, and when he arrived McHugh had been gotten to his feet, but was leaning heavily against the wall of the hotel, apparently unable to step. The porter was behind him, with his hands upon him, apparently urging him forward. What followed will be best told in the officer's own words. He says: "I asked, 'What's the matter with this man, Mr. Powers?' He says, 'He's sick.' I says, 'He ought to have something done for him,' and at that time he fell right in the alley on his back. He had his coat open, no vest, and his shoes were untied. He had strings in his shoes, but not tied." The officer was asked if the man spoke after he reached the place where he was, and he replied thus: "He spoke to me. Somebody said he was drunk. He rolled his eyes up, and he says: 'Officer, I am not drunk. I am sick. I wish you would get an ambulance and have me taken to the hospital.' Then I ran to the patrol box." It required about twenty minutes to get an ambulance on the ground. During all this time the man continued to lie on the pavement in the alley. At length, after an exposure of about half an hour in the storm, and on the pavement, the ambulance came. He was placed on a stretcher, lifted into the ambulance, and taken to police headquarters, and thence to the hospital; but all signs of life had disappeared when he was laid on the hospital floor. The post mortem examination disclosed the fact that the immediate cause of death was valvular disease of the heart. The theory of the plaintiff was that the shock from exposure to wet and cold in the alley had, in his feeble and unprotected condition, brought on the heart failure from which he died; and, as the exposure resulted from the conduct or directions of the defendants, they were responsible for his death. Three principal questions were thus raised: First. What duty does an innkeeper owe to his guest? Second. What connection was there between the defendants' disregard of their duty, if they did disregard it in any particular, and the death of Mr. McHugh? Third. If the plaintiff be entitled to recover, what is the measure of her damages?

The attention of the court was drawn to the first of these questions by the defendants' third point, in which the learned judge was asked to instruct the jury, in substance, that if the deceased was troublesome to the defendants, and annoying to their guests, they might rightfully put him out of their house, if they used no unnecessary force or violence. This point was refused as framed, but the learned judge proceeded to state the rule thus: "If the annoying acts were willful, the defendants could remove decedent in the manner stated in point. If, however, they were the result of sickness, although they might, under certain circumstances, remove him, such removal must be in a manner suited to his condition." This was saying that if McHugh was intoxicated, and the disturbances made by him were due to his intoxication, he might be treated as a drunken man; but if he was sick, and the disturbances caused by him were due to his sickness, he must be treated with the consideration due to a sick man. This is a correct statement of the rule. In the delirium of a fever a sick man may become very troublesome to a hotel keeper, and his groans and cries may be annoying to the occupants of rooms near him; but this would not justify turning him forcibly from his bed into the street during a winter storm. What the condition of the decedent really was went properly to the jury for determination. If they found the fact to be that he was suffering from sickness, then the learned judge properly said that, if his removal was to be undertaken, it should be conducted in a manner suited to one in his condition. The second question was raised by the defendants' fourth point, which was as follows: "If McHugh died of heart disease, and defendants had no reason to believe that he was so sick that his removal from the house would cause his death, they cannot be held responsible in this action, even though the mere incident of his removal from the house may have in some degree contributed to bring it on at that time." This was refused. It could not have been affirmed without qualification; but its refusal, without more, left the jury without any rule whatever upon the subject. The question which the defendants were bound to consider before putting the decedent out in the storm was not whether such exposure "would" surely cause death, but what was it reasonable to suppose might follow such a sudden exposure of the decedent in the condition in which he then was. What were the probable consequences of pushing a sick man, in the condition the decedent was in, out into the storm, without adequate covering, and, when he fell, from inability to stand on his feet, leaving him to lie in the stream of melting ice and snow that ran over the pavement of the alley, for about a half hour in all, in the condition in which Officer White found him? The third question was raised by the defendants' first point. No evidence was given tending to show the earning powers or the habits of industry and thrift of the deceased. For this reason the court was asked to instruct the jury that "nothing more than nominal damages can be recovered in this action." This was refused, and the jury was told in the general charge that, as the evidence fixed his age, and gave information about his health and habits, they might from this data estimate his earning capacity, and the pecuniary loss of the plaintiff. Now, it is true, as said in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Keller, 67 Pa. 300, that since the Acts of 1851 and 1855 life has a value which the law will recognize, and which the survivors who are entitled to sue may recover at law. It is true that this value is to be fixed by the jury in view of all the circumstances, and it is not necessarily limited to what is known as "nominal damages." But it is also true that when the probable earnings of the deceased are to be taken into account in fixing the damages it is the duty of the plaintiff to show the earning power of the deceased, or give such evidence in regard to his business, business habits, and past earnings, as may afford some basis from which earning capacity may be fairly estimated. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Zebe, 83 Pa. 318; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Vandever, 86 Pa. 298. The true measure of damages is the pecuniary loss suffered, without any solatium for mental suffering or grief; and the pecuniary loss is what the deceased would probably have earned by his labor, physical or intellectual, in his business or profession, if the injury that caused death had not befallen him, and which would have gone to the support of his family. In fixing this amount consideration should be given to the age of the deceased, his health, his ability and disposition to labor, his habits of living, and his expenditures. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Butler, 57 Pa. 385; Lehigh Iron Co. v. Rupp, 100 Pa. 95; Manassfield Coal & Coke Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 185, 86 Am. Rep. 662.

It is very clear that the refusal of the first and fourth points without explanation left the jury without any adequate instruction on the important questions to which these points related. The consequence was a verdict based on the earning power of the deceased, which the learned judge felt constrained to reduce, and which was unsupported by the evidence. It will not do to permit such a verdict without some evidence from which the calculation of the pecuniary loss of the plaintiff may be made.

The judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT

MINNEAPOLIS THRESHING MACHINE CO., Resp't.,

FIREMEN'S INSURANCE COMPANY OF CHICAGO, Appt.

(.....Minn.....)

The defendant insured against loss by fire a threshing machine engine and separator "while not in use." The property, which had not been used for threshing for some two weeks, was hauled out into the country, and left standing near a farm house, preparatory to its intended use a few days later, and, while standing there, the separator was destroyed by fire. The fire was not caused by any hazard incident to the actual use or operation of either the engine or separator. Held, that the property was not "in use" within the meaning of the policy.

(April 14, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County overruling a motion for new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a policy insuring a separator. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. C. M. Hertig and R. A. Daly, for appellant:

An insurer is not liable except upon proof that the loss has occurred within the terms of the policy, and when making the policy he is at liberty to select the character of the risk he will assume. If the terms of this risk are distinct, and without ambiguity, the assured cannot complain if the risk assumed does not cover the loss.

Mawhinney v. Southern Ins. Co. of New Orleans, 20 L. R. A. 87, 98 Cal. 184.

In DeGraff v. Queen Ins. Co., 38 Minn. 503, the court said: "First: The language of a condition in a policy, being that of the insurer, selected by him, and intended for his benefit, must be clear and unambiguous, and any reasonable doubt as to its meaning must be resolved in favor of the insured. The tendency of such stipulations is to narrow the range of the underwriter's principal obligation; and, again, if the meaning is ambiguous, it is his own fault in not making use of more definite terms in which to express it. Chandler v. St. Paul, F. & M. Ins. Co. 21 Minn. 85, 18 Am. Rep. 885; Loy v. Home Ins. Co. 24 Minn. 815, 81 Am. Rep. 846; Cargill v. Millers & M. Mut. Ins. Co. 33 Minn. 90; Boright v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. 34 Minn. 352; Olsen v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 35 Minn. 432, 59 Am. Rep. 338. A second rule is that the language of a policy must be construed with reference to the nature of the property to which it is applied. Such policies must be presumed to have been made with reference to the purposes for which such property is ordinarily used, as well as the manner in which it is usually kept. Holbrook v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 25 Minn. 229; Boright v. Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. supra. It may be added, as within this rule, that the terms and conditions of a policy should be construed, if possible, so as to give them a meaning reasonably applicable to the kind of insurance upon the particular species of property insured."

The words "while not in use," applied either to a separator or other article, are not ambiguous. Ambiguity is primarily twofold:

1. Where words in themselves, not ambiguous, are linked with such loose-jointed relatives that they slip past or off what may have been their object.

DeGraff v. Queen Ins. Co. supra.

2. Where there is no ambiguity in the object to which the words apply, and the ambiguity, if any, is in the meaning of the words considered in themselves with reference to their object. The case at bar would furnish an ambiguity under this second head, if ambiguity there were.

In Kinney v. Baltimore & O. Employes' Assn., 15 L. R. A. 142, 35 W. Va. 385, Kinney, plaintiff's decedent, was a member of said association, whose constitution, in the language of the court, "provides for relief only in case of accident while in discharge of duty in the service of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Kinney was an employe, and had been on the day of this accident cleaning the outside of passenger-cars, had quit work at the hour for quitting, 5 o'clock, and in from four to ten minutes, according to one witness, and from five to fifteen, according to another, while on his way home, crossing the tracks, in passing through an opening between cars, was caught between them," and killed. Held, plaintiff could recover. "Was he not," asks the court, "while passing over the railroad tracks in going and returning from his home in the course of his labors, as much in the discharge of his duties and in the service of the company, as when he had the tools with which he worked in his hands, for the purposes of the question in hand?"

In United States v. Morris, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 464, 10 L. ed. 543, Chief Justice Taney stated the case before the court, as follows: "The question in this case is, whether a vessel on her outward voyage to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of taking on board a cargo of slaves, is 'employed or made use of' in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another, before any slaves are received on board."

This was a question of the construction of a penal statute. The vessel was bound to Africa, fitted up as a slaver, but had not yet reached Africa, nor had she taken any slaves aboard, yet the court held that she had been "employed or made use of" within the terms of the statute.

If a vessel fitted as a slaver, and intended to be used as such, though with no slaves aboard, and not yet reached the African coast, was held to be "in use" as a slaver within the purview of a penal statute, with how much stronger reason, shall a separator be held to be "in use" within the purview of an insurance policy, under the facts disclosed by this record.

See also The Emily and The Caroline, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 881, 6 L. ed. 116.

Mr. James O. Pierce, for respondent:

The most obvious and ordinary interpretation of the words "in use" is, in use in the business or service for which the separator was made, that is, the business of threshing.

If the plain meaning of the words "while not in use" was not the one intended by the insurer, then the expression was ambiguous. In such cases, the rule is that such ambiguity is to be construed against the insurer and favorably to the insured.

De Graff v. Queen Ins. Co. 38 Minn. 508; Loy v. Home Ins. Co. 24 Minn. 817, 81 Am. Rep. 846; Olson v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 35 Minn. 432, 59 Am. Rep. 338; Pettit v. State Ins. Co. 41 Minn. 803.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On October 8, 1891, the defendant issued to one Foss its policy of insurance for one year against loss by fire on his threshing machine engine and separator "while not in use;" loss, if any, payable to the plaintiff, as its interest might appear. The separator was destroyed by fire on October 1, 1892, and really the only question in the case is whether the property was "in use," within the meaning of the policy, at the time of the loss. The engine and separator had been used in threshing in the early part of September, 1892, but had not been so used for two weeks prior to the date of the fire, having been taken and kept during that time in the village of Madelia, for the purposes of repairs. On October 1, 1892, the engine was fired up, and used as a traction engine in hauling the separator seven miles out in the country, preparatory to the intended use, two days later, of both engine and separator in threshing. The property was left standing about ten rods from a farm house and some fifteen rods from the stacks of grain which it was intended to thresh. The fire in the engine was extinguished. During the succeeding night, while the property was standing there, the separator was destroyed by fire. The origin of the fire is unknown, but it is supposed to have been incendiary. It is evident that the fire was not occasioned by any use of either the separator or the engine, and was not due to any risk incident to their actual use in the operation of threshing or otherwise. The most obvious and natural meaning of the words "in use," as applied to this property, is use in the business or work for which it was designed, to wit, threshing; and evidently the object of the limitation of the risk contained in the policy was to exclude any possible liability on part of the insurer for losses by fire so peculiarly liable to occur during the actual operation of steam threshing machines. We do not think that the separator was "in use," within the terms of the policy, when the loss occurred. The very most that can be claimed is that the expression is ambiguous, and in such case the rule is well settled that such ambiguity must be construed against the insurer, and favorably to the insured. If the defendant desired to limit the risk to the property while "in store," or to exclude from the risk all losses during "the threshing season," it would have been very easy to have said so in plain and unmistakable language.

There was a provision in the policy that it should be void "if the hazard be increased by any means within the control or knowledge of the insured," and it is claimed that under this provision the policy was entirely avoided by reason of the use of the property for threshing in the month of September. There is no merit whatever in this point. To say nothing of the fact that no such defense was pleaded, this provision is not to be construed so broadly as to include hazards incident to a reasonable use of the insured property, having regard to its nature and circumstances. The insurance, unless the terms of the policy forbid, must be presumed to be made with reference to the character of the property insured and to the owner's use of it in the ordinary way. While it is true that the risk only covered the property while not in use, yet the policy nowhere forbade its use, or provided that the policy should become entirely void if it was used.

Order affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

LOUCHEIMER, MANN & CO., Appts.,Solomon WEIL, Trustee for the Benefit of Creditors of Stern & Saks, et al.

(118 N. C. 181.)

A trustee for creditors, who, under the advice of his own counsel and after consultation with and by the consent of counsel employed by a creditor, compromises suits affecting the trust estate, is not chargeable by that creditor with lack of good faith and proper diligence which will render him liable for assets which upon the compromise the creditors suing are allowed to retain under attachment.

(October 31, 1893.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wayne County in favor of defendants in an action brought to compel an accounting by the trustee for the benefit of creditors of Stern & Saks, and a settlement of his accounts. Affirmed.

The case was referred to a master and came before Judge Graves in 1888, upon the correctness of the master's rulings. The judge made an order in the cause and sent the case back to the master for further consideration. The complainants contended that Judge Graves' order concluded all matters in plaintiff's favor, except the one question of the ratification by complainants of the action of the attorney Grainger, and that the case was subsequently open only on that point. The referee's subsequent report on that point was in their favor, but he assumed to decide other points in the case, and the plaintiffs took the following exceptions to his report:

"The plaintiffs except to the report of the referee, filed at January term, 1891, and for grounds of exception specify and say that said report is erroneous, for that: (1) In paragraph 18 thereof the referee finds as a fact that H. F. Grainger was the attorney of the creditors secured in the second class of said deed of assignment, whereas the evidence shows that he was employed to represent the trustee in the actions brought against him by the attaching creditors, and his services in that behalf were paid by said trustee ($75), as shown in his account filed, marked 'B. B.' (2) In paragraph 14 thereof the referee finds as a fact that plaintiff Mann told Mr. Grainger that he (Mann) would leave the matter entirely in his (Grainger's) hands, and to do the best he could with it,

NOTE.—Right of assignee for creditors to compromise claims.

Generally a power conferred on the assignee by a deed of assignment authorizing him to compromise doubtful claims, or claims and debts owing to the assignor, is valid and will be sustained. Lininger v. Raymond, 9 Neb. 40; Brigham v. Tillinghast, 15 Barb. 618; Bellows v. Partridge, 19 Barb. 176; Bagley v. Bowe, 105 N. Y. 171, 59 Am. Rep. 488; Watkins v. Wallace, 19 Mich. 57; Robins v. Embury, 1 Smedes & M. Ch. 207.

These authorities sustain the position taken in the main case, that an assignee compromising a claim due the estate will not be liable therefor where the complaining creditor co-operated or consented.

And the New York Act of 1877, providing that the county court may authorize the assignee to compromise or compound claims, will not affect this power. Ginther v. Richmond, 18 Hun, 232; Dow v. Platner, 16 N. Y. 562; Coyne v. Weaver, 84 N. Y. 886.

And in Conkling v. Coonrod, 6 Ohio St. 611, a deed providing for compromises of debts due the assignor was sustained, but that was not the question involved in the case.

In Woodburn v. Mosher, 9 Barb. 255, it was held that an assignment authorizing the assignee "to ask, demand, sue, etc., and to compound and agree for all or any part of the debts due and owing to the assignor as the assignee shall deem meet," and authorizing the assignee to discharge his duty at his pleasure, was fraudulent.

A deed authorizing an assignee generally to adopt such measures in relation to the settlement of the estate, as will in his judgment promote the true interests thereof is valid as this will be construed to mean a discretion within legal limits. Mann v. Witbeck, 17 Barb. 388.

Whether or not a provision in an assignment, giving the power to the assignees to compound with any or all of the creditors in such manner and upon such terms as they deem proper, avoids 28 L. R. A.

the assignment, was not decided in Grover v. Wakeman, 11 Wend. 187, 25 Am. Dec. 624.

Some courts hold that an assignee for creditors is authorized to compromise claims when it is for the best interests of all the parties that it should be done, but if the assignee makes a disastrous compromise, he is in danger of being held to account for the same. His good faith largely operates in his favor. Anonymous v. Gilpcke, 5 Hun. 245; Jessup v. Herzfeld, 1 N. Y. Week. Dig. 241; Blue v. Marshall, 3 P. Wms. 381.

So in New York. Re Croton Ins. Co. 3 Barb. Ch. 642, 5 L. ed. 1041. See Ginther v. Richmond, supra.

And on the application by an assignee for authority to compromise a claim due the estate, a court may in its discretion require notice to be given to the creditors. Re Youngs, 5 Abb. N. C. 346.

It was held in Shipman's Petition, 1 Abb. N. C. 408, that the powers of a county judge exercised in New York city by a judge of the court of common pleas, do not extend to directing the assignee to unite in a plan of reconstruction of a railroad, where he represents the bondholders.

A clause in an assignment authorizing the assignee to compromise with creditors of the assignor renders the assignment void—as it causes delay and hindrance in the collection. McConnell v. Sherwood, 84 N. Y. 522, 38 Am. Rep. 537, affirming 19 Hun, 519; Hudson v. Maze, 4 Ill. 573; Gazzam v. Poyntz, 4 Ala. 374, 37 Am. Dec. 745.

So a reservation in a deed of assignment directing the disposition of the property "unless the indebtedness of the firm can be paid or settled otherwise by amicable arrangement between the creditors of the firm," renders the assignment void. Keedil v. Donaldson, 20 Kan. 165.

But in White v. Monsarrat, 18 B. Mon. 890, an assignment was sustained that provided for a full right and authority to collect and sue for and settle and compromise all debts due to said M., or owing by him, on the ground that the grant of a power to compromise does not change the order of payment from that prescribed in the deed.

whereas the evidence shows that Grainger was employed to defend the suits brought by the attaching creditors against the said trustee, and no authority given him, or any one else, to compromise said suits. (3) In paragraph 19 thereof the referee finds as facts that in said compromise the said H. F. Grainger represented the second-class creditors, among whom were the plaintiffs in this action, whereas the evidence shows that said Grainger was employed to defend the actions brought against said trustee by the attaching creditors; and the action of Sol. Weil, trustee, to plaintiffs, shows that the compromise was recommended by the trustee's lawyers, and only by them, and the said Grainger had no authority to advise or consent to any compromise or judgment so far as these plaintiffs were concerned. (4) In paragraph 23 thereof the referee finds as facts that said Sol. Weil acted in good faith in assenting to said compromise and judgment, and for the best interests of his trust, whereas the evidence shows that the said compromise was only made that he (Weil) might get payment in full of a debt due H. Weil Bros., of which he was a member, in utter disregard of the right of the other creditors secured in said deed of trust, and without their knowledge or consent, or without the approval of a court of justice; that in this connection the referee should have found as a fact that, before the attaching creditors sued, the plaintiff Jacob Mann offered to take goods at cost prices in payment of plaintiffs' claim, they being in the second preferred class, and the defendant trustee refused, requiring the said Mann to pay for the same in cash, when the said Weil, trustee, well knew that the goods assigned to him inventoried at cost $6,437.89, and the debts in the first class only aggregated $2,896.23; that said action on the part of the trustee was a scheme to save his own debt at the expense of the other creditors, and was not in good faith, and the referee should have so found."

Exceptions to conclusions of law: "(1) For that the referee, in his first conclusion of law, omitted to charge the defendant trustee with the full amount of goods seized by the attaching creditors,—that is, 75 per cent of their inventoried price,—in making up his account, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. (2) For that the referee, in his second conclusion of law credits the account of the defendant trustee with disbursements as shown in his twenty-sixth finding of facts, whereas no disbursement subsequent to the time plaintiff Jacob Mann offered to take goods at cost price in payment of plaintiff's claim should be allowed. (3) For that the referee, in his third conclusion of law, finds that H. F. Grainger was attorney of the plaintiffs in

An assignment made to compel the creditors to compromise their claims, is fraudulent. Bennett v. Ellison, 23 Minn. 242; Kerolis v. Schloes, 40 How. Pr. 284.

And it is a fraud to authorize an assignee to employ the proceeds of the assignment in defending suits, which may be brought against the assignor by his creditors. Planck v. Sohermerborn, 3 Barb. Ch. 644, 5 L. ed. 1042.

But in Jewett v. Woodward, 1 Edw. Ch. 195, 6 L. ed. 108, a deed providing, "should the avails of the assignment be insufficient to pay the debts in full, the assignees are authorized to compromise the same requiring discharges on payment of the dividend"—was sustained as it was not attacked in that case, the court saying the authority to compromise debts would not bind the creditors if so it would have been void. And it should be noticed that this assignment contemplates a compromise with all creditors on the same basis of a pro rata dividend.

In Hone v. Henriquez, 13 Wend. 240, 27 Am. Dec. 204, it was held that a deed of assignment for the benefit of those who would release their claims could not be attacked by a party assenting thereto.

Statutory provisions.

Cal. Act 1880, § 21, gives the assignee of an insolvent estate the power to settle all matters and accounts between the debtor and his debtors subject to the approval of the court. And under the order of the court to compound with any person indebted to such debtor.

Under Ga. Code 1882, § 2539, all persons acting in a fiduciary capacity, are authorized to compromise doubtful debts belonging to such estate, where such settlement would advance the interests of those represented.

Under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2915, a trustee may compound or compromise any debt or claim belonging to the assignor, which cannot be recovered without endangering the recovery of such claim.

Under Me. Rev. Stat. 1888, p. 582, the assignee may, with the consent of the county judge, settle any demand or controversy, by compromise or arbitration.

Under Mass. Pub. Stat. 1882, p. 798, probate courts may authorize trustees to adjust by arbitration or compromise any demands in favor of, or against, the estate they represent.

Under Mo. Rev. Stat. 1890, p. 205, the circuit court or judge may make an order directing the assignee to sell, compound, or compromise all bad or doubtful debts upon such terms and conditions as appear proper and most beneficial to the estate and to release any vested or contingent right in or to the estate assigned upon such terms as the court or judge may deem proper.

Under N. J. Rev. 1877, p. 39, "the assignee shall have as full power to dispose of all the estate, real and personal, assigned as the debtor had, "and to sue for and recover . . . everything belonging or appertaining to said estate, real or personal, of said debtor or debtors, and shall have full power and authority to refer to arbitration, settle and compound with any person concerning the same."

Under N.Y. Rev. Stat. (Birdseye, vol. 1, p. 120), the county judge may authorize the assignee to sell, compromise, or compound any claim or debt belonging to the estate of the debtor.

Under Ohio Rev. Stat. 1890, vol. 1, p. 1599, § 6350, "the assignee or trustee may, with the approval of the court, compromise or sell any claim or demand on behalf of the assignor, which is desperate or difficult of collection."

By Va. Code 1887, p. 655, § 2709, "it shall be held lawful for any fiduciary to compound and compromise any liability due to or from him: provided, that said compounding and compromise be ratified and approved by a court of equity of competent jurisdiction all parties in interest being before said court by proper process."

In this note, cases of assignments requiring the creditors to come in and release their claims, and cases involving the question of preferences, are not included.

this action, and leaves the inference that he legally represented them in said compromise, which said finding, accompanied by the qualification that he was only employed to assist the defendant trustee in defending suits of attaching creditors, and for no other purpose, is misleading, and not predicated upon the facts. (4) For that the referee, in his sixth conclusion of law, finds that the defendants are entitled to judgment against the plaintiffs and their surety upon this prosecution bond for cost, whereas judgment should have been rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount of their claim, with interest and costs, as demanded in the complaint filed in said action."

The following is the opinion of the court on the exceptions: "This cause came on to be heard before me upon exceptions of plaintiffs to the report of referee. The principal exception argued before me was as to the alleged want of authority by Grainger to Mann to compromise the suits of Claflin et al. vs. S. Weil, Trustee, etc. It appears that Grainger represented Mann's firm of Loucheimer, Mann & Co. in that suit, although they were not parties to the record. It appears that he was associated with Weil's counsel, and the two agreed to a certain judgment. Inasmuch as Loucheimer, Mann & Co's counsel consented to the judgment, it is binding, whether Grainger had authority to agree to that judgment or not. Grainger's estate is admitted or found to be solvent, and the plaintiffs' remedy is against that, if they have any. It seems that Grainger had general authority to represent interest of plaintiffs in the suit. After considering the testimony, I see no reason to overrule any of the referee's findings of fact, and I see no error in any of his legal conclusions. The report is therefore confirmed, and the several exceptions overruled. The judgment is affirmed."

Messrs. Fuller & Fuller for appellants.
Mr. S. A. Woodard for appellees.

Burwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs are creditors of a firm—Stern & Saks—which in 1879 made an assignment to the defendant Weil to secure the distribution of their assets among their creditors, with certain preferences therein provided for, and in this action they require of him a settlement of his trusteeship. The facts found by the referee have been confirmed by his honor, and are thus conclusively determined. We find no error in the conclusions of law which were drawn from those facts. As is stated in the judgment, the contention of the plaintiffs is that the defendant trustee should be held liable to them for the value of a portion of the property assigned to him, which had been attached by two of the creditors of Stern & Saks, to wit, H. B. Claflin & Co. and Armstrong, Cator & Co. It is found that the suits brought by these two creditors, in which warrants of attachment were issued and a portion of the assigned property was seized and sold, were compromised by the trustee; and, by the terms of the compromise so made, the attaching creditors were allowed to have about two thirds of the proceeds of the attached goods, while only one third was paid over to the trustee. The plaintiffs had a right to demand that the defendant trustee should be diligent and faithful in the management of the estate committed to his charge in part for their benefit. But his compromising the suits mentioned above was not at all incompatible with either good faith or due diligence. A trustee may compromise suits brought against him affecting the assets in his hands, and he will not be liable to the costs quo trustant, provided he has acted with due care, and in good faith has done what, under the circumstances that surrounded him at the time, seemed best for the interest of those whom it was his duty to honestly serve. It may be conceded that an attorney has no authority to compromise his client's cause that has been committed to his charge without special authority so to do. That is well settled. A general employment as attorney does not include such authority. But that recognized principle does not fit the case before us. Here is a question of diligence and fidelity on the part of the defendant trustee. The charge against him is that he sacrificed the assets committed to him by the compromise of these suits,—that he allowed $1,000 of the assets to be, by that compromise, diverted from the creditor to whom it belonged to the plaintiffs in those suits; and his reply to this charge is that he acted in this matter in good faith and with due diligence, and to prove this he asserts that this compromise was made by counsel whom he had employed to represent the interest of the creditors, and after consultation with an attorney in whose hands the appellants had placed their claim against Stern & Saks for collection. We repeat that the question here is not whether an attorney, under a general authority to conduct a suit, has authority to compromise his client's cause (which of course must be answered in the negative), but whether a trustee who, under advice of his own counsel, and after consultation with and by the consent of counsel employed by the creditor, compromises suits affecting the trust estate, is chargeable by that creditor with lack of good faith and proper diligence because he made that compromise. We think that this query must also be answered in the negative, and that there is no error in the judgment.

Affirmed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

UNION PACIFIC R. CO., Ply. in Err.,
v.
Andrew S. ARTIST.

(80 Fed. Rep. 365.)

1. A release of claims against a railroad company for specified personal injuries will not include a claim for damages not then known to either party for negligent treatment of such injuries in a hospital maintained by such company, although the release was expressly made to cover all claims and demands whatsoever in law or in equity "by reason of any matter, cause, or thing whatever, whether the same arose upon contract or upon tort, from the beginning of the world to this day."
2. A railroad company is not liable for the malpractice of physicians, or the carelessness of attendants at a hospital maintained as a charitable enterprise by contributions of the company and small sums deducted monthly from the wages of its employes.

(February 12, 1894.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Wyoming to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligence of physicians and attendants in a hospital maintained by defendant, to which plaintiff was sent for treatment. Reversed.

Statement by Sanborn, Circuit Judge:

This writ of error is brought to reverse a judgment against the Union Pacific Railway Company for the malpractice of physicians and the negligence of attendants in a hospital maintained by it, for the benefit of its employes, at Denver, in the state of Colorado. The evidence tended to show these facts:

The Union Pacific Railway Company requires each of its employes to contribute from his wages twenty-five cents a month towards the support of a medical department. The railway company contributes the amount required in addition to the sum thus raised from the contributions of the employes to pay the expenses of this department. At the time the defendant in error was treated at the hospital, the company was contributing from $2,000 to $4,000 per month for this purpose. With this fund the railway company maintained several hospitals for the treatment of its employes when they were sick or injured, and employed physicians and attendants to care for them at the hospitals, and physicians and surgeons to attend them outside the hospitals, at important points on its lines of railroad. All the employes of the railroad company, except those injured in fights, those injured when drunk, those sick from chronic diseases, and those suffering from certain specific diseases, were received and treated at these hospitals free of expense or charge, whenever they were sick or injured, regardless of the manner in which, or the time at which, the injury was received or the disease contracted, and whether the railway company had or had not any connection with the cause of it. The physicians attending the hospitals had the privilege of treating their private patients in them, and these patients were the only ones who were required to pay for their board and treatment; but the moneys received from this source were inconsiderable,—not more than $300 per annum. Andrew S. Artist, the defendant in error, had his foot and leg injured on the 4th day of October, 1889, while he was in the employment of the company, and was treated at one of the hospitals maintained by it in the way we have stated from October 7, 1889, until January 7, 1890, when he was discharged as cured. In the course of his treatment the physicians at the hospital properly inserted a rubber drainage tube, but, through the carelessness of the physicians or of the attendants, a portion of it was left in the leg as the wound healed, and when he was discharged. It caused suffering and partial disability until it was removed by a surgical operation in April, 1892. January 13, 1890, while both parties were ignorant that this tube remained in the leg, Artist received from the company $150, and signed a receipt or release, the material parts of which are as follows:

"The Union Pacific Railway Company,
"To Andrew S. Artist of Cheyenne, Wyoming.

ing.

"1890.

"January 13.

"For amount agreed upon in settlement of claim of Andrew S. Artist against the Union Pacific Railway Company on account of injuries received at McCammon, on Oregon Short Line, on October 4, 1889, while assisting in switching a burning baggage car from main track to side track, said Artist being an engineer in the employ of said company, but returning from leave of absence at time of accident, said injury consisting of deep, punctured, and lacerated wounds, as follows: On inner surface of right thigh. On inner surface of right foot. Comp. fracture of fourth toe of right foot. Contusion in region of spine. Contusion on left foot and face. (Settlement is in full of all claims and demands of whatever character.)

"Received, Pocatello, Idaho, January 18 1890, of the Union Pacific Railway Company, one hundred and fifty dollars in full payment of the above account. In consideration of the payment of said sum of money, I, Andrew S. Artist, of Cheyenne, in the county of Laramie, in the state of Wyoming, hereby remise, release, and forever discharge the said company, its operated, leased, controlled, and auxiliary lines and companies, NOTE.—The case above presents a new application of the doctrine that denies the liability of a charitable institution for negligence of agents.

of and from all manner of actions, causes of action, suits, debts and sums of money, dues, claims and demands, whatsoever, in law or equity, which I have had or now have against said company by reason of any matter, cause, or thing whatever, whether the same arose upon contract or upon tort, from the beginning of the world to this day.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this thirteenth day of January, 1890."

Counsel for the company requested the court to charge the jury that this release was a complete defense to the action, and the refusal to give that request is the first error assigned. The same counsel requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the hospital was maintained by the defendant, not for the purpose of deriving profit therefrom, but as a charitable enterprise, so far as defendant's employés were received therein, then the only obligation of the defendant, in receiving its employés at said hospital, was to use ordinary care in selecting its physicians and attendants therein; and, since no negligence in the employment of physicians is here charged, you will, in case you find the hospital to have been maintained as above stated, find for the defendant." The court refused to give this instruction, and charged the jury that the hospital was not a charitable institution, in any sense that those words are used in the law, and that the company was bound to use reasonable care to see that the treatment given to patients in this hospital was such as was ordinarily given in hospitals of this kind to such patients; and this ruling is the second error complained of.

Argued before Sanborn, Circuit Judge, and Thayer, District Judge.

Messrs. John M. Thurston, John W. Lacey, and Willis Van Devanter, for plaintiff in error:

If the parties intended to release claims of every character, known or unknown, they had the power so to contract, and if they have manifested such intention by the words used by them, the release must have that effect.

1 Greenl. Ev. § 277.

Where general words are used in a release, in the absence of intrinsic evidence to the contrary, the presumption is that they were intended to cover all that is included within their meaning; and that meaning will be construed most strongly against the releasor.

Jackson v. Stackhouse, 1 Cow. 122, 13 Am. Dec. 514.

Contracting parties, choosing to do so, may, in the absence of fraud, agree with one another to release one the other from every possible claim, known or unknown.

Duff v. Hutchinson, 57 Hun, 152.

The contract between a charitable hospital and its patients, if any contract is to be inferred from the relation of the parties, can be only on the part of the hospital that it shall exercise reasonable diligence and care in the selection of its agents—the surgeons, internes, and attendants, and for the negligence of such agents where their selection has been made with due and reasonable care there is no liability on the part of the hospital.

McDonald v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529; Van Tassel v. Manhattan Eye & Ear Hospital, 39 N.Y. S. R. 781; Boyd v. Insurance Patrol of Philadelphia, 113 Pa. 269; Pire Ins. Patrol of Philadelphia v. Boyd, 1 L. R. A. 417, 120 Pa. 624; Richardson v. Carbon Hill Coal Co. 20 L. R. A. 338, 6 Wash. 52; Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675; Secord v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 221; Laudheim v. De Koninglyke Nederlandsche Stoomboot Maatschappij, 107 N. Y. 238.

Mr. Frank H. Clark for defendant in error.

Sanborn, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

General words, alone, in a release, are taken most strongly against the releasor. But when there is a particular recital followed by general words the latter are qualified by the particular recital. Jackson v. Stackhouse, 1 Cow. 122, 18 Am. Dec. 514, and cases cited; 2 Parsons, Cont. 633, note. The court below properly applied this rule to the release in this case. The general words in the last half of it are limited by the very specific recital of the injuries that the $150 was to be in settlement of, which is contained in the first half of the release. It was the claims for these injuries, and for these only, that this release discharged the company from. The injury now complained of was then unknown to both parties, and their settlement was without reference to it. A disregard of the rule would work manifest injustice, and impose upon the defendant in error a release he did not intend to make. There was no error in this ruling.

Was the company liable for the malpractice of the physicians, or the carelessness of the attendants, at the hospital, if that hospital was maintained as a charitable enterprise, and not for the purpose of deriving profit from it? If one contracts to treat a patient in a hospital—or out of it, for that matter—for any disease or injury, he undoubtedly becomes liable for any injury suffered by the patient through the carelessness of the physicians or attendants he employs to carry out his contract. If one undertakes to treat such a patient for the purpose of making profit thereby, the law implies the contract to treat him carefully and skillfully, and holds him liable for the carelessness of the physicians and attendants he furnishes. But this doctrine of respondere superior has no just application where one voluntarily aids in establishing or maintaining a hospital without expectation of pecuniary profit. If one, out of charity, with no purpose of making profit, sends a physician to a sick neighbor or to an injured servant, or furnishes him with hospital accommodations and medical attendance, he is not liable for the carelessness of the physicians or of the attendants. The doctrine of respondere superior no longer applies, because, by fair implication, he simply undertakes to exercise ordinary care in the selection of physicians and attendants who are reasonably competent and skillful, and does not agree to become personally responsible for their negligence or mistakes. The same rule applies to corporations and to individuals, whether they are engaged in dispensing their own charities, or in dispensing the charitable gifts of others intrusted to them to administer. One reason why corporations and individuals conducting hospitals supported by charitable endowments and contributions, and operated to heal the sick and injured, but not for profit, are not liable for the negligence of their employes, is, that the moneys in their hands constitute a trust fund devoted to a charitable purpose, and the courts refuse to permit it to be diverted to the very different purpose of paying for the malpractice of their physicians or the negligence of their attendants. Moreover, the corporations or individuals that administer such trusts must, after all, leave the treatment of the patients to the superior knowledge and skill of the physicians. They cannot direct the latter, as the master may ordinarily direct the servant, what to do, and how to do it. If they did do so, the physicians would be bound to exercise their own superior skill and better judgment, and to disobey their employers, if, in their opinion, the welfare of the patients required it. And, finally, the patient is not required to accept the proffered accommodations and attendance. They are but freely offered to him. He may refuse to accept them, and seek other physicians and other accommodations. It would be a hard rule, indeed,—a rule calculated to repress the charitable instincts of men,—that would compel those who have freely furnished such accommodations and services to pay for the negligence or mistakes of physicians or attendants that they had selected with reasonable care. No such rule has ever prevailed in this country. The rule is that those who furnish hospital accommodations and medical attendance, not for the purpose of making profit thereby, but out of charity, or in the course of the administration of a charitable enterprise, are not liable for the malpractice of the physicians or the negligence of the attendants they employ, but are responsible only for their own want of ordinary care in selecting them. McDonald v. Massachusetts Gen. Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529; Fire Ins. Patrol of Philadelphia v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 624, 647, 1 L. R. A. 417; Van Tassel v. Manhattan Eye & Ear Hospital, 15 N. Y. Supp. 620, and note; Glavin v. Rhode Island Hospital, 12 R. I. 411, 34 Am. Rep. 675; Laubheim v. De Koniglyke Neder Landsche Stoomboot Maatschappij, 107 N. Y. 228; Secord v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 221; Richardson v. Carbon Hill Coal Co. 6 Wash. 52, 20 L. R. A. 338.

Under the evidence in this case, the medical department and hospitals of the Union Pacific Railway Company fall fairly within this rule, and the reasons that support the rule apply to this case with all their force. The test which determines whether such an enterprise is charitable or otherwise is its purpose. If its purpose is to make profit, it is not a charitable enterprise. If it is to heal the sick and relieve the suffering, without hope or purpose of getting gain from its operation, it is charitable. Tried by this test, the hospitals and medical department of this company are a great public charity. They are supported by the voluntary contributions of this great corporation and of its employes, without the purpose to profit thereby. We say by their "voluntary contributions" not unadvisedly. We have not failed to notice that the defendant in error testified that the contribution of twenty-five cents a month made by each employé was a compulsory assessment, and that the company took it out of the pay of such employé. But how it could be compulsory does not appear. If it was a part of the pay of the employé, the company could not lawfully take it out without his consent. If he did not consent, then he did not contribute, and the company still owes him the amount of this assessment. If he did consent, he voluntarily contributed the amount of his assessment. Whatever may be said of the contributions of the employes, there is no question whatever but that the gift of $2,000 to $4,000 per month made by the company was purely voluntary and charitable. These contributions of twenty-five cents per month from each employé, and of from $2,000 to $4,000 per month from the company, constituted a trust fund devoted to the purpose of furnishing hospital accommodation, physicians, and surgeons for the relief of the sick and injured employes without charge or expense to them. For this purpose this fund was intrusted to this company to administer. There is no evidence that there ever was any purpose or intention on the part of the company of making any profit through the operation of this hospital or the supplying of these physicians. The sole purpose that this record discloses was to relieve these employes from sickness and suffering.

In Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen, 556. Mr. Justice Gray defined a "charity" as follows: "A charity, in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift to be applied, consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering, or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works, or otherwise lessening the burdens of government."

The gifts of this corporation and its employes are clearly within this definition. There is no doubt that any one of these employes could compel the application of this fund to the purpose for which it was collected, in any court of equity having jurisdiction. There was no express contract made by this company to treat this defendant in error in the hospital, for his injuries. It is true that he made his contribution to the fund to maintain this charitable enterprise, but he paid nothing further for his hospital accommodations or his treatment. He neither contributed nor paid any more than he would have contributed if he had never been treated at all. The company, as the trustee and administrator of this charity, offered him the hospital accommodations and the physicians in its employment, and he accepted them. From these facts no contract to treat him with ordinary skill and care can be implied, because, in all that it did in this behalf, this company was conducting a charitable enterprise. The company was not organized for the purpose of furnishing and operating hospitals and supplying medical attendance for gain, and such a business would be clearly beyond its chartered powers. It was chartered to construct and operate a railroad and telegraph line. It was under no legal obligation to give thousands of dollars per annum to furnish hospitals and physicians for its employes, and its appropriation of this money to this purpose was a gift,—a charity. If it be urged that this gift may have been prompted by an ulterior and selfish motive,—that the company may have thought that the operation of its medical department would protect it from excessive claims for injuries resulting to its servants—the answer is that the true test of a public charity is not the motive of the donor, but the purpose to which the money given is to be applied. If argument, authority, and illustration in support of this proposition are wanted, they will be found in the learned and exhaustive opinion of Mr. Justice Paxson in Fire Ins. Patrol of Philadelphia v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 642, 646, 1 L. R. A. 417. If a dozen of the employes of this company had contributed a fund, out of charity, to furnish one of their number, who was injured, with hospital accommodations and medical attendance, they certainly would not have been liable to him for the malpractice of the physicians or the negligence of the attendants they employed. If they had intrusted such a fund to a third person to administer, who, out of charity, contributed to it more largely, and he furnished the accommodations and attendance by the use of this fund, it goes without saying that he would not be liable for the negligence of the physicians or attendants he employed. That the party to whom this charitable gift is intrusted, the party that contributes most liberally to it, and the party that cannot by any possibility derive any direct profit or benefit from it, since it is not subject to bodily ailments and injuries, is a corporation, cannot extend the limits of legal liability here.

The result is that the doctrine of respondent superior has no application to this case. The only contract the law implies here is the agreement on the part of the company to use reasonable care to select and obtain skillful physicians and careful attendants, and if the company performed that contract it was responsible no further. In other words, it was responsible for the discharge of its own personal duty, and not for the performance of the duties of its employes.

In our opinion the instruction on this subject requested by the counsel for the company should have been given, and the judgment is accordingly reversed, with costs, and the case remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

John E. PHILLIPS, Receiver of the National Bank of Sumter, Appt.,

v.
MERCANTILE NATIONAL BANK of New York, Resp.

(140 N. Y. 556.)

1. Checks drawn by the cashier of a bank in its name upon another bank, in which it has a deposit, for the purpose of speculating in stocks without the knowledge of the officers of the bank, the names of the payees being actual customers of the bank but such customers having no knowledge of the checks or connection with the transaction, are subject to the same rule as if fictitious names were selected and used and the payment by the drawee bank of such checks upon indorsements made by such cashier is good as against the bank of which he is an officer.

2. A bank is so far concluded by the acts of its cashier authorized to draw a check upon the bank's funds in drawing checks payable to fictitious payees or to customers whose names are used for fictitious purposes and indorsed by him upon the checks as to be estopped from denying the validity of such acts as against the bank upon which the checks are drawn and which has paid them in good faith.

(January 16, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York Circuit in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover an alleged balance of the deposit account of the insolvent bank with defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George W. Wingate, for appellant:

The indorsement by Bartlett of the name of the payees upon the checks which he had drawn as cashier to the order of Brown & Stubbs was forgery.

A check is a complete instrument without the indorsement. The indorsement is not part of the check, but is a distinct contract.

Miller v. People, 52 N. Y. 805, 11 Am. Rep. 706; Com. v. Adams, 7 Met. 51.

The indorsement is an act presumed in law to be done after the instrument is completed.

Com. v. Ward, 2 Mass. 397; 2 Russell, Crimes, 480.

The fact that Bartlett in making these indorsements skillfully imitated the signatures of two well known dealers of the bank, with the express intention of delaying suspicion and preventing any inquiry being made into the

If a person knowingly pays a forgery away as a good bill, it is a consequence and almost a consequence of law that he must intend to defraud the person to whom he pays the bill and also the person whose name is used.

Reg. v. Crole, 8 Car. & P. 536; Reg. v. Wardell, 8 Post. & F. 52.

The New York bank which paid these checks has a perfect cause of action against the New York firms as indorsees, and will compel them to refund if the plaintiff herein recovers.

That they are liable is well settled.

The only way that these payees can be held to be fictitious persons is by establishing such an estoppel against the bank as will in equity prevent it from asserting the contrary.

Shipman v. Bank of the State of New York, 13 L. R. A. 791, 126 N. Y. 327.

An estoppel is defined by this court in People v. Bank of North America, 75 N. Y. 547, as only arising when a party either by his declarations or conduct has induced another person to act in a particular manner.

So far as these forgeries are concerned the case is the same as if Bartlett had indorsed paper sent to the bank for the account of Brown or Stubbs, and does not differ from any other case of forgery by a trusted employe, and the principles involved are identical in all respects with those considered adversely to defendant in the cases of Shipman v. Bank of the State of New York, 13 L. R. A. 791, 126 N. Y. 327, cases cited at p. 827; Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank of New York, 84 N. Y. 207, 38 Am. Rep. 501; Welsh v. German American Bank, 73 N. Y. 424, 29 Am. Rep. 175; Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68, 41 Am. Dec. 731.

A "fictitious person" is a non-existent person.

The payees of these checks were not, either in law or in fact, fictitious persons, because the proof was that persons of those names did exist in the town of Sumter who were customers of the bank and that no other persons of these names did exist in the town or the county. The presumption of law and fact from the identity of names is that these were the persons intended as payees of the checks.

In the cases under the statute no indorsement is required.

Irving Nat. Bank v. Alley, 79 N. Y. 536.

The statute was made for the purpose of obviating a difficulty in the way of the holder in making title and suing on a note which had not been indorsed by the person to whose order it was made payable.

Plets v. Johnson, 3 Hill, 112; Maniort v. Roberts, 4 E. D. Smith, 88.

23 I. R. A.

The whole purpose of the act was that when the maker has put the bill in circulation and obtained the money on it the law holds him to be estopped from denying that the person whose name was indorsed is an actual person and his indorsement genuine, which is consistent with natural justice.

In almost all the cases the persons were non-existing as in—

When the New York bank disobeyed the mandate of the drawer of these checks and did not pay to the order of Stubbs & Brown as it was instructed to do, the legal contemplation of its act, so far as its depositor was involved, was as if no payment at all had been made and the payment made was from the New York bank's own money.

Mr. John M. Bowers, with Mr. Chas. A. Davison, for respondent:

The act of writing the names of the payees on the back of the check by the drawer was not forgery.

Forgery is the attempted imitation of another's act, by means of which it is intended to cheat or defraud. It must be without authority; it must be an imitation, and it must be for the purpose of cheating.

Gray, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff is the receiver of the National Bank of Sumter, in South Carolina, and through this action seeks to recover a balance alleged to be due on a deposit account with the defendant bank. The question presented by the record is whether certain twelve checks, drawn by the cashier of the Sumter bank, which were paid by the defendant bank, could properly be debited in account to the Sumter bank. Bartlett, its cashier, had drawn them upon the defendant for various amounts, some to the order of A. S. Brown, and some to the order of C. E. Stubbs. In the check book he would enter sometimes the real amount of the checks, and sometimes an amount much less than the checks actually were drawn for. The names of these payees were those of persons who actually resided in Sumter, and were dealers with the bank, but they knew nothing of these checks, and had no connection whatever with the transactions of the cashier in issuing these checks. Bartlett, after having drawn the checks, indorsed them in the name of the payee, making them payable to the order of some firm of stock brokers in New York, who collected them from the defendant. By subsequent manipulations of the books in his bank, Bartlett was able to prevent a discovery of his dishonest acts until after he had absconded, and the insolvency of the bank was disclosed. The learned trial judge, in dismissing the complaint, discussed the question of what the act of the cashier of the Sumter bank amounted to in law. In his judgment, the cashier's indorsement of the checks in the name of the payee which he had written in the body of the check was not, in a legal sense, forgery. He said that act did not defraud the persons whose names were used as payees, nor the bank of New York, nor his own bank, but that the fraud consisted in the unlawful drawing of the check for his own purposes, with the intent to convert his own bank's funds. Regarding the transaction in that light, and the indorsement as a part of one continuous act of preparing a check so that the New York bank should pay the funds drawn upon to the indorsees, he very properly reached the conclusion that, so far as the New York bank was concerned, the cashier's intent was the intent of his bank, and hence the payment of the checks was conclusive upon it. At the general term, the opinion of the court again carefully reviews the legal questions, and sustains the judgment below. Upon the question of the effect upon the transaction of the use by Bartlett of names, as payees, of persons who were customers of the bank, it is said in the opinion that that fact did not prevent the application of the principle which would govern if fictitious names had been selected and used for payees. They held, in substance, that the bank, through its authorized officer, had put in circulation paper with knowledge, chargeable to it, that the names of the payees did not represent real persons, and with the intention to indorse thereon the names of the payees, who, for all intents and purposes, were fictitious payees and whose names were adopted and resorted to as a device to avoid suspicion. We think the judgments below were right. Whether indorsing the check in the name of the payee therein was a forgery in the legal sense or not is not the important question. In a general sense, of course, the cashier did forge the payee's name, but that fact did not affect the title or rights of the defendant. Coggill v. American Exch. Bank, 1 N. Y. 113, 49 Am. Dec. 310. In the case cited, a bill was drawn upon the plaintiff to the order of one Truman Billings, and was discounted at a bank. The drawer had indorsed it with the name of the payee, Truman Billings, a person who in fact had no interest in the bill. It was held that the defendant in the case, who had accepted and paid the bill, held it by a good title. Bronson, J., said: "As the payee had no interest, and it was not intended that he should ever become a party to the transaction, he may be regarded, in relation to this matter, as a nonentity; and it is fully settled that, when a man draws and puts into circulation a bill which is payable to a fictitious person, the holder may declare and recover upon it as a bill payable to bearer. In legal effect, though not in form, the bill is payable to bearer."

The case of Shipman v. Bank of State of New York, 126 N. Y. 318, 13 L. R. A. 791, which was recently before us, did not decide any question inconsistently with what the courts below have decided. There it had been found that the checks were signed by the firm in the belief that the names of the payee represented real persons entitled to receive the amounts of the checks, and with the intention that they should be delivered to real payees, and should not go into circulation otherwise than through a delivery to, and an indorsement by, the payees named. Bedell was their clerk, whose employment did not comprehend the drawing or indorsing of checks or drafts; and in indorsing upon the checks the names of the payees he committed the crime of forgery, because he was without authority in that respect, and did so with the intention to deceive his employers, the makers, and to put their checks in circulation for his account. That was a case wholly other than was made out here. It was stated in the Shipman Case that the maker's intention is the controlling consideration which determines the character of the paper, and that the statutory rule which gives to paper drawn payable to the order of a fictitious person, and negotiated by the maker, the same validity as paper payable to bearer, applies only when such paper is put into circulation by the maker with knowledge that the name of the payee does not represent a real person. The principle of that decision is quite applicable to the case at bar. Though Bartlett selected, for the execution of his dishonest purposes, the names of persons who were dealers with his bank, it was, in legal effect, as though he had selected any names at random. The difference is that, by the methods resorted to, he averted suspicion on the part of the directors or other officers of his bank. The names he used were, for his purposes, fictitious, because he never intended that the paper should reach the persons whose names were upon it. The transaction was one solely for the fraudulent purpose of appropriating his bank's moneys by a trick which his position enabled him to perform. Concededly, if the names of the payees were of fictitious persons, the Sumter bank would have had no claim upon the defendant. How, then, can the transaction be said to assume a different aspect because the names adopted were of known persons? That the intention was to treat them as being of fictitious persons is manifest. As cashier, invested with the authority to draw checks upon the bank's accounts with its correspondents, instead of drawing them directly to the order of the parties who he intended should get the moneys, he drew them to the order of persons who had no interest in them, and thereupon wrote their names under a direction to pay to the real parties, who were intended to be the recipients of the funds drawn upon. If the checks had been drawn directly to the order of the real parties, the defendant would undoubtedly have been protected in paying them. As it was, the payees were fictitious persons in the eye of the law, and the only real parties were the firms in New York, to whom the cashier sent them in such form as that they could draw the moneys upon them. The fictitiousness of the maker's direction to pay does not depend upon the identification of the name of the payee with some existent person, but upon the intention underlying the act of the maker in inserting the name. Where, as in this case, the intent of the act was, by the use of the names of some known persons, to throw directors and officers off their guard, such a use of names was merely an instrumentality or a means which the cashier adopted, in the execution of his purpose to defraud the bank, in an apparently legitimate exercise of his authority. The cashier, through his office and the power confined to him for exercise, was enabled to perpetrate a fraud upon his bank which a greater vigilance of its officers might have earlier discovered, if it might not have prevented. If his position and the confidence reposed in him were such as to enable him to escape detection for the while, then the consequence of his fraudulent acts should fall upon the bank whose directors, by their misplaced confidence and gift of powers, made them possible, and not upon others who, themselves acting innocently and in good faith, were warranted in believing the transaction to have been one coming within the cashier's powers. It may be quite true that the cashier was not the agent of the bank to commit a forgery, or any other fraud of such a nature; but he was authorized to draw or check upon the bank's funds. If he abused his authority, and robbed his bank, it must suffer the loss. The distinction between such a case and the many other cases which the plaintiff's counsel cites from is in the fact that it was within the scope of this cashier's powers to bind the bank by his checks. In transmitting them made out and indorsed as they were, the bank was so far concluded by his acts as to be estopped from now denying their validity.

For the reasons given, the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur, except Bartlett, J., not sitting.

APPEAL by complainants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Joseph County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to recover damages from defendants for alleged injuries to plaintiffs' business by reason of wrongful acts of defendants in carrying out an alleged conspiracy to monopolize trade. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. A. L. Brick and Lucius Hubbard, for appellants:

The argument is advanced that plaintiffs were only "incidentally" injured by the act of the defendants in enforcing a penalty against the West Michigan Lumber Company.

Such was not the understanding of the defendants and of the other directors of the association. They understood it to be a combination to suppress the competition of those dealers who did not own yards, with a stock on hand, by driving them out of business. They could not reach the consumer, but they can reach the wholesale dealer, and they compel him to pay an arbitrary penalty, under a threat of financial ruin. What they demand is, that he shall assist to ruin the dealer who does not own a yard.

A combination for the purpose of injuring another is a combination directed personally against the party to be injured; and the law allowing them to combine for the purpose of obtaining a lawful benefit to themselves gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the hurt of another.

Greenhood, Pub. Pol. 651, citing Reg. v. Roulands, 17 Q. B. 871.

Such a combination is illegal:

1. Unlawful means are employed. They threaten any wholesale dealer with financial ruin if he sell to any one not a "regular dealer."

2. The purpose is unlawful in this: It is to impoverish every dealer that does not come within their definition of "regular" and that shall come into competition with them. In the words of the secretary: "He could then sell to any one and we would have no way of reaching him." In this way they effectually "reach him."

8. They restrict the freedom of others, whether members or not, to sell to whom they please. It is not the voluntary act of wholesalers that has injured plaintiffs, but a conspiracy of relatives to monopolize the trade.

Mr. Andrew Anderson, for appellees:

The lumber dealers of the state of Indiana are free men; as citizens of a free state the right to trade and traffic as they please is secured to them by our constitution and laws, and the legislature having never attempted to restrict such rights, it is too late to ask the courts of this state to impose on the business of those dealers bonds and shackles unknown to any court of law or equity.

The retail lumber dealers of the state of Indiana may unite as well as two individuals, and agree that they will purchase no lumber of any citizen of Michigan or Illinois of any Indian or African, of any manufacturer who employs Mongolian help or non-union help, of any firm who sell lumber through the instrumentality of drummers or brokers or auctioneers, or of any red-headed man or gray-headed man, or any class or set of men having any peculiarity in their personal appearance or their business modes, simply for the reason that they are under no legal obligation to deal with such men or class of men.

Payne v. Western & A. R. Co. 18 Lea, 507, 49 Am. Rep. 666.

The question then is, Is an act not unlawful rendered actionable to one suffering injury therefrom, because it is wickedly and maliciously committed in pursuance of a conspiracy to do the injury suffered? Does one render himself liable in damages for wickedly and maliciously exercising his rights or announcing his intention of so doing, if thereby he injures another?

It is unreasonable that an action should be maintained for causing hurt from mere wicked motives and thus violating a moral law if the actor is only exercising his undoubted right of using his own for himself and denying others all privilege in it. This the law does not punish.

It is a part of every man's civil rights that he be at liberty to refuse business relations with any person whomsoever; whether the refusal rests upon reason, or is the result of a whim, caprice, prejudice, or malice. His reasons are to the public or to third persons of no legal concern.

Cooley, Torts, p. 278; Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346; Bowen v. Matheeson, 14 Allen, 499.

It is necessary to show a substantial injury, for "substantial and positive injury must always appear to the satisfaction of the court of equity before it will grant an injunction."

1 High, Inj. §810, 22.

Can an injunction be allowed in this court simply because, for some reason or other, Newton Jackson could deal a little more profitably with the West Michigan Lumber Company than with other concerns, when the amount of extra profit is not shown and might not have been $10 a year.

Hall v. Rood, 40 Mich. 46, 29 Am. Rep. 528.

If it had been found by the court that Mr. Jackson had been authorized by the West Michigan Lumber Company, as its agent and broker, to sell lumber to the Studebaker Brothers Manufacturing Company, and that, as the agent of the West Michigan Lumber Company, Mr. Jackson had made a proposition to the Studebaker Brothers Manufacturing Company to sell to them two million feet of lumber, and that the Studebakers were ready and willing to take it at the price offered, and that the commission which the West Michigan Lumber Company was ready to pay and would have paid, was $500, and that in consequence of rules of the association and of having paid the penalty mentioned, the West Michigan Lumber Company then refused to sell through Mr. Jackson, and Jackson surrendered his right to act as their agent and complete the sale, then a cause of action might have been stated. But these material facts were not stated, and not being stated, under the well-settled rules of this court in regard to special findings, we insist that there is nothing in this finding to justify the recovery.

Dailey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action brought by the appellants against the appellees for damages, and for relief by injunction, on the ground that the defendants had entered into an unlawful combination for the purpose of injuring the appellees in their business, and that, in consequence thereof, plaintiffs had suffered actual damage, and were threatened with great loss in their business.

By request of the parties, the court below made a special finding of the facts and stated its conclusion of the law thereon, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. There was no motion for a new trial, and the only questions presented by the record are these: First, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction; second, if not entitled to an injunction, are they entitled to recover damages?

It appears from the special finding that the complainants are husband and wife. Appellant, Newton Jackson, had no means, but his wife had some property of her own. For several years prior to the commencement of this suit, the husband had been engaged in the business of buying and selling lumber, dealing with his wife's means and also on commission, acting as a broker without owning the lumber himself. The business was managed by Jackson in his own name. He occasionally affixed the word "agent" to his transactions. He employed from $3,000 to $4,000 of his wife's money, but it was not generally known that he was acting as agent for his wife. The defendants were partners in the business of selling lumber at retail at South Bend, Indiana, and for a number of years kept a lumber yard at that place. Prior to 1889, the defendants, and about one hundred and fifty other retail dealers in lumber organized an association, under the style name of "The Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Indiana," and adopted a constitution and by-laws for its government. The Constitution declares that the organization was formed "to protect its members against sales by wholesale dealers and manufacturers to consumers."

We have for convenience taken so much of the special finding as we deemed material to the questions involved.

That the plaintiffs, Newton Jackson and Martha E. Jackson, are husband and wife; that Newton Jackson has no means; that his wife has means of her own; and for the past three (3) years Newton Jackson has been engaged in the business of buying and selling lumber. That he has bought and sold lumber, dealing with his wife's means, and also on commission, by negotiating sales as agent of a wholesale dealer or manufacturer, and receiving a commission therefor, without owing the lumber himself. That the arrangement between plaintiffs was that the husband supported himself and family from his earnings and profits, and if any surplus remained, it was the property of his wife.

That the business was managed solely by Newton Jackson, in his own name, he occasionally using the word "Agent" in connection with his own name, and using from $3,000 to $4,000 of his wife's means; but defendants had no knowledge that he was acting as agent for his wife.

That plaintiffs have kept no lumber yard or stock on hand in South Bend, Indiana, where they have done business for the past three (3) years.

That the defendants are partners, retail dealers in lumber, in South Bend, Ind., and have kept a lumber yard and stock on hand. That prior to 1889, the defendants and other retail dealers in lumber in Indiana, about one hundred and fifty (150) in number, associated themselves together into an association known and designated as the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Indiana, and agreed to a constitution and by-laws for their government, which constitution and by-laws are in these words:

CONSTITUTION.

Article I.

Title.

The title of this organization shall be, "The Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of the State of Indiana," and it shall have for its object the protection of its members against sales by wholesale dealers and manufacturers to consumers, and the giving of such other protection as may be within the limits of co-operative association.

Article II.

Conditions of Membership.

Any person who may be regularly in the retail lumber trade, owing or operating a lumber yard, in which a general assortment of stock in kind and quantity commensurate with the demands of the community where located is kept for sale, may become a member of this association by subscribing to the constitution and paying the annual dues prescribed by the by-laws.

Article VII.

When Membership Shall Cease.

When any member of firm shall cease to keep a regular assortment of lumber, as set forth in article 2, he or they shall cease to be members of this association. . . .

Article IX.

Any manufacturer or wholesale dealer may become an honorary member of this association, with all privileges and benefits save that of voting, upon payment of the annual dues. Provided, that all such members who may violate the rules thereof shall be immediately dropped from the rolls.

Article X.

Any manufacturer or wholesale dealer may become an honorary member of this association, with all the privileges and benefits save that of voting upon payment of the annual dues.

Section 5. Members are entitled to the protection of this association in the towns in which their yards are situated, and the adjacent territory, which must be designated in the application for membership, and written in the membership certificate. If protection is wanted for more than one point (where applicant owns or operates a yard) separate memberships must be taken. . . .

Relations with Wholesalers.

Section 8. Whenever, and as often as any manufacturer or wholesale dealer, or their agents, shall sell lumber, sash, doors, or 23 L. R. A.

blinds to any person not a regular dealer, as contemplated by article 11 of the constitution of the association, any member doing business in the town to which such shipment was made, may notify the shipper, manufacturer, or wholesale dealer who made such shipment, that he has a claim against them for such shipment. If the parties cannot adjust the claim, it shall be the duty of the member to notify the secretary of the facts in the case, who shall refer the case to the executive committee, whose duty it shall be to hear both sides of the question and determine the claim. If the wholesaler or manufacturer refuses to abide by the decision of the executive committee, it shall be the duty of the secretary to notify the members of this association of the name of such wholesaler or manufacturer. It shall also be the duty of the members to no longer patronize said wholesaler or manufacturer. If any member continues to deal with such dealer or manufacturer, he shall be expelled from the association. If the member refuses to abide by the decision of the executive committee, his name shall be stricken from the membership of the association. It is provided that nothing in this section shall be so construed as to entitle members to make complaint on account of lumber sold to manufacturers, and actually used in articles manufactured, nor to railroads or transportation companies, nor in case of sash, doors or blinds, to hardware merchants who keep a regular stock of such goods. . . .

Powers of Executive Committee.

Section 7. The president and secretary, ex officio, are constituted the executive committee of his association. In all matters relating to claims made by this association, between the sessions of the board of directors, the said committee shall have the same powers as those conferred upon the said board of directors. That upon request of the secretary, said committee shall convene to determine and adjudicate to such matters as are not clearly defined by the constitution and by-laws, or such other questions as he deems of great importance to the association. Any wholesaler not satisfied with the decisions of the secretary in cases in which demands are made upon him, may appeal to the executive committee, whose decision shall be final. . . .

That said constitution and by-laws were published in May, 1888, and 1890, together with lists of active members, wholesale members, and honorary members, said active members appearing to be doing business in Indiana, and wholesale and honorary members appearing to be doing business in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan and other states.

That such publications were made in pamphlet form, and a copy of each such pamphlet was sent to every member of the association, and to all retail dealers in Indiana, and to all wholesalers and manufacturers of lumber in the United States, a list of whose names and addresses was in the possession of the secretary of said Retail Lumber Dealers' Association.

That the usual course of proceedings of such association was in case of complaint by any member against a wholesale dealer for a violation of its rules, that a hearing was had, and the person or firm charged was heard before a committee of said association, and if a penalty was assessed by such committee, and such penalty was not paid, a notice was to be sent to each member of the association upon a blank kept to be used for that purpose, which blank embraces section 3 of the foregoing by-laws, and each member is notified that . . . dealer of . . . town, wholesaler, has sold a bill of lumber to some certain party who is not a regular dealer as contemplated and refuses to adjust the same.

That said association has in this manner adjusted all claims that had come before it. That the objects of said association have thus far been made effective, and it is still in full force, and there is no probability of its discontinuance at present.

That the defendants, Stanfield and Dresden have been members of said association for the past three years, and the defendant Stanfield became a director of said association, at its December meeting in 1889, for a term of two years, and is still such director.

That in October, 1889, the Birdsell Manufacturing Company, of South Bend, Indiana, desired to purchase a large bill of lumber, and Newton Jackson and the defendants were competitors in the sale of such lumber, and said Jackson was successful in making such sale, and acting as a broker bought such bill of lumber of the West Michigan Lumber Company, of Woodville, Michigan, and the said bill of lumber was shipped directly by the West Michigan Lumber Company to said Birdsell Manufacturing Company, and a commission on such sale was paid by said West Michigan Lumber Company to Newton Jackson.

That defendants thereupon wrote and sent to said West Michigan Lumber Company the following letter:

South Bend, Ind. Oct. 28th, 1889.
West Michigan Lumber Co. Woodville,
Mich.

Gentlemen: We have bought lumber of your house for a number of years past, and considered you an honorable, upright company, doing a strictly wholesale business, but recently we are informed that you have infringed upon the laws of the Lumberman's Association of the state of Indiana, by selling to a consumer in this city a large bill of lumber, thus coming in competition with ourselves in the retail trade. We trust that you can satisfactorily explain this matter, and we will not be obliged to lay it before the state board. We refer to the Birdsell bill.

Yours, etc.
Dresden & Stanfield.

To which letter the West Michigan Lumber Company sent the following answer:

Woodville, Mich. Oct. 31st, 1889.
Dresden & Stanfield, South Bend, Ind.

Gentlemen: Replying to your letter of the 28th, the bill to which you refer was sold through a regular dealer in your city, and he was paid his commission.

Yours truly,
West Michigan Lumber Co.

To which letter defendants replied as follows:

South Bend, Ind. Nov. 5th, 1889.
West Michigan Lumber Co. Woodville,
Mich.

Gentlemen: Your favor of October 31st received. Contents noted. We are credibly informed that your house sold the Birdsell bill to Newton Jackson of this city. According to article II of the constitution of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Indiana, Newton Jackson is not a regular dealer. There is and has been for the past year "too" much encroaching by wholesalers upon the "the" natural and acquired rights of retailers; consequently you should not think us impertinent upon insisting that you give us the name of the regular dealer to whom you sold the bill for Birdsell's use. We are determined to sift this matter to the bottom.

Yours, etc.
Dresden & Stanfield.

And said West Michigan Lumber Company replied as follows:

Woodville, Mich. Nov. 8th, 1890.
Messrs. Dresden & Stanfield, South Bend,
Ind.

Gentlemen: Replying to your letter of the 5th, we sold the bill mentioned through Mr. N. Jackson. As he bought the lumber from us, we supposed he was a regular dealer.

We do not intend to sell except through a regular dealer, and so supposed when the order was accepted.

Yours truly,
West Michigan Lumber Company.

And then, on November 18th, the defendants sent the following letter to said West Michigan Lumber Co.:

South Bend, Ind. Nov. 18th, 1889.
West Michigan Lumber Co., Woodville,
Mich.

Gentlemen: Yours of the 8th is before us. Ignorance of the law is no justification. N. Jackson has not now, nor has he had for at least three years either office or yard in South Bend. He has been and is a notorious scalper.

We demand of you one hundred dollars ($100.00) on account of the Birdsell bill. If you refuse the demand, we shall refer our claim to Retail Dealers' Association of Indiana, of which you are honorary members, and discover if it has a power in the land, or merely the hollow mockery of a resounding name.

Yours, etc.
Dresden & Stanfield.

That the West Michigan Lumber Company thereupon sent the following letter to defendants:

Woodville, 11-19-'89.
Dresden & Stanfield, South Bend, Ind.
Gentlemen: Yours of the 18th inst. at hand. In regard to that demand for one hundred dollars ($100.00) on account of Birdsell Mfg. Co's bill, we shall have to respectfully decline for that reason. If you, or the dealers of South Bend, sold the Birdsell Manufacturing Company one half, or most of the white pine lumber they bought, it would be different; but they write that they bought from the wholesale trade over one million feet per year, and did not buy over five thousand feet from the concerns there. Now, it does not look to us that you should have any claim against this company. If you have, there are others in the same fix as us, and you should make claim on all. We have always been very particular not to interfere with the retail trade, and in the past ten years have had no complaint.

Hoping you will look into the matter fully before making complaint, I am

Yours truly,

E. B. Wright, President.

That these defendants wrote and sent the following letter to W. B. Allen, Secretary of said association at Indianapolis, Ind.:

South Bend, Ind. Nov. 22, 1889.

To the Executive Committee of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Indiana:

Gentlemen: We herewith enclose correspondence, and submit to you our claim against the West Michigan Lumber Company, of Woodville, Michigan. About two months ago, the Birdsell Manufacturing Company, of South Bend, wishing to enlarge their factory, gave us a bill of material to figure on, consisting of joists, timbers, flooring and boards, amounting to 326 M feet, with privilege of increasing 400 M feet, which was afterwards done. The West Michigan Lumber Company got the contract through Newton Jackson, a man without an office or yard, who the railroad companies would not trust one day for freight, really a buyer for the Birdsell Manufacturing Company. The West Michigan Lumber Company shipped direct to Birdsell's. Mr. Wright in his favor of the 19th, claim that the Birdsell's purchased a million feet of lumber every year of the wholesalers, and not five M feet of the retailers; but he fails to state that this million feet is for manufacturing wagons and clover hullers. There are no more complete stocks carried in Indiana outside of Indianapolis than are ours. There are two other yards in our city nearly as complete. Why do buyers go away from here to buy? Because they can get cheaper from wholesalers than from home concerns, in this case, the West Michigan Lumber Company undoubtedly sold the lumber to the consumers cheaper than they quoted it to us. We, and our predecessors in this location have for years done business with the West Michigan, the last purchase slightly over two months ago. We have never had any trouble, always finding them honorable and upright. We entertain no malice against the company, but we do insist that as members of the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association, we are entitled to our claim against the West Michigan Lumber Company, who are honorary members of the same association, and if there is any strength in the association we will be righted. If the association cannot enforce its laws, the sooner it gives up the ghost the better.

Yours truly,
Dresden & Stanfield.

That thereafter a hearing of such claim was had before a committee of said association at Indianapolis, in December, 1889, and said committee found that the said claim of defendants against the West Michigan Lumber Company was valid.

And on February 20th, 1890, W. B. Allen, secretary of the association, wrote and sent the following letter to said West Michigan Lumber Company:

"Indianapolis, Ind. Feb. 20th, 1890.

W. B. Wright, Esq., Pres't West Michigan Lumber Co.

Dear Sir: January 27th I wrote your Mr. J. S. Wright that the final decision in regard to South Bend matter was that claim of Dresden & Stanfield is valid, and they are entitled to redress. I wrote J. S. Wright, as he seemed to have the settlement of the claim in his hands, but as I have had no reply since I wrote him, will you kindly advise me what your final answer is in regard to this?

I enclose copy of letter of January 27th.

Yours truly,

W. B. Allen, Secretary."

And on April 14th, 1890, said West Michigan Lumber Company wrote and sent the following letter to said secretary:

Woodville, Mich. April 14th, 1890.

W. B. Allen, Esq., Sec'y Retail Lumber Dealers' Association Indianapolis, Ind.

Dear Sir:—Your favor of the 10th at hand. Please make a full statement of the claim and demand of Dresden & Stanfield, also a statement that the claim was allowed by the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association on the grounds that the West Michigan Lumber Company could sell lumber direct to the Birdsell Mfg. Co., but when sold through N. Jackson they must pay damages, which we believe is correct.

Yours truly,

West Michigan Lumber Co.

—To which said secretary replied as follows:

Indianapolis, Ind. April 17, 1890.

West Michigan Lumber Co., Woodville.

Gentlemen: In regard to complaint of Dresden and Stanfield, would say that above named firm filed a complaint against your company for selling lumber to party or parties that are not dealers, or who are entitled to buy lumber of a wholesaler or manufacturer. This claim was investigated by the executive board of Retail Lumber Dealers' Association. Your firm was allowed representation during the investigation; your letters also admitted the sale, and while we thought and still think it was your intention to make the sale through a bona fide dealer, still the facts go to prove, and are admitted by yourself that it was not sold through a regular dealer; and the board had no alternative but to find in accordance with the rules of the association.

The Birdsell Mfg. Co. had nothing to do with this case, and we have not been called on to decide whether you have the right to sell Birdsell Mfg. Co., or not. The plain facts are, you sold this bill to N. Jackson, which was so stated in your own correspondence. Mr. Jackson is not a lumber dealer, as defined by our rules, namely, a person or firm who carry a stock adequate to the market where he or they are located. We submit to your own judgment that we are forced to deny Mr. Jackson's right to buy lumber of any one that he pleases, and throw down all the bars, as he could then sell to any one, and we would have no way of reaching him. Mr. Jackson's class is one that does more injury to the yards of this country than any that we have to deal with.

Very truly,
W. B. Allen, Secretary.

That therefore, on April 30th, 1890, the West Michigan Lumber Company sent its draft for one hundred ($100.00) dollars to said Retail Lumber Dealers' Association of Indiana, and said sum was by said association passed over to defendants in payment of said claim against the West Michigan Lumber Company, which sum was paid and received as a penalty for a violation of the rules of said association in the sale of the Birdsell bill of lumber through N. Jackson.

That therefore, the said West Michigan Lumber Company, and Morton, Lewis & Co., of Grand Rapids, Michigan, refused to sell lumber to said Newton Jackson for the reason that said West Michigan Lumber Company, and said Morton, Lewis & Co., who were wholesale dealers and manufacturers of lumber, were afraid of penalty for violation of the rules of said association.

That said Newton Jackson made an offer to the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company of South Bend, to sell two million feet of lumber to said company, which offer was based on the price lists of said West Michigan Lumber Company, and said Jackson could not obtain said lumber of any other firm as cheaply and conveniently as from said West Michigan Lumber Company. That his commission therein would have been five hundred dollars ($500). That the offer of said Jackson was accepted by said Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co., but the West Michigan Lumber Company refused to sell to or through said Jackson by reason of the rules of said association, and on account of having paid said penalty, and said Jackson thereupon did not contract with said Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co., but turned over such sale to said West Michigan Lumber Company, and allowed said company to make such sale without paying any commission to him.

That the market from which dealers in South Bend, Indiana, can best and most cheaply buy lumber of wholesalers and manufacturers to resell to consumers is in the state of Michigan and said Jackson could most cheaply and profitably buy lumber and sell on commission by dealing with wholesale dealers in Michigan, and most cheaply and profitably buy of the West Michigan Lumber Company to resell and to resell on commission.

That said Newton Jackson thereafter caused lumber to be purchased for his customers in the name of Smith and Jackson, a firm of regular dealers, as defined by said association, in South Bend, and paid to Smith and Jackson a share of his commission for the use of their names by an agreement with them, and paid to them for that purpose the sum of $83, which sum was a fair charge for the use of their names.

That by reason of the refusal of the said West Michigan Lumber Company to sell him lumber to fill an existing contract, said Jackson went to Manistee, Michigan, to purchase lumber, and expended in railroad fare and freight ($82) more than it would have cost him had the West Michigan Lumber Company not refused to sell to him. That except for such refusal, the West Michigan Lumber Company could have sold him lumber to fill such contract.

That during the year 1890, plaintiff's business has decreased. That before the commencement of this suit, plaintiffs requested of defendants to permit plaintiffs to do business as heretofore and to abandon their position in this matter, and not to complain to said association of sales made to plaintiffs, but defendants refused to, and declared their intention to adhere to their position and that they intend to enforce the rules and by-laws of said association.

That defendants and the West Michigan Lumber Company, prior to and at the time of the happening of the matters in controversy aforesaid, were members of said association, defendants as active members, said company as an honorary member, and both defendants and said West Michigan Lumber Company knew its purposes and objects.

We infer from article 2 of the constitution, that "any person, in the retail lumber trade, owning and operating a lumber yard in which a general assortment of stock in kind and quantity commensurate with the demands of the community where located is kept for sale, is a regular dealer." The regular dealer, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the by-laws, when his territory is encroached upon by a wholesale dealer or manufacturer, is authorized to notify the person so offending that he has a claim against him for such sale or shipment, and to make a demand therefor. If the parties cannot adjust it, it is made the duty of the member to notify the secretary of the facts. In the case, who shall refer the matter to the executive committee, whose duty it is to hear the grievances and determine the claim. If the wholesaler or manufacturer ignores the decision of the committee, it is the duty of the secretary to notify the members of the association of the name of the person so offending and of the members to no longer patronize him. If they continue to deal with the offender, they shall be expelled from the association, and if any member refuses to abide by the decision of the executive committee, his name is to be stricken from the membership of the society.

The facts found by the court disclose that the appellees as members of the combination complained of availed themselves of the means provided for in section 8 to destroy the business of the appellants as brokers in lumber, because they were not retail dealers within the definition of the term, and that they effectuated their purpose. The special findings of fact clearly show it to be a compact to suppress the competition of those dealers who did not own yards, with an adequate stock on hand, by driving them out of business. By this plan they reach the wholesale dealer and compel him to pay an arbitrary penalty, under a threat of financial injury, and they force him to assist in ruining the dealer who does not own a yard. There is such an element of coercion and intimidation in the by-law under consideration, towards the wholesale dealers, manufacturers and even the members of the society, and such provision made for penalties and forfeitures against them, that it will not do to say it was optional with the wholesale dealer whether it would pay the demand or not, or that it was left to the discretion or choice of the members to either trade with the wholesaler or abandon the association. A conspiracy formed, and intended directly or indirectly to prevent the carrying on of any legal business, or to injure the business of any one by wrongfully preventing those who would be customers from buying anything from the representatives of such business, by threats or intimidation, is in restraint of trade and unlawful. Under a statute of Massachusetts, a combination to restrain trade so as to impoverish a man in his business is indictable. 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 608, citing note 3. On the same page it is said: "The labor and skill of the workman, the plant of the manufacturer, and the equipment of the farmer are, in an equal sense, property. Every man has a right to employ his talents, industry, and capital as he pleases, free from the dictation of others; and if two or more persons combine to coerce his choice in this behalf, it is a criminal conspiracy, whether the means employed are actual violence, or a species of intimidation that works upon the mind. While the law accords this liberty to one, it accords a like liberty to another, and all are bound to use and enjoy their own liberties and privileges with regard to those of their neighbors."

In People v. Petheram, 64 Mich. 252, it is said: "No one is authorized to unlawfully destroy or hinder the lawful business of another for the purpose of helping himself."

In Hawkins' P. C. chap. 72, § 2, it is laid down that, "all confederacies whatsoever wrongfully to prejudice a third person, are highly criminal at common law." The same proposition in various forms of expression is declared in a long list of authorities cited in 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 609, so that, as the author states it: "We are compelled to forsake the literature of doubt, and to cleave unto that of authority." It is held in State v. Stewart, 59 Vt. 273, 59 Am. Rep. 710, that, "such conspiracies may give the individual directly affected by them a private right of action for damages."

In Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555-564, 23 I. R. A.

it is said that, "every one has a right to enjoy the fruits and advantages of his own enterprise, industry, skill, and credit. He has no right to be protected against competition, but he has a right to be free from malicious and wanton interference, disturbance, or annoyance. If disturbance or loss come as a result of competition or the exercise of the like rights by others, it is damnum absque injuria. In Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 14, 8 Am. Rep. 287, it is said: "Every man has a right to determine what branch of business he will pursue, and to make his own contracts with whom he pleases and on the best terms he can." "He may refuse to deal with any man or class of men. And it is no crime for any number of persons, without any unlawful object in view, to associate themselves together and agree that they will not work for or deal with certain men or classes of men, or work under a certain price, or without certain conditions." And in Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111, 134, 38 Am. Dec. 346, Shaw, Ch. J., declares that the legality of such association will depend upon the means to be used for the accomplishment of its objects and whether they be innocent or otherwise. In More v. Bennett, 140 Ill. 69, 15 L. R. A. 361, the court held that a combination or conspiracy entered into by a stenographic association, by which the prices of reporting legal proceedings by short-hand are to be kept up by the prevention of competition, although such association may embrace but a comparatively small part of the reporters engaged in the business, but which is open for the admission of all reporters who may be induced to join, and by which a schedule of prices is fixed, and by which any member violating its rules as to prices is subject to a fine, is void, as tending to prevent a free and unrestricted competition in business.

In Lovejoy v. Michels, 88 Mich. 15, 18 L. R. A. 770, the court held that where the price of goods is not agreed upon at the time of the sale, the law implies an understanding to pay what the commodity is reasonably worth; "that a price arbitrarily fixed by a combination of manufacturers or dealers is not competent evidence to show a reasonable price for the goods sold by the members of the combination; that such combinations are intended to stifle competition, which is a stimulus of commercial transactions, and to substitute that of unconscionable gain, whereby the participants become enriched at the expense of the consumer, beyond what he ought to pay under a healthy spirit of competition in the business community. The effect of such combinations is the same as that in restraint of trade, and public policy places its reprobation alike upon both. Combinations to control prices are against public policy and void, because they have a mischievous tendency, and are injurious to the best interests of the state, which require that all legitimate business shall be open to competition; that the current price of commodities shall be controlled by the law of supply and demand; that the laws of commerce shall flow in their accustomed channels, and not be diverted by combinations to control prices fixed by the arbitrary decision of interested parties."

In Texas Standard Cotton Oil Co. v. Adoue, 83 Tex. 660, 15 L. R. A. 598, the court held that, "every producer or vendor of" commodities "has the right to use all legitimate efforts to obtain the best price for the articles in which he deals. But when he endeavors to artificially enhance prices by suppressing or keeping out of the market the products of others, and to accomplish that purpose by means of contracts binding them to withhold their supply, such arrangements are even more pernicious than combinations not to sell under an agreed price. Combinations of that character have been held to be against public policy and illegal. If they should be sustained, the prices of articles of pure necessity, such as coal, flour, or other industrial commodities, might be artificially raised to a ruinous extent, far exceeding any naturally resulting from the proportion between supply and demand."

In Greenhood on Public Policy, 651, the rule is thus stated: "They may combine for the purpose of obtaining a benefit for themselves which by law they can claim. But a combination for the purpose of injuring another is a combination of a different nature, directed personally against the party to be injured and the law allowing them to combine for the purpose of obtaining a lawful benefit to themselves gives no sanction to combinations which have for their immediate purpose the hurt of another."

In Dela v. Winfree, 80 Tex. 400, the defendants were wholesale dealers in slaughtered meats, and combined to refuse to sell meat to the plaintiff, a butcher. This was not sufficient, but the petition also alleged that the defendants also induced another dealer in slaughtered meat to likewise refuse to sell to the plaintiff. It was held that such interference with his business was a cause of action and it was error to sustain a demurrer to the petition. In Murray v. McGarigle, 69 Wis. 488, the complaint alleged a conspiracy to control the coal trade in Milwaukee, Wis., and as a result an injury to plaintiff in his business and reputation. The complaint is set out in full and held good for civil damages. In Buffalo Lubricating Oil Co. v. Standard Oil Co. 106 N. Y. 669, the latter threatened plaintiff's customers with suits for infringement of its patents, depreciated its oil, etc. The object was to drive plaintiff out of business. It was held that the Standard Oil Company was liable for damages. The great weight of authority supports the doctrine that where the policy pursued against a trade or business is of a menacing character, calculated to destroy or injure the business of the person so engaged, either by threats or intimidation, it becomes unlawful, and the person inflicting the wrong is amenable to the injured party in a civil action for damages therefor. It is not a mere passive, let alone policy, a withdrawal of all business relations, intercourse and fellowship that creates the liability but the threats and intimidation shown in the complaint. The learned counsel for the appellees, in his very able brief, contends that the plaintiffs were only incidentally injured by the acts of the defendants in enforcing a penalty of $100 against the West Michigan Lumber Company. It will be observed that the Retail Lumber Dealers' Association invites wholesalers to become honorary members, and that said Lumber Company is an honorary member. But the rules of the association do not affect alone members active and honorary. They extend to, and reach any wholesale dealer in the United States with whom the threat to withdraw the trade of one hundred and fifty retail dealers can have weight. It is shown in the finding that Michigan is the source from which most of the lumber in Northern Indiana is procured, and that the rules of the association are published in pamphlet form and sent to every wholesale dealer in the United States. The retail dealers who organized the association in question are members of the various cities and towns where they are located. They have lumber yards, containing stock in quantity and quality suited to and commensurate with the wants of the consumers in their several localities. These gentlemen are prominent, wealthy and influential citizens of our state, whose power from the elevated stations they occupy, so exercised, enable them to control the wholesale dealers of the United States against the agents and brokers within their own territory, and effectually drive them out of business. It is idle to say that the victim of such a combination is only "incidentally" affected thereby. The object of the association and the result attained is a monopoly of the trade by owners of yards and the broker is simply ignored by the wholesale dealers. It is not in point to cite cases where men voluntarily agree to observe rules adopted by themselves. This is no voluntary affair of the wholesale dealers. It is not even a combination of wholesalers. They may and do sometimes become honorary members so as to keep within touch of the retail dealers and secure trade. It is, as stated, an association of retailers to restrict the liberty of wholesalers to sell to consumers and brokers and the wholesalers must obey or lose their trade. It is found as a fact that the market in which the plaintiffs could most profitably buy was in Michigan. Freight and railroad facilities necessarily limited the field. It is also found that the West Michigan Lumber Company is the dealer that made the plaintiff's trade most profitable, and that for fear of the penalties this company and another refused to deal with them. The West Michigan Lumber Company was willing and anxious to sell to the plaintiffs until fined by the defendants and mulcted in the sum of one hundred dollars when it refused to make further sales for the reason that it was afraid of the penalties. Such rules contravene the rights of non-members to earn their living by fair competition. The case of Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Hollis, decided by the supreme court of Minnesota, July 20th, 1893, which will be found in vol. 55, N. W. Rep. p. 1119, is cited by appellees as sustaining the decision of the lower court. It was a case in which a large number of lumber dealers had formed an association, very similar in its character to the one in the case at bar. The plaintiff had made a sale of lumber directly to a consumer and the secretary made a demand upon him for the penalty as provided in section 8 of the by-laws. The plaintiff delayed and evaded payment so long that defendants threatened to send all the members of the association the lists of notices provided for by section 6 of the by-laws, informing them that the plaintiff refused to comply with the rules of the association, and was no longer in sympathy with it. Thereupon the plaintiff commenced his action for a permanent injunction, and obtained ex parte a temporary one, enjoining the defendants from issuing these notices, etc. The appeal was from an order refusing to dissolve the same. On appeal, the court found that the action would not lie, and that the injunction should be dissolved, although the defendants were demanding and seeking to recover the penalty by threats, and if these notices should become issued, the members of the association would thereafter refuse to deal with the plaintiff; thereby resulting in loss to it of gains and profits. The opinion proceeds upon the theory that there was no element of coercion or intimidation in the acts complained of, but we think the decision in this respect is in conflict with approved authority and is bad as a precedent. It appears from the facts found by the court that after the payment of the $100 fine so assessed, the appellant, Newton Jackson, made an offer to the Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Co. of South Bend to sell said company two million feet of lumber, which offer was based on the price list of the West Michigan Lumber Company, that his commission thereon would have been $500; that the offer of said Jackson was accepted by the Studebaker Brothers Manufacturing Co., but the West Michigan Lumber Company refused to sell to or through Jackson by reason of the rules of said association, and on account of having paid said penalty, and said Jackson thereupon did not contract with said Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company, but turned over such sale to the West Michigan Lumber Company, and allowed it to make such sale without paying any commission to him. That said Newton Jackson thereafter caused lumber to be purchased for his customers in the name of Smith and Jackson, a firm of regular dealers as defined by the association, in South Bend, and paid to them $88 of his commission for the use of their name, which was a reasonable and fair charge therefor. That by reason of the refusal of the said West Michigan Lumber Company to sell him lumber to fill an existing contract, said Jackson went to Manistee, Michigan, to purchase lumber, and expended in railroad fare and freight $32 more than it would have cost him had said West Michigan Lumber Company not refused to sell to him; that except for such refusal, the West Michigan Lumber Company could have sold him lumber to fill such contract. That during the year 1890, plaintiff's business had decreased, and before the commencement of this suit, plaintiffs requested defendants to permit them to do business as heretofore, and to abandon their position in this matter, and not complain to the association of sales made to plaintiffs, but defendants refused to do so, and declared their intention to adhere to their position, and that they intended to enforce the rules and by-laws of said association.

Without further extending this opinion, we only need to say that if it had not been for the wrongful acts of the appellees, the plaintiffs would have made $588 in profits upon contracts of which they were deprived. They are entitled as compensation to the amount of damages sustained, which is measured by the loss actually incurred. If there was any circumstance to be considered in mitigation of damages, it was incumbent on the defendants to show that fact; but as the record is silent on this question, we must infer that one existed. We think the claim for expenses to Manistee and return too remote to be considered in this case.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to restate conclusions of law and render judgment upon the special findings in favor of the appellants for five hundred and eighty-three dollars, and with the further instruction to render a judgment perpetually enjoining the defendants from in any way, other than fair, open competition, interfering with the plaintiffs in their business, and from demanding a penalty or making a claim against any one, under the by-laws of said association, who may sell to the plaintiffs, or through them to a consumer.

Howard, Ch. J., took no part in this decision.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on April 6, 1894, the following opinion was handed down by Dailey, J.:

The learned counsel for the appellees asks that a rehearing be granted for the reason that the conclusion of the court as rendered in its opinion should be modified so far as it relates to the assessment of the damages. As suggested, the main subject discussed by counsel on both sides and considered by the court in its opinion was whether or not the appellants were entitled to an injunction. Counsel does not seek a change in the decision as to the leading question involved, but insists there is nothing in the special findings of facts which would justify a judgment in favor of the appellants for the sum of $500 commissions claimed to be due Newton Jackson by reason of an attempted sale of lumber by him to the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company. It is found and set forth in the original opinion that Newton Jackson made an offer to said company to sell them 2,000,000 feet of lumber, which offer was based on the price lists of the West Michigan Lumber Company; that said Jackson could not obtain said lumber of any other firm as cheaply and conveniently as from the firm last named; that his commission thereon would have been $500; that the offer of said Jackson was accepted by the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company, but said West Michigan Lumber Company refused to sell to or through said Jackson, by reason of the rules of the association, and on account of having paid a penalty of $100; and thereupon said Jackson did not contract, but turned over said sale to the West Michigan Lumber Company, and allowed the company to make the sale without paying any commission to him. In commenting on this finding, counsel says: "The substance of the first part of this finding is that Jackson offered to sell to the Studebakers two million feet of lumber. It does not show what price he was to pay the lumber company, or what price the Studebakers were to pay him, or what profits he would have made had the proposed contract been carried out. If, as found by the court, he made a straight agreement to sell to the Studebakers a certain amount of lumber, he could not have been entitled to any commission. No dealer can make a commission when he is trading on his own account. If he buys for one price and sells for a higher price, he may make a profit, but certainly not a commission. The word 'commission,' as we understand it, means 'a brokerage or allowance made to a factor or agent for the transacting of business for another.' There is nothing in this finding to show that Mr. Jackson was ever acting as agent or broker for the West Michigan Lumber Company, and, not being so found, it must be held that he was not the agent or factor of that company. Unless he was such agent or factor, he could not have a commission, and, not being such agent or factor, he was entitled to none. The finding of the court below must stand as it is written; that is to say, that he himself, on his own account, offered to sell to the Studebakers certain lumber, and it is not found what his profit on the transaction would have been. It may be implied—and very possibly is implied—that if he had made the sale as agent or broker or commission merchant for the West Michigan Lumber Company, then, in such case, he would have been entitled to a commission for his services. But the fatal defect is this: that it is not found that he was, but, on the contrary, it is practically found that he was not, the agent, broker, or commission merchant or factor for the West Michigan Lumber Company. Therefore it matters not what commission he might have made, had he been such commission merchant or broker or factor or agent, and sold the lumber as such agent or broker; for the finding is, as we have stated, that he did not sell the lumber as an agent or broker. That finding, if it means anything, means that he sold the lumber on his own account; that he made a contract for a future delivery; but what his profits would have been on the transaction does not appear."

We think the essential fact found in relation to this matter was that Jackson's commission or profit—no difference by what name it may be called—would have been $500 had not the West Michigan Lumber Company "refused to sell, either to or through him, by reason of the rules of the association, and on account of having paid said penalty." It is 28 L. R. A.

found that Jackson could most cheaply and profitably buy of the West Michigan Lumber Company, and based his order on their prices. Appellees cut off this source of supply, and did all they could to exclude him from the market. It matters not whether the $500 would have been commission or profit. The finding calls it a commission, and says, but for the wrong of the appellees, he would have realized this amount in the transaction.

The naked fact remains that the loss found to have been sustained is so definite and certain as to leave no room for cavil. It is less speculative than the future earnings of a physician or insurance agent, or the profits of a stallion's service, which may constitute the basis of damages. It is urged that the contract between the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company and appellant Newton Jackson is void under the statute of frauds, because the value of the lumber was over $50, and the finding does not show that the offer was accepted in writing. If this be true, it is no concern of the appellees. Parties to contracts and their privies can alone take advantage of the fact that a contract is invalid under the statute of frauds. Many forms of expression by this and other courts illustrate the doctrine that a third person cannot make the statute of frauds available to overthrow a transaction between other persons; that the defense of this statute is purely a personal one, and cannot be made by strangers. Burrow v. Terre Haute & L. R. Co. 107 Ind. 432; Bodkin v. Merit, 102 Ind. 298; Cool v. Peters Box & Lumber Co. 87 Ind. 531; Dixon v. Duke, 85 Ind. 434; Wright v. Jones, 105 Ind. 17; Savage v. Lee, 101 Ind. 515; 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 659, and cases cited. It concerns the remedy alone, and the modern law is well settled that, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, the effect of the statute is not to render the agreement void, but simply to prevent its direct enforcement by the parties, and to refuse damages for its breach. 8 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 658, 659, and cases cited.

Counsel also takes the position that the $500 was unearned commission or profit, and hence not recoverable. In Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. Greene, 77 Ind. 59, one cause for a new trial was excessive damages. The appellant contended that the whole verdict was necessarily made up of profits or gains which the appellees might have received, and was therefore erroneous; but the court says that probable profits which might have been received, not remote or speculative, have often been allowed in proof, not as the measure of damages, but to aid the jury in estimating the damages. The evidence is competent as a guide to aid in the exercise of a proper discretion. Logansport v. Justice, 74 Ind. 378, 39 Am. Rep. 79; Fultz v. Wycoff, 25 Ind. 321; Frenzel v. Miller, 37 Ind. 1, 10 Am. Rep. 62.

As a matter of right and justice and of law we feel that the conclusion of the court allowing the appellants to recover the $500 for profits or commissions should not be set aside.

The petition for a rehearing is overruled.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

R. I. SIMMONS

v.

ATKINSON & LAMPTON CO., Appt.

(69 Miss. 322.)

Filling blanks in a promissory note by the insertion of the words "or bearer" and of the name of the bank after the word "at" constitutes a material alteration which will avoid the note in the hands of an innocent holder.

(April Term, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pike County in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover the amount alleged to be due on certain promissory notes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Price & Sternberger, for appellant:

The holder of a note must show that a material alteration therein was made innocently. Croswell v. Labree, 81 Me. 44; McCauley v. Gordon, 64 Ga. 231, 87 Am. Rep. 68.

To change the place of payment without the maker's consent avoids a note, though in the hands of an innocent purchaser.

Oakey v. Wilcox, 3 How. (Miss.) 380; Charlton v. Reed, 61 Iowa, 166, 47 Am. Rep. 808; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 508.

There was no authority to fill up the blanks 2 Parsons, Cont. 723; Oakey v. Wilcox, supra; Holmes v. Trumper, 22 Mich. 427, 7 Am. Rep. 661; First Nat. Bank of Buffalo v. Wood, 71 N. Y. 405, 27 Am. Rep. 67; Fordyce v. Kosminski, 49 Ark. 40; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 515.

Because of the blanks the notes could not be regarded as incomplete, and inserting the words was beyond the holder's authority.

The appellant had it in his power to prevent the alleged alterations by striking out the blanks in the notes. By his own negligence he is estopped to allege, as against appellees, that the words were improperly inserted. Where one writes an instrument, leaving spaces which can be easily filled without exciting suspicion, and the instrument is altered by inserting appropriate words, he will be liable to a bona fide holder, notwithstanding the alteration.

Appellees having purchased, in the usual course of business, before maturity, the maker ought not to be discharged.

Brown v. Reed and Zimmerman v. Rote, supra.

Cooper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee sued the appellant on two promissory notes of like tenor one of which is set out in the record, and is as follows: "$100.00. Magnolia, Miss., April 30, 1890. September 1, 1890, after date, I promise to pay to the order of Camp & Ames, or bearer, one hundred dollars, at Bank of Summit, Miss. Value received. R. I. Simmons."

The defendant pleaded that the notes had been materially altered after execution by him, in this: that the notes, as executed, were in form as follows:

"$100.00. Magnolia, Miss., April 30, 1890. September 1, 1890, after date, I promise to pay to the order of Camp & Ames —, one hundred dollars, at —. Value received. R. I. Simmons,"—and that they had been altered by the insertion of the words "or bearer" after the words "Camp & Ames," and of the words "Bank of Summit, Miss.," after the word "at."

The plaintiffs replied that they were bona fide purchasers of the notes before their maturity, and that there was nothing upon their face indicating that they had been altered, or sufficient to raise any suspicion that they had; that the added words were written in the same handwriting as the other written parts of the notes, and were written in spaces negligently left by the defendant on the notes when signed by him, and that the alteration was by the forgery of the payees, which was made possible and easy by the negligent act of the defendant in leaving blank spaces in the notes. The defendant demurred to this replication, and his demurrer was overruled. This ruling of the court presents the first and principal error assigned.

The question presented is one upon which there is direct and irreconcilable conflict in the American authorities. Courts and text-writers have, in very nearly equal numbers, ranged themselves upon opposite sides: and it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine which view is sustained by the greater number. It is well settled that if one sign a negotiable instrument, leaving blanks to be filled by the payee, and deliver it to him, such payee is thereby made the agent of the maker, and if he exceeds his authority, and inserts an unauthorized amount, the maker will be bound to an innocent holder. Johnson v. Blusdale, 1 Smedes & M. 17, 40 Am. Dec. 88; Hemphill v. Alabama Bank, 6 Smedes & M. 44; Davis v. Lee, 26 Miss. 505; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 516. The author of the article, "Alteration of Instruments," in Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, states the rule to be that "where one writes out a note or other instrument so as to leave spaces which can easily be filled without exciting suspicion, and such note or other instrument is altered by filling in these spaces, he will have to suffer the consequences of his negligence, and be liable to a bona fide holder for value on the altered instrument." Volume 1, p. 516. Mr. Daniel prefers the rule as thus stated. 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1405. On the other hand, Mr. Randolph says: "It has now, however, become, in America, an established rule that, if the instrument was complete without blanks at the time of its delivery, the fraudulent increase of the amount by taking advantage of a space left without such intention, although it may be negligently, will constitute a material alteration, and operate to discharge the maker." 1 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 187. And this seems to be the opinion of Mr. Bigelow. Bigelow, Estop. 4th ed. 512. The courts of Louisiana, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Alabama, New York, Illinois, and California hold the maker bound on the altered note. Isnard v. Torres, 10 La. Ann. 108; Young v. Leedom, 67 Pa. 851; Zimmerman v. Rote, 75 Pa. 188; Brown v. Reed, 79 Pa. 870, 21 Am. Rep. 75; Blakey v. Johnson, 13 Bush, 197, 26 Am. Rep. 254; Toomer v. Rutland, 57 Ala. 879, 29 Am. Rep. 722; Redlich v. Doll, 54 N. Y. 235, 13 Am. Rep. 573; Yocum v. Smith, 68 Ill. 321, 14 Am. Rep. 120; Visher v. Webster, 8 Cal. 109.

The courts of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Michigan, Iowa, Arkansas, and also New York, have adopted the contrary rule. Goodman v. Eastman, 4 N. H. 455; Greenfield Sav. Bank v. Stowell, 123 Mass. 196; Holmes v. Trumper, 22 Mich. 427, 7 Am. Rep. 661; Knoxville Nat. Bank v. Clark, 51 Iowa, 264, 38 Am. Rep. 129; McGrath v. Clark, 56

N. Y. 84, 15 Am. Rep. 872; Fordyce v. Kominaki, 49 Ark. 40.

The rule declaring liability upon the maker of an instrument thus altered first found expression in Young v. Grote, 4 Bing. 253. In that case a banker, having occasion to be absent, left with his wife some printed checks upon his banker, signed by him in blank, to be filled up by her, and drawn as his business might require. She delivered one of these checks to the clerk to be filled for £50. The clerk filled out the check beginning the word "fifty" with a small letter and in the middle of the blank line left for the same, and showed it to the plaintiff's wife, who directed him to draw the cash. Before presenting it to the banker, this clerk altered the check by inserting before the word "fifty" the words "three hundred and," and then presented it to the banker and drew the larger sum. The plaintiff sued the banker for his balance, and contended that the loss of the £800 should be borne by the banker. Under the circumstances, it was held that the loss was attributable to the negligence of the plaintiff's agent (his wife), and that he could not recover. The English judges have found some difficulty in determining upon what precise principle the decision rests. In Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Charities Trustees, 5 H. L. Cas. 889, the lord chancellor (Cranworth) said: "Now, the case of Young v. Grote went upon the ground (whether correctly arrived at in point of fact is immaterial) that the plaintiff there was estopped from saying that he did not sign the check for £850." In Swan v. North British Australasian Co., 2 Hurlst. & C. 175, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn said: "The case of Young v. Grote, on which so much reliance has been placed, and which is supposed to have established this doctrine of estoppel by reason of negligence, when it comes to be more closely examined, turns out to have been decided without reference to estoppel at all. Neither the counsel, in arguing that case, nor the judges, in deciding it, refer once to the doctrine of estoppel." Lord Cockburn thought that the case really rested upon the principle of avoiding a circuitry of action; that the banker, who was the depository of his customer, while having no right to retain the fund, having no proper voucher for it, would be entitled to recover against the customer for the loss sustained through his negligence, and that this right to a cross action might be availed of in defense.

It seems to be clear that, if an action may be maintained against the maker on the instrument, it must rest upon the theory that it is his instrument, or, though not his in fact, may be so treated by the holder. The mere fact that the holder has been deceived, and sustained injury by the alteration of the instrument, which alteration was made possible by the negligence of the maker, could not give a right of action ex contractu on the instrument. The action would be in tort, or on the case, for the negligence. To make the instrument, as altered, that of the maker, it must be held that the payee, or other party by whom the alteration is made, is his agent,—a proposition which has sometime been advanced or suggested, but which has found but little support in adjudicated cases. Roberts v. Tucker, 16 Q. B. 560.

There is certainly no expectation or intention on the part of the maker of a completed instrument that the person to whom it is delivered shall make any alteration thereof, nor does it ever occur that third persons act with reference to the supposed authority of such person to act as agent of the maker. It certainly would not be held that a negligently drawn instrument constituted the payee the agent of the maker, to change its terms in favor of one to whom such person should exhibit the instrument as the grant of his power, and should profess to act under it. The agency, in these cases, if one exists at all, must be a concealed one unknown and unsuspected by the world. The writing which creates the agency, if exhibited, shows that none exists. It is a valid agency only so long as it is unknown. The ground of the decision of Young v. Grote, given by Lord Cockburn in Swan v. North British Australasian Co., has been accepted by the English courts as the correct one. Halifax Union v. Wheelwright, L. R. 10 Exch. 188, and Swan v. North British Australasian Co., and Bank of Ireland v. Evans' Charities Trustees, have been considered as shaking the authority of Young v. Grote and Bazendale v. Bennett, L. R. 8 Q. B. Div. 525. But, upon whatever ground the liability of the maker is sought to be rested, we are of opinion that none can exist. The maker of a bill of exchange is not bound to act upon the supposition that forgery will be committed merely because an opportunity is afforded by the character of the paper he puts out. In no relation of life do men conduct their affairs as though crime will be committed whenever it may be. It cannot be negligence to do that which can injure no one unless some one else shall commit a felony, and under circumstances in which no duty is imposed not to do the act. A bailee of goods, who negligently exposes them so that they may be stolen, would be liable to the bailor if they are stolen, but this is because he is under duty to the owner not to expose them. But if one negligently keeps his own property, and it is stolen, he does not forfeit his right to reclaim it from a purchaser from the thief, because, as to such person, he is under no duty. So one who issues negotiable paper is under liability only to those who take the contract he has made. He assumes no obligation of another contract, though it may be written on the same paper, and is equally free from liability if the agreement he has made is materially changed; for the agreement, as changed, is no more his than if all its terms were forged.

The judgment is reversed, the demurrer to the replication sustained, and cause remanded.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

John H. RICHARDS, Appt.,

v.

Samuel H. DAY, Exr., etc., of Elizabeth Davis, Deceased, Respnt.

(187 N. Y. 183.)

1. The signer of a blank bond which is filled up thereafter with terms different from those authorized by him is not bound thereby unless he has become estopped as to the holder of the bond to deny that he authorized it to be filled up in that form.
2. Parol evidence that a bond sued on was executed in blank and was filled up contrary to direction may be given under a simple denial of execution and delivery.

(February 7, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, reversing a judgment of the Monroe County Circuit in plaintiff's favor on the counterclaim and granting a new trial as to such claim in an action brought to recover for services alleged to have been rendered to defendant's testatrix in which defendant set up as a counterclaim a demand on a bond which had been given by plaintiff to said testatrix. Reversed.

Statement by Earl, J.:

The plaintiff commenced this action to recover for services rendered and for money paid for the defendant's testatrix, Elizabeth Davis. The defendant put in issue the allegations of the complaint, and set up as a counterclaim that the plaintiff and his wife executed to Mrs. Davis their joint and several bond in the penal sum of $8,500, conditioned to pay her the sum of $210 on the 6th day of April, 1881, and $175 "each year thereafter during the natural life of Elizabeth Davis," but no part of the principal to be paid, and that the interest falling due on April 6th in each of the years 1885, 1887, 1888, and 1889, had not been paid, and he demanded judgment against the plaintiff for these sums, with interest. The plaintiff replied to the counterclaim, and, among other defenses, denied "that he sealed, executed, and delivered the bond as set forth in the counterclaim." Mrs. Davis died April 10, 1889, and plaintiff's wife died before the commencement of this action. At the close of the evidence the defendant's counsel asked the court to direct a verdict in his favor for the amount due on the bond, and that motion was denied. Plaintiff's counsel then asked the court to direct a nonsuit in reference to the counterclaim, and that was granted. Thereafter judgment was entered dismissing the plaintiff's complaint and dismissing the counterclaim. From so much of the judgment as dismissed his counterclaim, the defendant appealed to the general term, and there that portion of the judgment was reversed, and a new trial as to the counterclaim was granted. From the order of the general term the plaintiff appealed to this court.

NOTE.—The effect of filling blanks when authority therefor is given is illustrated in the case of Reed v. Morton (Neb.) 1 L. R. A. 736, where a blank for the name of the grantee was left in a deed delivered to the grantor's husband in order that he might convey the premises to any purchaser whom he might find.

The present case is a somewhat unusual one if it is not indeed entirely novel, although there are 28 L. R. A.

Marsh v. McNair, 99 N. Y. 178; Southwick v. First Nat. Bank of Memphis, 84 N. Y. 429.

Earl, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Neither party upon the trial asked to have the evidence as to the counterclaim submitted to the jury, and there is really no dispute about it. Mrs. Richards, the wife of the plaintiff, was the daughter of the Mrs. Davis, the testatrix, and a paper now appearing as the bond set up in the counterclaim was signed by her and the plaintiff in pursuance of a family arrangement by which Mrs. Davis distributed property among her children, and agreed to take from them bonds to secure her support. The plaintiff and his wife and the testatrix went to a justice of the peace for the purpose of having a bond prepared and executed. It was agreed between them that the testatrix should have the interest on the amount of the bond if she needed it; that if she did not need it, it was not to be called for, and that nothing should be due or payable upon the bond after her death; and that such an agreement should be inserted in the conditions of the bond. When the parties called upon the justice, he was not prepared to write the bond, and he produced a blank bond, and told the plaintiff and his wife to sign it, and that he would subsequently fill it up according to the agreement, which was stated to him in the presence of all the parties, and he would deliver the bond. With that understanding, the plaintiff and his wife signed the blank bond, and left it with the justice of the peace. He thereafter filled it up as it now appears, binding the obligors absolutely to make the payments on the bond as therein specified during the life of Mrs. Davis. The claim of the defendant is that the plaintiff could not, under his reply simply denying that he sealed, executed, and delivered the bond, show by parol evidence what the true agreement between the parties was, nor what instructions were given to the justice of the peace in reference to filling up and completing the bond, and that the only remedy of the plaintiff, if the bond was not filled up as agreed, was to have it reformed so as to make it conform to the agreement; and the general term upheld this claim, holding that, under the issue formed by the reply, the parol evidence was inadmissible to contradict or vary the bond, and that, if it did not express the true agreement between the parties, the plaintiff should have interposed a reply asking for its reformation.

We think the learned general term fell into error. If this had been a complete bond when the plaintiff signed it, although by mistake or fraud it did not express the true agreement between the parties, his sole remedy would have been to procure its reformation, and, when an effort was made to enforce the bond against him, he could not contradict the terms thereof by parol evidence, except by proper allegations in his pleading asking for its reformation. But here the plaintiff did not sign any bond. He signed a blank piece of paper, and it would have been sufficient for him on the trial to prove that he simply signed a blank piece of paper, and then it would have been necessary for the defendant to show that he authorized the blank to be filled up, and how and under what circumstances the authority was given, and what the authority was. A party who signs a blank piece of paper cannot be bound to the obligation written therein, unless it can be shown that he gave the person who wrote it authority. Chauncey v. Arnold, 24 N. Y. 830; Dutchess & C. County R. Co. v. Mabbett, 58 N. Y. 397; Drury v. Foster, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 24, 17 L. ed. 780.

There might be cases of an estoppel where one who signed a paper in that way would be bound by it. But in this case no estoppel arises, as the action is between one of the original parties and the representative of the other party; so the defendant is not in a position to complain if the bond is given effect according to the true agreement between the parties. Suppose the justice of the peace, instead of inserting payments in this bond, as agreed, had inserted therein a conveyance of real estate, or a bond for the absolute payment of the principal of a large sum of money; or suppose he had signed this blank bond without authorizing any one to fill it up, and some unauthorized person had afterward filled it up as it now appears,—in either of these cases would the bond thus filled up and completed in form have been the bond of the plaintiff? Certainly in neither case could it have been said that the plaintiff executed such a bond. Here so far as the bond departed from the agreement of the parties it was not the bond of the plaintiff. The only authority the justice of the peace had was to insert in this bond the precise agreement of the parties, as directed. As he did not do that, this is not, in the form it now appears, the bond of the plaintiff, and, under a denial that he executed the bond, he may show the circumstances under which he signed his name, and what the agreement at the time he signed it was.

We are therefore of opinion that the order of the general term should be reversed, and the judgment of the trial term affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

Re Henry Edward SANDERS, by His Next Friend.

(.....Kan.....)

*1. Chapter 129, Sess. Laws 1881, (paragraphs 6513-6529, Gen. Stat. 1889), is not unconstitutional by reason of conflict with section 16, article 2, of the Constitution; and the title of the Act providing "for the organization and management of the state reform school," is broad enough to include the provisions of the act permitting boys under the age of sixteen to be placed in or committed to the school by courts of record, including probate courts.

2. The words, "who may be liable to punishment by imprisonment," in the first subdivision of section 4, chapter 129, Sess. Laws 1881, may be construed as "who may be subject to punishment by imprisonment." With this construction, that provision of the act is also constitutional.

3. A probate judge has no authority, under the first subdivision of section 4, chapter 129, Sess. Laws 1881, to commit a boy under sixteen years of age, without his consent, and against the objections of his parents, to the reform school, who is charged only upon a complaint filed with him with the specific crime of burglary, when such boy has not been previously convicted of the offense by some court having jurisdiction to hear and try the same.

PETITION on behalf of Henry Edward Sanders by W. F. Sanders, his next friend, for a writ of habeas corpus to procure his release from the custody of J. W. Freeborn, sheriff of McPherson county to which he had been committed to be conveyed to the Reform School. Petitioner discharged.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

On November 29, 1893, the following complaint, duly verified, was filed with the probate judge of McPherson county:

"State of Kansas, McPherson County—ss.: In the Probate Court. E. F. Haberlein, being duly sworn, on oath says that Robert Hunt and Edward Sanders are boys under the age of sixteen (16) years; that said Robert Hunt and Edward Sanders are liable to punishment by imprisonment, under the laws of this state, for the offense of burglary. That is to say, that on the 28th day of November, 1893, and in the night-time of said day, in the county of McPherson, and state of Kansas, said Robert Hunt and Edward Sanders did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously break into and enter the store of the said E. F. Haberlein, in which store

NOTE.—The commitment of minors to a reform school without conviction of crime is the subject of a note to the case of State v. Brown (Minn.) 16 L. R. A. 601. Since the subject is of the highest importance and the law concerning it is not fully developed, decisions like the one above reported must be regarded with interest. This decision seems to represent the general tendency of the courts to regard such commitment as a criminal 23 L. R. A.

proceeding when it is based upon the commission of a criminal offense, and therefore subject to all constitutional restrictions on criminal prosecutions.

See, on the same subject, the recent Illinois decision in the case of People v. Illinois State Reformatory Managers, ante, 138.

certain goods, wares, merchandise, and other valuable things were then and there kept and deposited, with the intent the said goods, wares, merchandise, and other valuable things in said store then and there being to steal, take, and carry away. Ed F. Haberlein.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 29th day of November, 1898. [Seal.] J. W. Walker, Probate Judge."

A warrant was issued, the boys were arrested, and five days' notice of the time of hearing the complaint was given to the parents. At such date the boys appeared, as did the county attorney; the father and mother of Robert Hunt, and their private counsel, Messrs. Grattan & Grattan; the father of Henry E. Sanders, and his counsel, Milliken & Galle. The parents of Robert Hunt consented that the court should commit him to the reform school, and, through their private counsel and the county attorney, vigorously urged that both boys should be so committed. The father of Henry E. Sanders, personally and by counsel, so far as he was concerned, objected thereto, and insisted that inasmuch as there was no other accusation against him than that of burglary, and that as his father not only refused to consent, but objected, to the court considering the charge, and as he had never been tried or convicted of the offense charged, the court had no power or jurisdiction to try him therefor. The court overruled such objections and proceeded to inquire into the case, when a jury trial was demanded by the Sanderses (father and son), which was refused; and the court, after hearing the evidence, found the charge of the complaint to be true, and that Robert Hunt was fourteen, and Henry E. Sanders thirteen, years of age, and that they were both proper subjects for commitment to the reform school, and accordingly so committed both of them until their majority, unless sooner discharged as permitted by law. A warrant was placed in the hands of J. W. Freeborn, sheriff of McPherson county, to convey them to the school; but, before it was executed as to Henry E. Sanders, a writ of habeas corpus was sued out by him in this court, returnable on the 8d day of January, 1894, at which time the sheriff produced the child in court, justifying his detention and restraint by reason of the complaint, warrant, and proceedings. The case was submitted upon the record.

Messrs. Milliken & Galle for petitioner.
Mr. Charles W. Webster, for respondent:

If under the statute in question, the boy is not liable to punishment until after conviction then we find these two curious facts to exist:

First, a conflict of jurisdiction between a court of record, a probate court and a justice's court.

Second, any boy under sixteen who had committed an offense could not be committed to the reform school until he had been first proceeded against as a criminal.

The legislature intended to prevent the very thing that the father of Henry Edward Sanders demands should be done in this case. That is, that his boy be arrested for burglary, 28 L. R. A.

treated as a common criminal, and upon conviction in the district court, be branded as a felon and be sentenced both to the reform school and to the penitentiary, leaving the choice with the boy as to which place he will go.

The proceedings had by the probate court in this case were not a trial within the meaning of sections 5 and 10 of the Bill of Rights.

State v. Topeka, 86 Kan. 86, 59 Am. Rep. 529; State v. Durcin, 46 Kan. 695.

An act of the legislature providing for the committing to an industrial school of dependent infant girls found begging, etc., is not unconstitutional as being in the restraint of personal liberty, nor because a trial by jury is not accorded.

Ferrier's Petition, 108 Ill. 367, 42 Am. Rep. 10; Ross v. Irving, 14 Ill. 171.

A statute which provides for the detention of a minor child, who is incorrigible and beyond parental control, in the "house of refuge," a reformatory institution, under the authority of a commitment by a justice of the peace, is not unconstitutional because it authorizes the imprisonment of a minor without trial by jury as guaranteed by the bill of rights of Pennsylvania.

Ex parte Crouse, 4 Whart. 9.

The institution to which they are committed is a school, not a prison; nor is the character of their detention affected by the fact that it is also a place where juvenile convicts may be sent who would otherwise be condemned to confinement.

Prescott v. State, 19 Ohio St. 188, 2 Am. Rep. 388.

A statute enacted that children under a certain age, who were inmates of poor houses, or who were abandoned by their parents, or who were without means of subsistence, should be committed to industrial schools during minority. It was held, not unconstitutional as authorizing imprisonment without due process of law.

Milwaukee Industrial School v. Milwaukee County Supra, 40 Wis. 328, 22 Am. Rep. 703.

A reform school is not a penal institution, and in case of conviction for crime sentence is only suspended, and the offender committed for the purpose of being reformed.

Re Mason, 3 Wash. 609.

The mode of procedure pointed out in this legislation is not in violation of the fundamental law of the state which provides that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

State v. Brown, 16 L. R. A. 691, 50 Minn. 858; Farnham v. Pierce, 141 Mass. 203, 55 Am. Rep. 452.

The commitment to the reform school in this case is not conclusive upon the parent as to his right to the custody of the child.

Milwaukee Industrial School v. Milwaukee County Supra, and Farnham v. Pierce, supra.

The title is: "An Act to Provide for the Organization and Management of the State Reform School."

The one object of the act was to determine what boys needed reforming, and to provide a place for their reformation.

Judge Cooley, in treating of this constitutional question says: "The general purpose of these provisions is accomplished when a law has but one general object which is fairly indicated in its title. To require every end and means necessary or convenient for the accomplishment of this general object to be provided for by a separate act relating to that alone, would not only be unreasonable, but would actually render legislation impossible."

Cooley, Const. Law, p. 144. See also State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 218; State v. Bush, 45 Kan. 140; Cherokee County Comrs. v. State, 86 Kan. 337.

While the provision of the constitution might limit and restrict the legislature in conferring the jurisdiction upon the probate court yet it did not prevent the legislature from giving to the probate judge such powers and duties as were not inconsistent with those given to the probate court by the constitution.

Re Johnson, 12 Kan. 103.

In State v. Dennis, 39 Kan. 509, this court held that the probate court is invested with jurisdiction to hear and determine whether a settler upon school land is qualified and entitled to purchase the land at the appraised value, and that its decision is final unless appealed from. Now it cannot be contended that jurisdiction in such a case is conferred upon the probate court by the constitution.

In Mendenhall v. Burton, 42 Kan. 570, this court held that the probate court was authorized under section 1, chapter 108, General Statutes of 1888, to declare a town then existing to be incorporated as a village and designate the metes and bounds thereof.

See also as to authority conferred upon probate courts and probate judges, Kirkpatrick v. State, 5 Kan. 678; Re Johnson, supra; Intoxicating Liquor Cases, 25 Kan. 760, 37 Am. Rep. 284; Re Latta, 43 Kan. 534.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner alleges that he has been illegally committed to the state reform school by the probate court of McPherson county, and seeks by this proceeding to be discharged. The contention is that chapter 129, Sess. Laws 1881, is in violation of section 16, article 2, of the Constitution; at least, that the title of the act is not sufficiently comprehensive to include everything contained therein,—particularly, that it is not broad enough to include the provision of the fourth section of the act, giving courts of record, including probate courts, power to commit boys under sixteen years of age to the reform school. Gen. Stat. 1889, par. 6516. "Organization" is defined as "an arrangement of parties;" "the act of organizing," as "the organization of a government, or of flocks, or of a railroad or other corporation, or of an army, or of an expedition," "the connection of parts in and for a whole, so that each part is, at once, end and means." "Socially as well as individually, organization is indispensable to growth." "Management" is defined as "government; control; superintendence; physical or manual handling or guidance; the act of managing by direction or regulation; administration,—as the management of a family, or of a household, or of servants, or of great enterprises, or of great affairs." A "school" is defined as "an institution for learning; an educational establishment; a place for acquiring knowledge and mental training;" "an assemblage of scholars, those who attend upon the instruction in a school of any kind;" "a body of pupils, collectively, in any place of instruction, and under instruction of one or more teachers;" "the disciples or followers of a teacher;" and "any place or means of discipline, improvement, instruction, or training." When we speak of "organizing a corporation," we mean the filing of its character, the designation of its shares of stock; the selection of its directors; everything necessary to organize, or bring into existence, or create a corporate body. The authority to organize and manage or govern an army, unless otherwise restricted, gives power to the commander in chief, or those in authority, to bring together, to collect, to assemble, to recruit persons for military service, and thereby to bring into existence or create a military force, and to increase, decrease, or change the same, or any part thereof, as well as to command, direct, and regulate the force or army after it is organized or brought into existence. We do not intend to say that "the organization of a school" is broad enough, in its strict sense, to literally create or make boys or girls. But these words, construed together, are sufficiently broad, within their usual and ordinary meaning, to signify the bringing in, the bringing together, the collecting, the placing in, the committing of boys or other inmates to, a school; that is, the organizing, or bringing into existence, or creating a school. Section 4, which is criticised as not within the title of the act, provides, in connection with other sections of the act, the way in which boys are collected, brought in, or committed to the school; that is, the manner in which the school is organized, or brought into existence, kept in existence, and operated, with boys or inmates. The organization and management of a school relate to one subject. Construing all of the words of the title of chapter 129, we think there is sufficient therein to authorize something more than provisions to merely systematize and regulate an existing school, or an existing place of discipline, instruction, or training. Evidently, the legislature intended by the title one whose scope was broad enough to embrace the bringing together, the collecting, and the furnishing of pupils or inmates to or for a reform school. Not only that, but the title is broad enough to include provisions in the act for bringing in or bringing together, for collecting and furnishing, whatever is necessary to complete and carry on a reform school. The general rule is that, in determining whether an act of the legislature is constitutional, it is the duty of the courts to give such construction to it, if possible, as will uphold all of its provisions. Then, again, it is not necessary that the title to an act should be a synopsis or abstract of the entire act, in all its details. It is sufficient if the title indicates clearly, though in general terms, the scope of the act. With our construction of the title of the act and the provisions thereof, we think, within the prior decisions of this court, that the constitutionality of the act may be upheld. Woodruff v. Baldwin, 23 Kan. 491; State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 213; Cherokee County Comrs. v. State, 36 Kan. 387; State v. Bush, 45 Kan. 140; Cooley, Const. Law, 144.

The other contention of the petitioner against the commitment is more serious. In the act the legislature has provided for commitments to the school of boys under sixteen years of age, in the following manner: Under section 3, any boy who shall have been convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment; under the first subdivision of section 4, any boy who may be liable to punishment by imprisonment under any existing law of the state; under the second subdivision of section 4, any boy, with the consent of his parents or guardian, against whom the charge of any crime or misdemeanor shall have been made, the punishment of which, on conviction, would be confinement in a jail or prison; under the third subdivision of section 4, any boy who is incorrigible, etc.; and, under section 5, any boy, with his consent, who shall be arraigned for trial, in any court competent to try the case, on any charge under the criminal code for violation of any law of the state, which, upon conviction, would subject him to imprisonment. Gen. Stat. 1889, pars. 6515-6517. If the petitioner in this case had been duly convicted of any offense known to the laws of the state, punishable by imprisonment, we think he could have been sentenced and confined to the reform school, under section 3 of the Act. Or if he had been committed to the reform school by the probate court of McPherson county, or any other court of that county, under the second and third subdivisions of section 4, or if he had been committed, with his consent, under section 5, we would have no hesitation in enforcing the order. "The tendency of the courts, in construing the powers of committing magistrates and other officials empowered by statutes to place minors in juvenile institutions for care and guardianship, and in passing upon their proceedings, is to disregard mere technicalities, and to give such interpretation to the statutes as to carry out their benevolent design, and sustain the proceeding in pursuance thereof, when such course is evidently to the advantage of the minor." 80 Cent. L. J. 53, and cases cited; Re Mason, 3 Wash. 609; Ex parte Crouse, 4 Whart. 9; State v. Brown, 50 Minn. 353, 16 L. R. A. 691; Ferrier's Petition, 103

Ill. 367, 42 Am. Rep. 10; McLean County v. Humphreys, 104 Ill. 373; Milwaukee Industrial School v. Milwaukee County Suprs. 40 Wis. 328; Farnham v. Pierce, 141 Mass. 203, 50 Am. Rep. 452; Roth v. House of Refuge, 31 Md. 329.

The petitioner was tried upon a complaint before the probate judge, charging him with the specific offense of burglary. It is not alleged in the complaint that he is incorrigible, or otherwise a fit person to be sent to the reform school. The probate judge found that the complaint charging him with burglary was true. The petitioner has not consented to his commitment, and his parents strenuously object. We do not think the order can be enforced. If the first subdivision of section 4 must be construed as authorizing courts of record, including probate courts, to commit any boy under sixteen years of age, without his consent, and against the objections of his parents, to the reform school, who is charged only with a specific criminal offense, like burglary, punishable by imprisonment, without a trial or hearing according to due process of law, then it is doubtful if that part of the statute is constitutional. State v. Ray, 63 N. H. 406, 56 Am. Rep. 529; Com. v. Horregan, 127 Mass. 450.

The proceedings in this case are in the nature of a conviction for a specific crime by a court having no criminal jurisdiction. Such a conviction ought not to be had in an irregular and improper way, even if not followed by any sentence of imprisonment, or other punishment. If, however, the boys "who may be liable to punishment by imprisonment" do not incur such liability until they are convicted in the usual form, the first subdivision of section 4 may have some operation. We think that the words "may be liable to punishment" should be construed as meaning "subject to punishment." "Liable" has, also, that meaning. Courts of record, including probate courts, may possibly have the authority, where a boy under sixteen years of age has been convicted of a criminal offense punishable by imprisonment, and sentenced to a prison by a justice of the peace, or a court, afterwards to commit him to the reform school. The provisions of the act, however, should be given such a construction as to keep them within the limits of the constitution.

The petitioner will be discharged.

sides can see each other, nor because a screw-eye 4 feet 10 inches from the bottom projects 9-16 of an inch beyond the surface and causes injury to a person against whom it is violently pushed by another hurrying to a train.

(April 23, 1894.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the court of Common Pleas, No. 1, for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Outside the door of one of defendant's stations was a storm-house, having doors which swung both ways. Each swing door was 42 inches wide, of which 8 inches in the center, from the lock-rail up was of glass. The rest was of wood 4 feet 10 inches above the pavement. A screw-eye was inserted in the door, to hold it back when the weather was sufficiently warm to warrant it. On the day of the accident for which this suit was brought, the plaintiff passed through the station door into the storm-house, when one of the swing doors was pushed violently in by a person coming from without, and the screw-eye struck plaintiff on the forehead, causing the injury complained of.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Gavin W. Hart, for appellant:

The railroad company is not bound to protect its passengers from such rudeness as made the ground of action in this case.

Ellinger v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 153 Pa. 215.

The cause of the accident was the improper act of a passenger and the plaintiff cannot recover.

Kies v. Erie, 135 Pa. 144; Eisenbrey v. Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance, 141 Pa. 566.

Ordinarily the question of proximate and remote cause is for the jury; but where facts are not in dispute, the determination is for the court.

Messrs. William C. Gross and Thomas F. Gross, for appellee:

This accident happened by reason of the improper construction of the storm door. It was not a properly constructed door for the place or manner in which it was used.

Hayman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 118 Pa. 508.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The act which caused the plaintiff's injury was not the act of the defendant, nor of any of its agents or employes. It was exclusively the act of a total stranger, over whom, or whose actions, the defendant had not the slightest control. Moreover, his action was not the usual, customary conduct of an intending passenger, about to pass through the door in question; but it was rude, impatient, and unusual. The plaintiff herself thus describes the manner of her injury: Having said she was just about going out of the door, and had her hand up at the door, and her left foot on the pavement, she was asked: "Q. Where was the right foot? A. On the step; and going out there was a gentleman walked in, or came running, to make the train, and as he ran in he knocked the door against my head. Q.

Where did he hit your head? A. He struck me right there on the forehead." The plaintiff's witness Emma Bettker, being the only other witness who described the manner of the injury, testified as follows upon the same subject: "As we were going out of the door, Norah put her hands up to the door, to go out, while two gentlemen came a rushing in, and threw the door on Norah, and we were still going to pass out, when there was a gentleman, coming from the depot, says: 'Why, Miss, he has broke the skin. You had better go in.'" The foregoing is the whole of the testimony descriptive of the injury, except the plaintiff's cross-examination, which is substantially similar to the testimony in chief. It is manifest therefore, that the plaintiff's injury was exclusively the result of the unusual, rude, and hasty act of a stranger. Dealing with just such a question as this, in the case of Ellinger v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 153 Pa. 215, we held that a common carrier is not bound to protect its passengers from rudeness or bad manners on the part of strangers or other passengers, unless such conduct amounts to a breach of the peace. A woman is not entitled to recover damages from a railroad company for personal injuries, where it appears from her own testimony that, when she was about to descend from the lower step of a car to the ground, she was jostled off by another passenger rudely pushing by her to enter the car. Our Brother Williams, delivering the opinion, said: "She had reached the lowest step, and was in the act of stepping from it to the platform, when an impatient man, desiring to take the train at that station, stepped upon the step she was leaving, and in so doing crowded or jostled her, and she fell. The immediate cause of her fall was the act of the impatient man, in his efforts to get upon the car. . . . But protection against bad manners is not, so far as I am aware, one of the duties owing by a carrier to its passengers. Rudeness is a breach of no positive law. The ordinary cars are, and must be, open to the masses, among whom there will be different degrees of intelligence and politeness; differences in physical vigor and temperament. There is therefore, necessarily a certain amount of rudeness, of haste, of selfish disregard of the nerves and of the comfort of others, to be met with wherever men and women congregate,—whether upon railroad trains, in places of amusement, or upon the streets of a city. Unless such conduct amounts to a breach of the peace, the officers of the law can take no cognizance of it; and carriers are not bound to prevent it, or liable in damages for its appearance about their stations or trains. The plaintiff was the victim of an act of rudeness." All of this language is precisely applicable to the present case. An impatient traveler, in a hurry to make a train, rushes ahead heedlessly, pushes the door open violently, and causes the door to strike the plaintiff with force, and injures the plaintiff. It was an act of rudeness, of which the plaintiff was the victim. That the stranger was responsible for his act there can be no doubt, but that the defendant shall be made to suffer in damages for such an act is intolerable and unjust, to the last degree. It is subject to no duty to guard against such acts, and therefore is not negligent in that regard.

But, says the plaintiff, the defendant is negligent in the construction of the door, and therefore should be liable. A couple of carpenters are examined, who, after the event, say the door was defective because it was not all glass above the middle rail, so that persons could see each other coming to the door. It is not at all certain that the same accident would have been avoided if this door had been built in that way, because the same spirit of impatience and rudeness would have prompted the same act of haste in opening the door to get through quickly, although another person was visible on the other side. But the best illustration of the fallacy of the attempt to establish negligence in this way is afforded by one of our own cases Hayman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 118 Pa. 508. There the door for the transit of the passengers from the wharf to the boat was constructed precisely as the carpenters said this one should have been, viz. all glass above the middle rail. But it happened that a passenger going through it, just behind another passenger, put up his hand to push it open, and he struck the glass with force enough to break it; and, his hand having been cut severely by the broken glass, he brought an action against the company, and sought to recover upon the presumption of negligence arising from the mere fact of the accident. But we refused to sanction that proposition, and held that the door was no part of the machinery used for the carriage of passengers, and that the plaintiff, in order to recover, must prove negligence affirmatively. In that case the accident resulted from the presence of too much glass in the door, and in this case it was contended there was too little. But both contentions were untenable. The doors were both such as are in common use, and the mere construction of neither of them justified an inference of negligence. The present case is much stronger than the Hayman Case, because in that the injury was the result of the mere ordinary use of the door, while here it was the result of the violent act of a stranger.

Again, it is contended that the presence of a small screw-eye on the inner surface of the door was the immediate means by which the injury was inflicted, and therefore it was negligence to have it in a position where it could strike the plaintiff's head. There was no proof that such an appliance was not a usual and suitable device for holding the door open when the weather did not require it to be closed, but it was contended that it should have been at the top or the bottom of the door, so that it could not have hurt the plaintiff. It was a very small screw-eye, and only projected nine-sixteenths of an inch beyond the surface. It was located four feet and ten inches from the bottom of the door, and it happened that the plaintiff was of a sufficiently short stature to bring her head on the level with this little appliance. It is a sufficient reply to the argument derived from this source to say that, if the eye had been at the bottom of the door, it might have struck her ankle, and injured her, as was the fact in the case of Kies v. Erie, 185 Pa. 144. There the plaintiff—who was a woman, also—was passing along the street in front of an engine house, when the door, which projected, when open, six feet over the pavement, was suddenly thrown open, and struck the plaintiff on the ankle, and injured her seriously. She brought an action against the city for the injury, but the court below granted a nonsuit, which this court sustained. It was claimed that the building was negligently constructed, as to the doors, and therefore the city was liable, but we held otherwise. Mr. Chief Justice Paxson said, in the opinion: "It is true the doors of the engine house opened outwards, and were operated by springs, which, when certain bolts were pulled, opened, or assisted in opening, the doors. The case was argued upon the theory that when the bolts were pulled the springs opened the doors suddenly, and with great violence. In such case, as they swept across a considerable portion of the pavement, in opening, it can readily be seen that they might be a dangerous trap to injure persons passing along the said pavement. The only testimony on the part of the plaintiff upon this subject was substantially as follows: 'When the bolts are pulled you have to start the doors a little bit, and then the spring takes hold, and helps swing the door open. Sometimes they are opened quick, and sometimes not so quick. If the wind is blowing, it is difficult, and you have to follow the door and push it along; and when there is no wind they swing freely.' As the plaintiff was nonsuited, she is entitled to all the deductions which can fairly be drawn from this evidence. Tested by this rule, however, it is not sufficient to justify a jury in finding that the doors of the engine house were defectively constructed, and dangerous to citizens using the pavement. It is evident that the only object and effect of the springs were to aid the firemen in swinging open the heavy doors. It is not only possible, but probable, that on the occasion referred to, if the door was opened rapidly and violently, as contended by the plaintiff, it was the result of a push by the person who opened it. For his carelessness or negligence the city, under all the authorities, is not liable, and we have already said there was not sufficient evidence of the faulty construction of the building to submit to the jury." Just so in the present case. The defendant is not responsible for the act of the stranger in pushing open the door in a rude and violent manner. If it had been opened in the ordinary and usual manner, the plaintiff would not have been hurt. But the defendant is not bound to take precautions against the unusual and negligent use of its appliances by strangers or others. If they are reasonably safe, when used with ordinary care, and in the manner that prevails with the mass of mankind, the duty of the party who supplies them is performed. A very apt illustration of this doctrine is found in the case of Eisenbrey v. Pennsylvania Co. for Insurance, 141 Pa. 566. There a fence was erected, inclosing the front steps of a residence, and having a door therein extending, when wide open, ten inches beyond the limit within which obstructions were permitted by a city ordinance. The plaintiff, an old man, sixty-nine years of age, was passing along the footwalk in front of the house, when suddenly the door or gate in the fence was thrown open, and struck him, causing him to fall, and suffer a fracture of his thigh. A verdict was recovered in the court below, but we reversed the judgment without a venire. We said: "The accident did not result from the erection of the fence. That was harmless enough, and, if in violation of the city ordinance,— which does not clearly appear,—was not necessarily dangerous, or likely to injure any one. The proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff was the throwing open of the door suddenly. It was not contended that this was done by the company, or by any agent, employé, or servant thereof. There is no room, therefore, to apply the doctrine of respondet superior." All of this is exactly pertinent to the present contention. For the rude and hasty act of the stranger, the defendant is not responsible. The screw eye was a perfectly proper appliance to be upon the door, to fasten it back. In itself, it was entirely innocent, and was not by any means so prominent as the knob of a door, or an outside lock, or a key projecting therefrom. In all the ordinary uses of the door, there was not the least liability to inflict injury, resulting from its presence. It is not possible to regard it as any more, or even as much, a source of danger, as a projecting knob or lock or key, or even a piece of carving, or an old-fashioned knocker. We are perfectly clear that the mere presence of such an appliance on the surface of a door is not the least evidence of negligence in the construction of the door, and the same is true of the glass plate. Upon the whole testimony, we are of opinion that the case should have been withdrawn from the jury, with a binding instruction to find a verdict for the defendant. We sustain the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th assignments of error. The others are immaterial.

Judgment reversed.

*1. Compensation of a public officer fixed by a provision that "each member of the board who is present during the entire session of any regular meeting, and not otherwise, shall be entitled to receive $5 for his attendance," is not "salary" within the meaning of section 20 of article 2 of the Constitution, which provides that "The general assembly, in cases not provided for in this Constitution, shall fix the term of office, and the compensation of all officers; but no change therein shall affect the salary of any officer during his existing term, unless the office be abolished."

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of defendant in an action brought to compel payment by defendant to plaintiff of certain extra compensation to which he alleged he was entitled under the state statute. Reversed.

NOTE.—Constitutional prohibition against change of salary during term as affecting fees.

We have not found that any cases other than the present one and that of Thompson v. Phillips, 12 Ohio St. 617, which is discussed in the present case, have construed a constitutional provision against change of "salary" during an officer's term, and the decision of the Ohio court in the two cases referred to is clearly in accordance with the ordinary meaning of the word "salary."

In Wisconsin a constitutional provision against the change of the "compensation" of an officer during his term of office was held not to prevent a change in specific fees or commissions of an officer such as a county treasurer paid for doing particular acts. Milwaukee County Supra. v. Hackett, 21 Wis. 618.

And in Alabama a similar provision against change of "compensation" was held not to apply to per diem fees of a sheriff for victualling prisoners. Dane v. Smith, 54 Ala. 47.

These are the only cases which we have discovered that construe provisions of this kind as affecting a change of compensation of an officer who is paid in the form of specific fees or commissions.

B. A. R.

Statement by Spear, J. :

The plaintiff's petition, filed in the court of common pleas of Hamilton county, August 6, 1892, set forth that he then was, and since prior to February 19, 1892, had been, a member of the board of legislation of the city of Cincinnati; that he had attended all regular meetings of the board on and subsequent to the above date, being present during the entire session of each meeting; that he had been compensated for each of said attendances, at the rate of $5 per meeting; that defendant had refused to pay plaintiff any greater compensation, and asking judgment for $125.

A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and a judgment for defendant rendered, which, upon error to the circuit court, was affirmed.

Mr. William H. Pope, for plaintiff in error:

An action of debt is generally conceded to be the proper remedy to recover compensation for official services rendered to a municipal corporation.

People v. Thompson, 25 Barb. 78; Steubenville v. Culp, 88 Ohio St. 18, 48 Am. Rep. 417; O'Leary v. New York Board of Education, 98 N. Y. 1, 45 Am. Rep. 156.

Acceptance of a less sum does not estop to claim amount actually due.

Montague v. Massey, 76 Va. 307.

The act in question was the exercise of legislative power, and the legislative power of the state is vested by the constitution in the general assembly.

The presumption is that the legislative power is not restricted and the burden is on the party asserting the existence of a limitation to establish the fact.

Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 578.

In Thompson v. Phillips, 12 Ohio St. 617, the supreme court, considering the meaning of the word "salary" as used in the section of the constitution under consideration, held that it was used in a limited sense, and that a percentage compensation allowed by law to a public treasurer for official duties could be altered at pleasure by the legislature because not salary. The percentage compensation paid to the treasurer was, however, "a reward paid to a public officer for the performance of his official duties."

We must give to the language employed in the constitution its plain and natural import as understood by its framers and the people who adopted the instrument. And we may look to the debates as aids to ascertain that meaning.

Cuss v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 621; State v. Kenyon, 7 Ohio St. 568.

In the constitutional convention, the original section reported by the committee having in charge the bill relating to the legislative department, read as follows: "Section 18. The general assembly shall, by law, fix the term of office of all officers not otherwise fixed in the constitution, and determine upon and regulate the compensation of all such officers, provided that no change therein shall affect the incumbent then in office for the term for which he shall have been elected or appointed."

1 Debates, 233.

After considerable discussion, however, there being great objection to the application of the inhibition to minor offices, the convention decided to limit it to officers receiving a salary.

2 Debates, 561.

Salary is defined to be "the recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person for periodical services, usually a fixed sum to be paid by the year, half year, or quarter."

5 Century Dict. 5810.

In Indiana a per diem allowance would be termed fees or wages.

Cowdin v. Huff, 10 Ind. 85.

Mr. Theodore Horstman, for defendant in error:

The general assembly in cases not provided for in this constitution, shall fix the term of office, and the compensation of all officers; but no change therein shall affect the salary of any officer during his existing term, unless the office is abolished."

Const. art. 2, § 20.

We do not think that the language of any single member of the convention can be taken as an authoritative exposition of the construction to be placed upon any words in the constitution. It is the final conclusion reached by the whole body after mature deliberation which is to govern and not the opinions of individual members.

The following are the definitions of the word "salary," as given in the leading lexicons:

"The recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person for services; annual or periodical wages or pay; hire."

Webster.

"An annual or periodical payment for services;—a stipulated periodical recompense."

Worcester.

"The recompense or consideration stipulated to be paid to a person periodically for services."

Century. Dict.

"The reward paid to a public officer for the performance of his official duties."

Bouvier, Law Dict. 492; State v. Raine, 49 Ohio St. 580.

The court said: "Constitutional guaranties would afford but slight barriers to encroachments by any of the departments of the government, if the forbidden object could be accomplished by simply using a form of words that did not name it in express terms. . . . The one thousand dollars allowed by the section under consideration as well as the two thousand dollars allowed by the former law, is a 'reward paid to a public officer for the performance of his official duties,' and is therefore 'salary.'"

2 Bouvier, Law Dict. 492; Cowdin v. Huff, 10 Ind. 85; 2 Abbott, Law Dict. 440.

The remedy of plaintiff in error, if any, was mandamus.

Merrill, Mandamus, § 136, citing Huff v. Knapp, 5 N. Y. 65; McBride v. Grand Rapids, 47 Mich. 236; State v. Cleveland, 22 Week. L. Bull. 113.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Two questions arise upon the record: (a) Can the compensation of members of the board of legislation be increased during the existing term? (b) Is an action at law the proper form or remedy to recover compensation, where payment is refused by the city, or must resort be had to a proceeding in mandamus?

At the commencement of the term of plaintiff as a member of the board of legislation the compensation provided by statute was $5 for attendance during the entire session of any regular meeting. By the Act of February 19, 1892, it was provided that "each member of the board who is present during the entire session of any regular meeting, and not otherwise, shall be entitled to receive ten dollars for his attendance, and shall receive no other compensation whatever."

1. It is contended that section 20 of article 3 of the Constitution prohibits an increase of compensation during the existing term. That section is as follows: "The general assembly, in cases not provided for in this constitution, shall fix the term of office, and the compensation of all officers; but no change therein shall affect the salary of any officer during his existing term, unless the office be abolished."

The question, therefore, is, whether or not the pay of a member of the board is "salary" within the meaning of the above section?

We think it is not. A general definition of salary includes compensation. General definitions do not, however, cover all cases. Salary is compensation, but, under the section quoted, compensation is not, in every instance, salary. The point is emphasized by this court in the case of Thompson v. Phillips, 12 Ohio St. 617, where it is said that "it is manifest from the change of expression in the two clauses of the section that the word 'salary' was not used in a general sense, embracing any compensation fixed for an officer, but in its limited sense, of an annual or periodical payment for services—a payment dependent on the time and not on the amount of the service rendered." And it was there held that a percentage compensation allowed by the law to a public treasurer for official duties, could be altered during his term. It is the "salary" which shall not be changed during the term, not necessarily, the compensation.

We think the compensation in the case at bar comes within the principle of the case cited, although a per diem compensation. It is not, within the meaning of the section quoted, "salary." Hence, an increase in the pay of a member during his term is not prohibited by the constitution.

Nor is this conclusion inconsistent with the holding in State v. Raine, 49 Ohio St. 580. The Act of April 8, 1886, gave to the commissioners of Hamilton county a salary of $2,000 per year each, and necessary traveling expenses when traveling outside the county on official business. The amendment under review undertook to give them, for expenses, $1,000 per annum additional. The holding is that the addition, though in terms for expenses, was in effect an increase of salary, which was unauthorized as applied to the existing term of a commissioner in office when the increase was made.

2. We see no reason why an action at law was not proper. A real question as to the right of the plaintiff to the increased pay existed. It is not important to determine whether or not plaintiff would have been entitled to a writ of mandamus against the officer of the city charged with the duty of issuing warrants for the pay of the city officers. It is enough to know that the plaintiff has a clear legal right to pursue the ordinary and approved remedy of an action at law against the city. Ordinarily, where such right exists, and the remedy by its enforcement is adequate, mandamus will not lie. And it is not difficult to imagine a case where, by reason of the existence of a real question as to plaintiff's right to additional compensation, it would be the duty of the accounting officer to refuse to take upon himself the responsibility of issuing a warrant until the question of plaintiff's right to it had been determined in the ordinary way.

The judgment will be reversed and the cause remanded with direction to overrule the demurrer to the petition and for further proceedings.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

BANK OF ANTIGO, Appt., v. UNION TRUST CO.

(.....Ill.....)

1. One who pays the debt of another voluntarily, without any constraint growing out of the necessity to protect his own interest or rights, cannot be subrogated to the rights of the debtor.
2. The discounting of three notes, amounting to more than $11,000, under a promise

(March 31, 1894.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to compel payment of a check. Affirmed.

Statement by Shope, J.:

On and prior to September 2, 1890, A. Weed & Co. were doing business at Ashland, Wis., and that day delivered their check for $3,000, drawn upon appellee bank, to appellant, and took up a note owned by appellee, then due, against Hoxie & Mellor, theretofore sent to appellant by appellee for collection, and on which A. Weed & Co. were indorsers. The check was as follows: "Chicago, September 2d, 1890. The Union Trust Company: Pay to the order of Amos Baum, cashier, three thousand dollars. A. Weed & Co." The said Baum, cashier of appellant bank, accepted the check as so much cash, canceled the note, delivered it to A. Weed & Co., and remitted the amount, less $3 charges, to appellee by draft on appellant's correspondent, the Merchants' Bank of Chicago, which draft was duly paid, etc. The check was also sent to the Merchants' Bank of Chicago by appellant for collection, and presented to appellee for payment on September 4, 1890, and dishonored; whereupon due protest was made, etc. On August 25, 1890, upon certain representations made by A. Weed & Co., appellee was to, and did on September 3d following, discount for them $11,249.65 of Hoxie & Mellor paper, the same being three notes of $3,000, $3,000, and $5,430, respectively. On September 2d, A. Weed & Co. had to their credit on the books of appellee $309.25, and on that day and the following, prior to crediting their account with the proceeds of the discounted paper, had overdrawn their account to the amount of $5,760.57; so that, after deducting overdrafts, a balance was left to their credit on appellee's books, at the close of business on September 3d, of $5,489.08. On the evening of this day, appellee became aware of the failure of Hoxie & Mellor, and, at the opening of business on the morning of September 4th, charged back to A. Weed & Co. the $5,430 note, less discount ($85.69), and returned it to them with the following letter: "Chicago, September 4, 1890. Messrs. A. Weed & Co., Ashland, Wis.—Dear Sirs: Upon being informed yesterday that Messrs. Hoxie & Mellor had failed, we deducted the amount of the note of $5,430, less discount, $85.69—$5,344.31—from your account, and herewith return the note. Yours, respectfully, G. M. Wilson, Cashier,"—thus leaving a balance to the credit of A. Weed & Co. of $144.77 at the time of the presentation of the check for payment on that day. An action was brought by appellant against appellee on the check in the circuit court of Cook county, and resulted in verdict and 23 L. R. A. judgment for appellee. On appeal to the appellate court, this judgment was affirmed, and plaintiff below prosecutes this further appeal.

Even assuming that the discount of the three notes was an entire contract, and that the authorities in relation to the rescission of an entire contract for the sale of chattels has application thereto, there is a qualification of this rule.

In Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208, the court says: "If the vendee retained all the purchased property, the rule of law would apply—the rescission must be complete; but to the extent the fraudulent vendee had disposed of or incumbered the purchased property to third parties without notice, the vendor claiming rescission would be excused from refunding or offering to refund that part of the consideration received, representing or equaling the portion of the property disposed of or incumbered by the vendee."

See Mount Morgan Gold Mine, Limited; Ex parte West, 2 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 131.

A person making a deposit of funds in a bank becomes a creditor of the bank to the extent of the funds deposited. When he draws a check in favor of a third person upon the bank, as between the drawer and the payee, there is an equitable assignment of the funds in the bank to the amount of the check. No relations, however, are yet created between the bank and the payee; but when the check is presented to the bank for payment, then if there are funds to the credit of the drawer sufficient to pay the check, the bank is bound to pay it.

Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1683; Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 35; Fourth Nat. Bank of Chicago v. City Nat. Bank of Grand Rapids, 68 Ill. 898; Metropolitan Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Jones, 12 L. R. A. 492, 137 Ill. 634.

A bank has a right to apply the funds standing to the credit of the depositor in payment of a matured note of the depositor. If the drawing of a check was an appropriation of the deposit, then the bank would have no right to appropriate the deposit to the payment of paper held by itself.

Myers v. Union Nat. Bank, 27 Ill. App. 254.

Shope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended that the contract between appellee and Weed & Co. under which the 28 L. R. A.

three notes of Mellor & Hoxie were discounted was an entire contract, and that appellee had no right to rescind as to the $5,430 note, and retain the proceeds of the two $3,000 notes. It is true, as stated by counsel for appellee, that the general rule is that, when a party wishes to rescind an entire contract, he must rescind it in toto or not at all. Harzfeld v. Converse, 105 Ill. 534. But it is not to be overlooked that this is a rule of construction, based upon the intention of the parties to the contract, and not a rule of law controlling that intention. 2 Parsons, Cont. 521. Conceding that the discounting of the notes in question constituted a contract between appellee and Weed & Co., it does not appear from the record, nor is it claimed, that Weed & Co. have treated or sought to treat the contract as entire and indivisible. On the other hand, it does appear that the $5,430 note was returned to them by appellee, with a letter informing them that, having heard of the failure of Hoxie & Mellor, the makers of the notes, the amount thereof had been deducted from their account, etc. Weed & Co. on September 6, 1890, sent this note back to appellee, who, on the 8th, again returned it to Weed & Co., who, it seems, retained it. The letter of Weed & Co. of the 6th, or their purpose in returning the note, is not shown. Nor does it appear that they then or afterwards asserted or undertook to assert under the contract any right against appellee. In the absence of any proof to the contrary, it may, we think, be said that Weed & Co. by their silence have themselves elected to treat the contract as rescinded as to the $5,430 note. If A. Weed & Co. have acquiesced in the rescission of the contract as to the $5,430 note by appellee, it cannot be in the logic of things that appellant can succeed to any greater rights under the contract than A. Weed & Co., who, as we have seen, in the absence of countervailing proof on that question, have elected to acquiesce in the rescission. Appellant being under no constraint, in order to protect its own interest or rights, to pay the debt of A. Weed & Co. to appellee, but having, as will be seen, paid the same voluntarily, could not be subrogated to the rights of A. Weed & Co. in the premises. Hough v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 57 Ill. 818, 11 Am. Rep. 18; Young v. Morgan, 89 Ill. 199; Beaver v. Slanker, 94 Ill. 175.

But were the foregoing considerations not warranted by this record, we think, under the facts in this case, that the discounting of the notes constituted an apportionable contract. The record shows that in its letter of September 1, 1890 (in reply to one from A. Weed & Co. containing the proposition for discounting $15,000 of Hoxie-Mellor paper), appellee said that it could "use, say, $10,000 of the paper" referred to "from September 1st to 4th," and that, under this arrangement, the three separate notes above mentioned were discounted by appellee. It is not contended that appellee had not the right, had the integrity of the notes at the time been questionable, to have refused to discount any or all of them. Each note constituted, in and of itself, a separate and independent contract, upon a distinct consideration, and the books of the bank show that they were discounted as separate and distinct entries. The rule as laid down by Mr. Parsons (vol. 2, *517) is: "If the part to be performed by one party consists of several distinct and separate items, and the price to be paid by the other is apportioned to each item to be performed, or is left to be implied by law, such a contract will generally be held to be severable." And Mr. Wharton (Cont. § 748) says: "When a consideration is divisible, and the price can be apportioned, then, if a distinct divisible portion of the consideration fails, the price paid for such portion can be recovered back;" and that, "in cases . . . in which the consideration is divisible, the purchaser may elect to take what can be delivered to him, and in such case, if the purchase money has been paid, he can recover back the excess, or, if there has been no payment, defend pro tanto." See cases in notes. In A. K. Young & C. Mfg. Co. v. Wakefield, 121 Mass. 91, where the action was an account for certain India-rubber goods sold, and the price of each article, and discount from the gross sum, were stated in account, the court, in passing upon the question of whether the contract was entire or divisible, said: "We do not deem this contract to have been an entire one. That a contract should be of that character, it is not sufficient merely that the subjects of purchase are included in the same instrument of conveyance. If but one consideration is paid for all the articles so that it is not possible to determine the amount of consideration paid for each, the contract is entire." Miner v. Bradley, 22 Pick. 457.

When many different articles are bought at the same time for distinct prices, even if they are articles of the same general description, so that a warranty that they are all of a particular quality would apply to each, the contract is not entire, but is in effect a separate contract for each article sold. Johnson v. Johnson, 8 Bos. & P. 162; Miner v. Bradley, supra.

To the same effect is the doctrine stated in Wooten v. Walters, 110 N. C. 251, where the sale was of a stock of merchandise and land. It was there said that, "though a number of things be bought together without fixing an entire price for the whole, but the price of each article is to be ascertained by a rate or measure as to the several articles, or when the things are of different kinds, though a total price is named, but a certain price is affixed to each thing, the contract in such cases may be treated as a separate contract for each article, although they all be included in one instrument of conveyance, or by one contract;" citing Johnson v. Johnson and Miner v. Bradley, supra. See also Hill v. Reeve, 11 Met. 268; Cushing v. Rice, 46 Me. 302, 71 Am. Dec. 579; Preston v. Spaulding, 120 Ill. 208.

We are, however, referred by counsel for appellant to the case of Hargfeld v. Converse, supra, as maintaining a contrary view. This is a misapprehension. That case falls clearly within the rule, announced in the Massachusetts and other cases, that where "the purchase is of goods as a particular lot, . . . or the number of barrels in which the goods are packed, the contract is held to be entire." A. K. Young & C. Mfg. Co. v. Wakefield, supra, and cases therein collated. Moreover, at the time of the discounting of said notes, Weed & Co. had overdrawn their account with appellee $5,760.57. By the judgments of the circuit and appellate courts, the controverted question of fact as to fraud on the part of Weed & Co. in the transaction is conclusively settled, and that such fraud was consummated before the payment of Weed & Co.'s overdrafts. This being so, appellee would be excused from surrendering up to Weed & Co. the two $3,000 notes. Preston v. Spaulding, supra, and cases cited. We are therefore of opinion that appellee had the right to rescind the contract, as it did, by returning to Weed & Co. the $5,430 note, and charging the same back to their account.

It is also insisted that, although appellee had the right to partially rescind the contract as against Weed & Co. it could not legally exercise such right as against appellant, it being a bona fide holder of the $3,000 check in question, drawn by Weed & Co. on appellee. It appears that about September 2, 1890, appellee sent to appellant for collection and returns a $3,000 note, then due, against Hoxie & Mellor, owned by appellee, and upon which Weed & Co. were indorsers. On that day Weed & Co. gave appellant the check in question, drawn on appellee for the amount of the note, which was at once canceled by appellant and surrendered to Weed & Co. Appellant received the check as cash, and remitted the proceeds, less charges, to appellee, by draft on the Merchants' Bank of Chicago. This remittance was received by appellee on September 3d, and paid. On the next day, about noon, the check sued on was presented to appellee for payment, which was refused. Appellee, in the mean time, between the receipt of the remittance and presentation of the check for payment, having become apprised of the business failure of Hoxie & Mellor and the fraud of Weed & Co., had charged back to Weed & Co.'s account, and returned to them, the said $5,430 note, less discount ($85.69), leaving a balance to the credit of Weed & Co. of $144.77, only, when the check was presented. It is not shown or pretended that appellant, in making collection of said note, was authorized by appellee to receive in payment thereof anything but money. When appellant received the note from appellee for collection, it then and thereby became the agent of appellee for that purpose; and the law is well settled that, unless such agent is specially authorized so to do, he has no right to accept in payment of his principal's debt anything in lieu of money. Mathews v. Hamilton, 23 Ill. 470; Ward v. Smith, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 447, 19 L. ed 207; Howard v. Chapman, 4 Car. & P. 508; Story, Prom. Notes, 7th ed. §§ 115-389, and notes. Being authorized to receive money only, the agent has no implied power to receive a check in payment (Hall v. Storrs, 7 Wis. 258); and where the collection agent, not being thereto authorized, accepts in payment of his principal's demand a check, or depreciated currency, and loss ensues thereby, he must bear it. Ward v. Smith, supra; Morse, Banks & Banking, 481, 482; Harlan v. Ely, 68 Cal. 523.

But it is claimed that the drawing of the check by Weed & Co. on appellee operated as an assignment to appellant of so much of the fund on deposit, against which it was drawn, as was necessary to pay it. As between the drawer and drawee, this is doubtless correct. Union Nat. Bank v. Oceana County Bank, 80 Ill. 212, 23 Am. Rep. 185. But, in order to charge the bank with the amount, it is indispensable that the check be first presented to it for payment, or some other act done equivalent thereto. This rule was announced in the early case of Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 85, where it was held that the check of a depositor on his banker, delivered to another for value, transfers to the payee therein, and his assigns, so much of the deposit as the check calls for, and that, when presented to the bank for payment, the banker becomes liable to the holder for the amount thereof, provided the drawer has at the time sufficient funds on deposit to pay it. And this doctrine has been subsequently reaffirmed in numerous decided cases in this court, among which see Chicago Marine &

F. Ins. Co. v. Stanford, 28 Ill. 168, 81 Am. Dec. 270; Bickford v. First Nat. Bank of Chicago, 42 Ill. 238, 89 Am. Dec. 436; Fourth Nat. Bank of Chicago v. City Nat. Bank of Grand Rapids, 68 Ill. 898; Metropolitan Nat. Bank of Chicago v. Jones, 137 Ill. 634, 12 L. R. A. 492.

That appellee had, between the time of making the check and its presentation for payment, on deposit to the credit of Weed & Co., funds sufficient to meet the check, can have no bearing on the question. Appellee had no notice of the existence of the check until presented for payment, and the deposit against which it was drawn having been, as we have seen, depleted by proper charges and deductions until only a meager sum remained, there was no sufficient fund left on deposit out of which it could be paid, and the check was therefore rightfully dishonored. Other errors are assigned, which have been carefully considered, but, in view of what has been said, no useful purpose would be served by a discussion of them.

The judgment of the appellate court will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT

IRON CITY NATIONAL BANK v. FORT PITT NATIONAL BANK, Appt.

(159 Pa. 46.)

1. A payor of forged paper is not exempted from the consequences of his act by the Act of 1849, § 10, providing for the recovery of money paid on forged signatures, if the result of a recovery would be that his own negligence would occasion loss to the payee. That act only applies in cases of due care on his part, and where his recovery will not cause loss to the payee.

2. Recovery by the payor of a forged check will not be permitted under Act of 1849, § 10, providing for recovery of money paid on forged signatures, if the check was paid and apparently dismissed from further attention until five days later, when the payee, after parting with the funds, started an investigation which disclosed the forgery.

(December 30, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 3, for Allegheny County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back the amount which plaintiff had paid to defendant on a forged check. Reversed.

Plaintiff's statement set out that

"On December, 19, 1892, the defendant was the holder of a certain check or bill of exchange, dated December 17, 1892, purporting to be drawn by the firm of G. Dice & Co., on the Iron City National Bank of Pittsburgh, for the sum of $852, of which a true copy is hereto attached and made part of this statement. This check, on December 17, 1892, was deposited by the payees thereof, Messrs. Gutman & Howard, with the defendant bank. Said defendant was not then a member of the Pittsburgh Clearing House Association of Banks, but it cleared through the Citizens' National Bank of Pittsburgh. The said defendant then and there indorsed said check and delivered it to the Citizens' National Bank as its agent, and said Citizens' National Bank, acting as the agent of the said defendant bank, presented the said check on December 19, 1892, to the Iron City National Bank of Pittsburgh for payment, and said Iron City National Bank then and there paid the said check to the said Citizens' National Bank acting for and as agent of the said defendant bank, and the said sum so paid ($852) was placed to the credit of the defendant bank by its said agent.

"On December 24, 1892, the president of the defendant bank called upon the plaintiff bank and inquired as to said check and when it was paid and whether it was good, and thereupon the cashier of the plaintiff bank produced said check and said cashier and the president of the defendant bank called on that day upon G. Dice & Co., the alleged drawers of the check, and were informed by them that the signature of the drawers of the check was forged, and plaintiff now avers said signature was a forgery. This was the first information or knowledge the plaintiff had of the forgery and immediately and on December 24, 1892, the plaintiff demanded the repayment of said money from said defendant bank and offered to return to it said check. This demand and offer was renewed December 27, 1892, and to each the defendant bank made no definite reply, saying it would answer later. On Thursday, January 5, 1893, defendant bank refused to repay said money or any part thereof."

In defense it was alleged that the indorsees of the check in suit were depositors in the defendant bank, having been there introduced by a reputable person. On December 17, 1892, they deposited three checks, which were carried to their account. These checks were duly presented to the clearing house and paid, and on Monday the depositors drew a check, which was duly paid, and which withdrew substantially all of the deposit. On December 24, the Masonic Bank, upon which one of the three checks was drawn, notified defendant that that check was a forgery. Acting on this information, the president of defendant made inquiry of plaintiff as to whether or not the check in suit was genuine, and upon inquiry it was discovered that it, also, was a forgery. In the meantime, the depositors of the checks had disappeared.

The affidavit of defense continued as follows:

"The defendant avers that the said plaintiff bank was negligent in making payment of said check, when, as alleged, the signature of the drawer thereof, a depositor in plaintiff bank, was forged and counterfeited; and that said plaintiff bank was further negligent in not giving due and timely notice of the forgery of said check, and that said notice, so as aforesaid given, was not within a reasonable and proper time; and that by reason of the said negligence and laches on the part of said plaintiff bank, the said plaintiff is not entitled to recover the amount of said check or any part thereof from the defendant bank."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Knox & Reed and Patterson & Smith, for appellant:

The Act of 1849, allowing the bank of the depositor to ignore precautions as to verification of his signature, should be strictly construed, and if the bank so paying desires to avail itself of that act, it should show prompt notice of the dishonor of the bill or check.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The argument of the learned counsel for the plaintiff meets the exigency of his case courageously, and stands squarely on the proposition that "the effect of the Act [of 5th April 1849, Pub. Laws, 426] is undoubtedly to declare that there is no legal duty imposed upon the payor towards the holder of the check to know the genuineness of the signature,—whether it be the signature of the depositor, or of some other party; and, there being no such legal duty, of course, the payor cannot be guilty of negligence vesting any right against him in the holder." There can be no question that this is the necessary result of the construction contended for,—that the act abrogates all the rules of the common law relative to the payment of forged commercial paper. There is no logical stopping place short of such proposition. A bank, therefore, may pay a check, or certify it as good, no matter how negligently, and the holder may, on the faith of such action, part with his goods or his land, and yet have no claim on the bank, or, if he has been paid, may be liable to refund the money. Still more, any man may, no matter how carelessly, pay a note purporting to bear his own signature, lay it away, and yet, at any time within six years, bring suit, and recover back the money, on the ground that the signature was a forgery. The disastrous consequences of the introduction of such a rule into the law of commercial paper—a law founded throughout the civilized world on the utmost promptness, diligence, and good faith—should warn us to look closely into the true intent of a statute before pronouncing that the legislature meant it to have such effect. The Act of 1849 is an omnibus act, made up of the most heterogeneous materials. Sections 7 to 11, inclusive, are the only ones having any relation to the present subject, and they provide that no defense for want of proper and timely demand of payment or acceptance, or proper and timely protest for, or notice of, nonacceptance or nonpayment, shall avail, unless the proper place shall be distinctly set forth in the instrument; that, when such place is omitted, demand and notice may be made at any time before suit, and the instrument shall be held payable, protestable, etc., at the place where they are dated; and that all bills, drafts, etc., drawn in the state, but payable out of it, with added exchange, or with "in current funds," or such like qualifications, superadded," shall be negotiable. Section 10, with which we are particularly concerned, provides for the recovery of money paid on forged signatures, whether of drawers, acceptors, or indorsers. In these sections, thus briefly summarized, there is nothing indicative of an intent to revolutionize the law-merchant with regard to negotiable paper, but rather to relieve against some hardships in practice which that law gave rise to. The strictness of demand and notice, which was easily complied with when transactions by bills and checks were comparatively few, and the parties known to each other, became often of great difficulty in the extended business of modern times. So undesirable, however, was even this departure from the general commercial law found to be, that sections 7, 8, and 9 as to demand and notice, were repealed, after only two years' experience, by the Act of April 8, 1851, Pub. Laws, 898. At common law, acceptance of a bill was an admission of the drawer's signature, and the acceptor having thus given it currency, could not set up that it was a forgery (Byles, Bills, 199); and payment of a forged check or bill could only be recovered back by giving notice on the same day. Id. 230. But, even with prompt notice, any fault or negligence of the party paying would prevent his recovery; and it has been held, from Lord Mansfield down, that an acceptor is bound to know the handwriting of the drawer, and that it is rather by his fault or negligence, than by a mistake, if he pays on a forged signature, Id. 334. So strictly was this rule held with regard to a bank, that in our own case of Levy v. Bank of United States, 1 Binn. 27, the mere entry of the check as cash in a depositor's book was held to be equivalent to payment, and to make the bank liable to the depositor for the amount, though the forgery was discovered, and notice given the depositor, the same day, and there was no proof that the depositor had, in the mean time, lost anything, or been prejudiced in any way by the bank's action. Shippen, Ch. J., said: "The acceptor is presumed to know the drawer's handwriting, and, by his acceptance, to take this knowledge upon himself." The act of paying was thus held to be a conclusive estoppel, without reference to any question of negligence or delay, or consequent loss to the other party. This was the kind of hardship which the Act of 1849 was intended to remedy, and this is the extent of its operation in regard to a bank or other drawee, paying on a forged signature of the drawer. The mere fact of payment is no longer, eo instanti and of itself, a bar to the recovery of the money; but the principles of the commercial law are still applicable, and there is still the same necessity as before for care, diligence, and proper notice, under the settled rules of the law of negotiable paper. Such has been the construction of the act heretofore. Thus in Roth v. Crissey, 80 Pa. 145, and Rick v. Kelly, Id. 527, it was held that notice of the forgery within reasonable time, and an offer to return the note, are necessary to enable the party paying it to recover. In the former case, the court below charged the jury that the plaintiff was bound to pursue his remedy with due diligence, and this was affirmed. In Rick v. Kelly it is said that the Act of 1849 really accomplished little, as, for the most part, it was only declaratory of the former law; and, in Chambers v. Union Nat. Bank, 78 Pa. 205, the necessity of diligence was admitted, though a delay of sixteen days in the discovery of the forgery was held to be excused by the circumstances, notice having been given immediately on the discovery.

The two cases specially relied on by appellee are not in conflict with this view of the statute. They are entirely sound on their own facts, and what is said in them must be read with reference to the facts. In Tradesmen's Nat. Bank v. Third Nat. Bank, 66 Pa. 435, the defendant had collected the money as agent for another bank, and had credited it in the other's account. Under Levy v. Bank of United States this would have been equivalent to actual payment, and would have fixed the defendant's liability to its principal; but it was held that the Act of 1849 now prevented the mere book entry from being conclusive, and, as the defendant could pay the money back to the plaintiff without loss to itself, it was bound to do so. But in so holding this court said: "The money received is in the hands of the defendants, and we are not called upon to decide what would have been their situation if it had been actually paid over by them." In Corn Exch. Nat. Bank v. National Bank of The Republic, 78 Pa. 233, the court below had charged that, "under the Act of 1849, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless there has been negligence on its part, and through that negligence the defendant has been put in a position to lose by paying this money to plaintiff." The judgment was reversed, not because this charge was wrong, but because the evidence of negligence was not sufficient; Paxson, J., saying that it was "not necessary to express an opinion as to how far negligence is a defense under the act, for the reason that there was not sufficient evidence upon this point to justify submitting it to the jury." It is always a good defense that the loss complained of was the result of the complainant's own fault or neglect, and it would require a statute in very explicit terms to do away with so universal a rule of law, founded on so incontestable a principle of justice.

The result of the Act of 1849, and the cases upon this subject, is that the mere acceptance or payment of forged paper is no longer of itself, a bar to the recovery of the money by the party paying even though it be a bank or other drawee. Nor is such party absolutely bound, as at common law, to discover and give notice of the forgery on the very day of payment. All that he need do, in any case, is to give notice promptly, according to the circumstances and the usage of the business, and, unless the position of the party receiving the money has been altered for the worse in the mean time, it would seem that the date of notice is not material. But, on the other hand, the statute does not dispense with the necessity of care and diligence on the part of the payor, nor exempt him from the consequences of his own negligence, if thereby loss would accrue to the other party. In the present case the plaintiff received the check on December 19, paid it, entered it on the books, and then apparently dismissed it from further attention. In all probability the forgery would not have been discovered until the deposit book of the supposed drawers, Dice & Co., came in for settlement, had not the defendant's officer, on December 24, called, and started the investigation which resulted in the discovery. This must be pronounced a want of due diligence. The drawee is still presumed to know the drawer's signature, and, in the language of Chief Justice Shippen, supra, "to take this knowledge upon himself," though the first slip is no longer conclusive against him. But, having finished his examination, dismissed the subject from further attention, and allowed five days to elapse, during which the party receiving the money has paid it out in reliance upon the plaintiff's act, the latter cannot be allowed to say that he acted with due diligence and absence of negligence. As the facts are all clearly set out in the statement, there is nothing to go to a jury.

Judgment reversed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

Lorenzo COREY et al., Appts.,

v.

W. W. WADSWORTH.

(.....Ala.....)

1. One of the governing body of an insolvent corporation cannot be made a preferred creditor for an unsecured debt.
2. A corporation is insolvent within the rule as to preferring creditors where its assets are insufficient to pay its debts and it has ceased to do business or is in the act of taking a step which will practically incapacitate it for conducting the corporate enterprise with reasonable prospect of success or its embarrassments are such that early suspension and failure must ensue.

(June 14, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the City Court of Decatur overruling a demurrer to the bill in a suit to set aside a pretended sale of the stock in trade of the Decatur Building Supply Company to defendant Corey, its president, as a preference in fraud of creditors. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Brickell, Harris & Eyster for appellants.

Mr. E. W. Godbey, for appellee:

Corey's position as director and president imposed upon him the obligations of a trustee to the corporation and its stockholders. But when the corporation's insolvency supervened, neither the corporation nor its stockholders, as such, could have any pecuniary interest whatever in its property. The officers now became trustees for the creditors, who are the only class who can honestly have any actual interest in its assets. If the officer holds a debt against the company, he is forbidden by all the laws of trust and by every consideration of public policy and sound reason from preferring himself.

183 Ill. 81; Sicardi v. Keystone Oil Co. 149 Pa. 148.

The pretended liability ostensibly extinguishing the sale by the insolvent corporation to its president, Corey, was not, strictly speaking, a contingent one; but when the corporation became hopelessly insolvent, the contingent liability of Corey as a surety became, to a great extent, fixed and absolute. A large number of the adjudged cases denying the director's right to a preference arose upon a state of facts similar to the present—the director being only a surety.

Olney v. Conanicut Land Co., Drury v. Milwaukee & S. R. Co., Howe v. Sanford Fork & Tool Co., Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co. and Roseboom v. Whittaker, supra.

In addition to being surety of the supply company, with respect to the debt it pretended to be owing the bank, and president and director of the supply company, Corey was also a heavy stockholder, and a director in the creditor bank; and when Corey took the goods in payment of the debt due the bank, he not only secured a preference to himself individually but also at the same time and by the same act, secured the preference and the payment of an otherwise almost worthless debt to the fiscal institution, in which he was very largely interested.

If the right of preference be accorded, no outside dealer would extend credit to a corporation, since the very wares he might sell could and would be used to pay the director, whose debt was kept secret, or simulated, to the total exclusion of the general outside creditors, who may be kept in ignorance of the claims of directors.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The present case is an appeal from an interlocutory order of the city court, sitting in equity, by which Corey's demurrer to Wadsworth's bill was overruled. The case presents a question of very grave importance to the commercial world. The substantial facts of the case made by the bill are as follows: At a time anterior to the latter part of the year 1887 the "Decatur Building Supply Company" was incorporated under the general laws of Alabama, Decatur being the place of its business habitation. Wadsworth, the complainant, at various times between the latter part of the year 1887 and May 19, 1888, sold and shipped to the Decatur Building Supply Company lumber and shingles, and at various dates drew on the corporation for payment at ninety and one hundred and twenty days. The several drafts were accepted, but have not been paid. The aggregate sum of the several accepted drafts is $1,400, all of which was long past due when this bill was filed, in January, 1891. The bill then charges that Lorenzo Corey, one of the defendants, became a stockholder in said Decatur Building Supply Company, "in the early part of February, 1888, and thereafter he became a member of the board of directors, and president of said company, which position he held at the time of the occurrence of the matters and transactions hereinafter complained of, and has never resigned or been removed therefrom; and that at the time he so became connected with the said Decatur Building Supply Company the same was prosperous, and in a solvent condition." The bill then avers that about the 15th of May, 1888, the said Corey, together with others, officers and stockholders of said corporation, entered into an agreement with the Exchange Bank, by which they bound themselves, as sureties or guarantors of said Decatur Building Supply Company, for the payment to the bank of such indebtedness as the building supply company might incur, not exceeding $6,000. It was then charged that before the end of June, 1888, it was "pretended" that the bank had lent to the building supply company said sum of $6,000, and had taken its notes therefor, due at sixty and ninety days.

NOTE.—The above case is clearly in accord with the weight of authority on the question of the validity of preferences to directors by the insolvent corporation. For the conflict of decisions and the 23 L. R. A.

The remaining charges of the bill, material to the case in hand, may be summarized as follows: One Hay, brother-in-law of Corey, was general manager of the building supply company, and was its vice-president. From 19th to 23d of July, 1888, said company, through Corey and Hay, sold ("pretended to make sale of") a large part of its stock in trade to Corey, in consideration that he would and did assume and pay the said debt of $6,000 to the Exchange Bank, of which Corey and other officers and stockholders of the building supply company had become guarantors. The said debt was presently paid by Corey, and he took possession of the stock in trade so purchased, and removed it to a building of his own. This was done long before the maturity of the debt to the bank, of which Corey and other officers of the supply company were guarantors. The bill then charges that "at the time of the aforesaid pretended purchase by Corey of Decatur Building Supply Company it [the corporation] was hopelessly insolvent, its liabilities due and past due being greater by far than its assets; and within three or four days after the consummation of the transfer to Corey, on, to wit, 26th day of July, 1888, the said Decatur Building Supply Company, acting through said Corey as its president, assigned all its remaining assets to a trustee, for the benefit of its general creditors, whose just claims and demands against said company amounted to more than twenty-two thousand dollars; to pay which property was assigned of value not sufficient to pay more than fifteen per cent." Corey and the Decatur Building Supply Company are made defendants to the bill.

Before the demurrer was filed to the bill it was amended so as to make it a "bill in behalf of complainant and all other creditors, of the building supply company who may come in and make themselves parties complainant hereto, and assume their proportionate share of the costs." Under this amendment, S. Truscott came in by petition, and united in the prayer for relief.

The bill in a general way charges that Corey took overpay in the matter of the guaranty for which he, with others, was bound. It also charges that the money advanced or paid by the bank "was paid not to the Decatur Building Supply Company, but to the officers, making the guaranty of the loan, for their own emolument." These questions need no extended mention here. If the supply company did not get the benefit of the money advanced by the bank, of course it was under no obligation to indemnify the guarantors of the loan; and in taking pay from the supply company on that account Corey misappropriated the assets, and rendered himself liable to the creditors of the insolvent corporation, to the extent of the misappropriation. So, if he overpaid himself for the liability he was under as guarantor to the bank, the same rule will apply to the excess. It is against the policy of the law to permit the president or any director of a corporation to realize a personal profit, or side speculation, in any dealing he may have with the corporation. 1 Waterman, Corp. § 163. These matters, however, are not pressed in argument, and we will not consider them further.

The question for our consideration, briefly stated, is this: Can a member of the governing body of an insolvent corporation, of which corporation he is a nonsecured creditor, be made a preferred creditor in the administration or disposition of the corporate assets, or must the assets be distributed pro rata among all the nonsecured creditors? Of course, if valid liens have been created, supervening insolvency cannot destroy or impair them. The question in this case has been industriously and ably argued on both sides. It is the settled law of this state that a debtor,—a natural person,—though insolvent, may, of his effects whether money or property, pay one or more creditors in full, although he thereby disables himself to pay his other debts. There are conditions or limitations to this right. The paying debtor must not by the transaction secure any benefit to himself, other than the discharge of the obligation he rested under to pay the debt. If paid in property, it must be at its reasonably fair market value. If the property be in value, so much in excess of the debt paid with it as to necessitate a substantial payment to the insolvent debtor therefor, and such substantial excess is so paid, this is treated as securing a benefit to the debtor, by enabling him to shuffle such excess out of the reach of his other creditors; and the transaction is fraudulent. If the preference of one or more creditors by an insolvent debtor can withstand these tests, the motive or purpose of the debtor in giving the preference becomes an immaterial inquiry. 8 Brickell, Dig. p. 517, §§ 187, 188; Hodges v. Coleman, 76 Ala. 103; Meyer v. Sulzbacher, Id. 120; Shealy v. Edwards, 78 Ala. 176, 49 Am. Rep. 48; Levy v. Williams, 79 Ala. 171; Leinkauff v. Frenkle, 80 Ala. 136; Tyron v. Flournoy, Id. 321; Montgomery v. Bayliss, 96 Ala. 342; Ellison v. Moses, 95 Ala. 221; Tiffany v. Boatman's Sav. Inst. 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 875, 21 L. ed. 868; Grant v. First Nat. Bank of Monmouth, 97 U. S. 80, 21 L. ed. 271.

There are many authorities which hold that a solvent and going corporation can secure a member of the governing board in the payment of a debt due him; and the fact that the corporation becomes insolvent afterwards does not impair the validity of his security. We are not inclined to question the correctness of this principle, but we will explain hereafter more fully what we mean by a solvent corporation. O'Conner Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Coosa Furnace Co. 95 Ala. 614; Lexington, L. F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Page, 17 B. Mon. 412, 66 Am. Dec. 165; Reichwald v. Commercial Hotel Co. 106 Ill. 439; Paulding v. Chrome Steel Co. 94 N. Y. 334; Twin Lick Oil Co. of West Virginia v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587, 23 L. ed. 328.

There are some authorities which hold that an insolvent corporation may make an assignment, preferring even its own directors, or members of its governing body, if they be creditors of the corporation; that the directors have the same rights as creditors of natural persons have, and that the relation they sustain to the corporation and to its assets does not impair that right, if in fact their claims be bona fide debts of the corporation. Whitwell v. Warner, 20 Vt. 425; Buell v. Buckingham, 16 Iowa, 284, 85 Am. Dec. 516; Garrett v. Burlington Plow Co. 70 Iowa, 697, 59 Am. Rep. 461; Planters Bank of Farmville v. Whittle, 78 Va. 787; Burr v. McDonald, 8 Gratt. 215.

The governing body or directory of a corporation holds the capital stock of a corporation in the confidence that it will be preserved and administered primarily for the benefit of creditors and secondarily for the benefit of the stockholders. Friend v. Powers, 93 Ala. 114. As long ago as 1824, Justice Story, in Wood v. Dummer, 8 Mason, 308, said: "It appears to me very clear upon general principles as well as the legislative intention, that the capital stock of banks is to be deemed a pledge or trust fund for the payment of the debts contracted by the bank." In Bank of St. Marys v. St. John, 25 Ala. 566-612, this court, in 1854, used this language: "The capital stock of the bank, with all its property and assets, is to be regarded as a trust fund for the payment of creditors; and the stockholders, directors, and agents of the bank are trustees for their benefit, and, as such may be made to discover and account in chancery." So, in Bradley v. Farwell, 1 Holmes, C. C. 438, the court said: "The relation between the directors of a corporation and its stockholders is that of trustee and cestui que trust." See Wait, Insolvent Corp. p. 507, note 1, and citations; Elyton Land Co. v. Birmingham Warehouse & Elevator Co. 92 Ala. 407, 12 L. R. A. 307.

Tenn. Ch. 502, that able chancellor, Cooper, said: "Nor is it denied that our decisions have settled that the assets of an insolvent corporation constitute, under our laws, a trust fund for the payment of creditors of the corporation, in the order of priority fixed by law, and, if there be no priority, then pro rata; and that no amount of diligence on the part of one or more of the creditors can defeat the right of others to such distribution. . . . The object is, in certain contingencies, to prevent unseemly scrambles, and to secure, what equity delights in,—equality of rights among all who are equally meritorious."

We have cited authorities which affirm the right of a director of an insolvent corporation to have himself made a preferred creditor in a case such as we have in hand. There are authorities the other way. In 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 787, it is said: "The equitable interests of the shareholders and creditors are altered by the insolvency; and the directors or managing agents, who originally stood in the fiduciary relation to the company, become placed in a fiduciary relation to its creditors. The powers of management vested in the directors of an insolvent corporation which has ceased to carry on business are solely powers to manage the assets in trust for its creditors and for their benefit. It has been held, therefore, that the directors of an insolvent corporation are bound to manage the remaining assets with strict regard for the interests of its creditors. . . . Directors of an insolvent corporation, who have claims against the company as creditors, must share ratably with the other creditors in a distribution of the company's assets. They cannot secure to themselves any advantage or preference over other creditors by using their powers as directors for that purpose. These powers are held by them in trust for all the creditors, and cannot be used for their own benefit." In Richards v. New Hampshire Ins. Co., 43 N. H. 263, the headnote expresses the principle decided in the following language: "Directors and managers of insolvent corporations are trustees of the funds, as well for the creditors as for the corporation, and are bound to apply them pro rata, and cannot use them to exonerate themselves to the injury of other creditors." In the case of Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co., 64 Wis. 639, the court decided that "the directors and officers of an insolvent corporation are trustees for the creditors, and must manage its property and assets with strict regard to their interests; and, if they are themselves creditors, while the insolvent corporation is under their management they cannot secure to themselves any preference or advantage over other creditors." In Sworny v. Wheeling Grape Sugar & Refining Co., 80 W. Va. 448, it was held that "directors of a corporation are trustees for the corporation, and within the rule that one holding a fiduciary relation to trust property cannot, either directly or indirectly, become the purchaser of such property, or transfer it to his own use, or for his own benefit, and, if he does, the sale or transfer is voidable, and will be set aside at the mere pleasure of the beneficiaries, though such fiduciary may have paid full price and gained no advantage." In Beach v. Miller, 130 Ill. 162, it was said: "The directors of an insolvent corporation are trustees of its assets for its creditors, and cannot give the funds away, or sell them at a sacrifice in the interest of others, even with the consent of the stockholders; and, if themselves creditors, they cannot receive any advantage or preference in the payment of their claims at the expense of the other creditors." To the same effect, and by the same court, is the case of Roseboom v. Whittaker, 132 Ill. 81. In Olney v. Connecticut Land Co., 16 R. I. 597, 5 L. R. A. 361, it was held that "the directors of an insolvent corporation are trustees for the creditors of the corporation, and they cannot obtain priority over a creditor by taking mortgages to themselves to secure them for advances and for their indorsement of the notes of the corporation, after the creditor has brought suit, and when the company is insolvent." In Hove v. Sanford Fork & Tool Co., 44 Fed. Rep. 231, it was decided that "where a corporation, while still a going concern, is insolvent, a mortgage on its property, executed to secure the directors, who are liable as indorsers for it to a large amount, is invalid as to general creditors, and that though the mortgage was procured by the directors without any actual fraudulent intent." In Consolidated Tank Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co., 45 Fed. Rep. 7, the "directors of an embarrassed corporation, holding claims against it which they wished to protect, had the notes of the company payable to themselves drawn and antedated, and procured them to be discounted by defendant bank. They then caused to be executed a deed of trust conveying all the assets of the company as security for these notes among others. Held, in a proceeding by unsecured creditors to set it aside, that, being a security for debts upon which the directors were themselves liable as indorsers, it was, in effect, a preference to themselves, and fraudulent and void." In 28 American Law Review No. 6, p. 1009, there is a strong article maintaining the same doctrine announced in the cases cited above, with a reference to many adjudged cases. See also, Jackson v. Ludeling, 38 U. S. 21 Wall. 616, 23 L. ed. 492; Dabney v. Bank of State of South Carolina, 8 S. C. N. S. 124; Drury v. Milwaukee & S. R. Co. 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 299, 19 L. ed. 40; Thorington v. Gould, 59 Ala. 461; Goodwin v. McGhee, 15 Ala. 232.

The question we have been considering is one of grave and growing importance in this state, and we have therefore felt it our duty to collate the authorities. It will be seen that the modern authorities, almost without exception, utter the same strong condemnatory language of any and all attempts by directors of an insolvent corporation to have themselves indemnified and preferred over the other creditors of the company. The assets are, in a sense, a trust fund in their hands for the payment of the corporation's debts, and it is both their moral and legal duty to maintain perfect equality in their administration and disbursement, at least to the extent that they cannot prefer themselves. We need go no further in this case. In looking into the authorities it will be seen that the right of the directors of an insolvent corporation to prefer themselves as creditors is withheld from them, not alone on the ground that the assets are a trust fund, of which they are trustees for the creditors. Notice is taken of the superior knowledge they necessarily have, and the great advantage this would and does give them in a race of diligence. But the principle extends further. In a conveyance by which they attempt to pay or secure themselves, that necessary element of all valid contracts—opposing interest in the seller and buyer—is wanting. They are both seller and buyer. Such transactions by a trustee are always voidable on the ground of public policy.

At what stage of a corporation's affairs must it be pronounced insolvent, so as to bring it within the principle we have declared? It is not enough that its assets are insufficient to meet all its liabilities if it be still prosecuting its line of business, with the prospect and expectation of continuing to do so; in other words, if it be, in good faith, what is sometimes called a "going" business or establishment. Many successful corporate enterprises, it is believed, have passed through crises, when their property and effects, if brought to present sale, would not have discharged all their liabilities in full. We feel safe in declaring that when a corporation's assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts, and it has ceased to do business, or has taken, or is in the act of taking, a step which will practically incapacitate it for conducting the corporate enterprise with reasonable prospects of success, or its embarrassments are such that early suspension and failure must ensue, then such corporation must be pronounced insolvent.

Under the definition we have given we hold that the sale charged in the bill to have been made by the Decatur Building Supply Company to Corey was, if the averments be true, an attempted preference by an insolvent corporation of a member of its governing board, and that he is chargeable as a trustee with the property and effects so received, or their value, for the equal benefit of all the creditors. The question we have been considering may possibly have been remotely touched in the case of Globe Iron Roofing & Corrugating Co. v. Thacher, 87 Ala. 458.

To the extent of the conflict, if there be such, the present opinion must prevail.

The decretal order of the chancellor overruling the demurrer to the bill must be affirmed.

v.

Elizabeth LEIPF.

(.....Ala.....)

1. That a woman made sole defendant in an action for tort was living with her husband is no ground for abatement of the action under a statute relieving the husband from liability for torts of his wife in which he does not participate, and making her suable therefor as if she were sole.
2. Error in sustaining a demurrer to a special plea is cured, if, under the general issue, proof is introduced and the jury passes upon the identical question sought to be raised by such plea.
3. Special negligence in permitting a vicious dog to escape from an enclosure is not necessary to create a liability for keeping such a dog with knowledge of its propensities, when he escapes and inflicts injuries.
4. A wife is not liable for harboring a vicious dog on her own premises where her husband lives with her, although the statutes secure to married women their separate estates and relieve the husband from all liability for his wife's torts "in the commission of which he does not participate," since the dog cannot be kept without his consent and participation, and must be charged to his account as the head of the family.

(February 7, 1894.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Mobile County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries inflicted by a dog, for the safe keeping of which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Measrs. Overall, Bestor & Gray, for appellant:

The evidence shows that the appellant was not the keeper of the dog, and therefore not liable.

Whittemore v. Thomas, 158 Mass. 847.

There is no evidence showing neglect or want of care by appellant or any servant or other person connected with the household in the keeping of the dog. At the time of the biting and injury to appellee sued for, appellant was a married woman, and if there was any wrongful act in the keeping of the dog, the husband was the party liable, and not appellant.

Code of 1896, § 2845; Bibb v. State, 94 Ala. 83; Williamson v. State, 16 Ala. 481; Douge v. Pearce, 13 Ala. 128; Seibert v. State, 40 Ala. 60;

NOTE.—Responsibility of a married woman for the use and safety of premises owned by her.

Upon the precise question involved in the principal case, the authorities do not seem to be harmonious, that case holding the wife not liable, while in the New York case of Quilty v. Battle, infra, the court declared the contrary.

In a recent case decided in the court of appeals of Colorado, the court held they were properly joined as defendants upon a question of a like nature. Hornbein v. Blanchard, infra.

And in a late Massachusetts case the question was stated to be one for the jury as to the ownership of the animal. McLaughlin v. Kemp, infra.

Upon the point of ownership, however, there would seem to be a conflict of opinion as to its pertinency, as shown in the Colorado case. Hornbein v. Blanchard, infra; McLaughlin v. Kemp, infra.

The New York cases place her responsibility purely upon the question of her right to act independently of her husband in all matters connected with her separate estate and as though she were husbandless. Quilty v. Battle, infra.

I. Illegal use of premises.

Where the wife was indicted under section 4800 of the Penal Code of Georgia, for keeping a place for gambling, it was held that she could not be found guilty, it appearing that the husband and wife resided together upon the premises, the court stating that where the husband and wife resided together in the house, no matter which of them owned or had rented the house, he was the head of the family and it was his duty, not hers, to prevent it, and that in order to render her criminally liable for permitting such act while he was present, it must appear affirmatively that she was active in granting permission, that if she were merely passive in the matter, although taking no measures to hinder or prevent the crime, she could not be convicted. Bell v. State (Ga.) April 10, 1893.

By § 4800 of the Penal Code of Georgia it is provided a feme covert or married woman acting under the threats, command, or coercion of her husband, shall not be found guilty of any crime or 23 L. R. A.

misdemeanor not punishable by death or perpetual imprisonment, but with this exception, the husband shall be prosecuted as principal and if convicted, shall receive the punishment which would otherwise have been inflicted on the wife if she had been found guilty, provided it appears from all the facts and circumstances of the case that violent threats, command, and coercion were used.

In Com. v. Wood, 97 Mass. 225, the husband was indicted for keeping a house of ill fame, and contended that he was not liable because the house was owned by his wife as her separate property and the business was carried on by her and she took the profits in which he did not participate. The court held that his liability depended upon the relations which he sustained to the household while he lived with the wife as her husband.

The doctrine of the common law is that by marriage the husband and wife become one person in law, that she is under his protection, influence, power, and authority, and that he is the head of the household. Com. v. Wood, supra.

How far he may exercise force in restraining her does not seem to be precisely settled, but he may exercise as much power as may be reasonably necessary to prevent her as well as other inmates of the house from making it a brothel. Ibid.

With regard to the recent legislature upon the position of married women, it was stated that the fact that the family lived in a house owned by the wife had never been regarded as affecting the rights and powers of the husband as head of the family, even though she might carry on a separate trade on her own account. Ibid.

The provisions of the statute relate to legitimate business and do not take away the husband's power to regulate his household, so far as to prevent the wife from carrying on an illegal trade. Ibid.

The above principles were followed by the court in Com. v. Carroll, 124 Mass. 30, where the husband was indicted for keeping and maintaining a tenement, used for the illegal sale and illegal keeping of intoxicating liquors.

The statutes which have been passed to enlarge the rights and privileges of married women, have Mulvey v. State, 43 Ala. 818; Lawson v. Lay, 24 Ala. 184; Quintan v. People, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 9.

The court should not have admitted evidence against the objection of defendant to show who was the owner of the premises on which the dog was kept.

Williamson v. State, supra.

The court should have given the charge requested by defendant, announcing the legal proposition that to render her liable the defendant should have had knowledge of the vicious propensity of the dog.

Smith v. Causey, 22 Ala. 571; Durden v. Barnett, 7 Ala. 169; Woolf v. Chaiker, 81 Conn. 121, 81 Am. Rep. 175; Cooley, Torts, pp. 342, 344, 345.

The general principle is that when a wife acts under the coercion of her husband in misdemeanors she is not to be held responsible for her acts.

Mulvey v. State, supra.

And it is not necessary that he should be present at the time of the act, if the jury are satisfied from the evidence that the act was done by his authority.

Seibert v. State, supra.

It is held in Douge v. Pierce, 18 Ala. 129, in an action of slander, that if the slander was uttered by the wife in the presence of the husband or by his coercion, and they are sued together, that the suit would abate on the death of the husband.

In detinue the husband was held liable for the wife's illegal detention of a slave. But he having died before recovery it was held that his personal representative was not liable for the wife's detention.

Lawson v. Lay, supra.

Messrs. Gregory L. Smith and H. T. Smith for appellee.

Stone, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by appellee to recover damages for alleged injuries suffered from the bite of a dog. The suit is against Ezra Strouse, and the complaint charges that "the defendant kept, and for a long time prior thereto had kept, a dog of savage and ferocious nature, and on, to wit, the 21st day of February, 1891, the defendant so negligently kept said dog that it escaped from the premises and attacked the plaintiff, and bit and tore and lacerated her, to her damage in the sum of . . . The plaintiff avers that made no change in the law with regard to the husband's right to control his own household. Com. v. Carroll, supra.

Prima facie the husband is able to prevent the wife from making an illegal use of the family dwelling-house. Ibid.

So again in Com. v. Pratt, 126 Mass. 462, where the wife kept intoxicating liquors for sale in a hotel hired by her, the court states that if at the time the liquors were kept for sale by the defendants the defendant husband actually aided or assisted her in such keeping, he should be convicted; that if the defendant without actually and actively aiding his wife in such keeping, was personally present and knew that his wife was so keeping the liquors, the presumption of law was that the wife acted under the coercion of her husband and that he was guilty and she was not; that this was true, although the place where the liquors were kept was her hotel and not merely a private dwelling house, but that the presumption might be rebutted by showing that the wife acted without the interference or control of the husband, and further that if the defendant directed or advised his wife to keep liquors for sale and he was living with her in her hotel and knew of the facts, the presumption was that she was acting under his coercion, and that he was guilty and she not.

So in Com. v. Barry, 115 Mass. 146, a case of illegal sale of liquor, the court sustained the same doctrine.

II. Safety of premises.

Where husband and wife were sued to recover damages, caused by the bite of a vicious dog, judgment was recovered against both from which the husband appealed, contending that the dog was the individual property of the wife and not his or theirs jointly, and that under the laws of the state the husband could not be held liable. The court held, it not being proved to whom the dog belonged, the judgment was properly rendered against them both; their liability was not alone dependent upon the ownership; the facts might render them or one of them liable regardless of the ownership; the keeping of the dog upon the premises exercising rights of ownership, knowing his ferocity, was sufficient to fix the liability. Hornbain v. Blanch- ard (Colo. App.) Nov. 27, 1893. See also Quilty v. Battle, and McLaughlin v. Kemp, infra.

Married women are now liable by statute, and an action may be prosecuted against them for torts committed, as if unmarried. Mayhew v. Burns, 163 Ind. 828.

Having been relieved of their disabilities, and empowered to own and control separate estates as femes sole, they take the right with all its incidents, and must therefore, like all other persons, use the property with due regard for the rights of others. Ibid.

Where the wife was sued to recover damages for wrongfully causing the death of the plaintiff's infant child, occasioned by falling into an excavation made upon the wife's premises in such a manner as to remove the lateral support from adjoining premises, it was held that the wife was liable in damages to the father. Ibid.

In Austin v. Cox, 118 Mass. 58, it was held in an action for obstructing the plaintiff in the use of a well upon the wife's premises, in respect of which the plaintiff claimed an easement, that since the passing of the statute of that state, a husband could not be held liable for a tort committed by his wife, unless he aided, abetted, advised, or otherwise encouraged the act.

Where the husband and wife were sued for forcibly ejecting the defendant from property leased by them to plaintiffs, the court held that evidence might be given of the wife's actions in the husband's presence at the time of such ejectment, although her actions during the husband's absence from the premises had no binding effect upon him in the absence of proof that she acted by his direction and advice. Baumier v. Antiau, 65 Mich. 81.

In Burt v. McBain, 29 Mich. 280, it was held that a husband was no longer liable for his wife's torts.

In Fiske v. Bailey, 51 N. Y. 158, where the husband and wife were domiciled on premises the separate and exclusive property of the wife, it was held that he was not, in legal presumption, so in control of the premises as to make him responsible to a party who enters thereon by permission of the wife, for injuries sustained by the careless leaving of a pit thereon uncovered. Rowe v. Smith, 45 N. Y. 230, followed.

Where a married woman acts and speaks by her-the defendant had notice of the savage and ferocious nature of said dog prior to the matters hereinbefore complained." The complainant then claims special damages for being thereby disabled to perform customary work, for expense of medical treatment, and for necessary nursing. There is a claim of a specified sum as damages sufficiently large to cover the recovery. There was a demurrer to the complaint, which the circuit court rightly overruled. The defendant interposed a plea, sworn to, which is styled a "plea in abatement." This plea was demurred to, the demurrer sustained, and this ruling is the subject of one of the errors assigned. The plea avers that when the act was done which gave rise to the suit "she was a married woman, the wife of Simon Strouse, who is now living in the city and county of Mobile, state of Alabama; that she was not at said time separated or living apart from the said husband, but they were living together in conjugal and marital relations." This clause of the plea does not negative the idea that the act complained of was solely the act of the wife. At common law this would have been a good ground of abatement. Under that system a suit could not have been maintained against the wife alone, on the facts charged in the complaint in this case. It would have been necessary to sue the husband jointly with the wife. Pinkston v. Greene, 9 Ala. 19.

Our statute has changed the common law on this subject. Section 2345 of the Code declares that the husband is not liable for the torts of the wife, "in the commission of which he does not participate; but the wife is liable . . . for her torts, and is suable therefor as if she were sole." This has changed the entire law as to the manner of suing a married woman, and has rendered it improper to join the husband when the charge is that the wife herself committed the tort. 14 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 647, and, note 1, on pages 648, 649. The effect of our statute has been to render in large degree, if not entirely, the matter set up in the first part of this plea nonavailing as a defense in abatement. Its whole scope, if available in any conditions, would seem to be confined to its effect as a bar to the action. This plea has another averment, namely: "That the said husband was at said time, prior thereto, and ever since the head of the family and the household, and had control of the said dog, and of the premises where the said dog was kept, and where said occurrence is said to have taken place." This averment is in no sense matter in abatement. If true, it is equivalent to the general issue, is a denial that the defendant kept the dog, and is a perfect bar to the action if made good. Pleas in abatement and pleas in bar cannot be pleaded together, and it may be that the latter averment would be construed as a waiver of the matter relied on in abatement; but we need not decide this. Defendant interposed the plea of the general issue, and under that plea was not only entitled to make all de-husband, his declarations and acts are hers and she must see to it, especially when he acts and speaks in her presence on her behalf. Lindner v. Sahler, 51 Barb. 322. So held, where the wife was sued for trover for the conversion of sheep found upon her premises, and demand was made of her husband in her presence.

Where the wife set fire to a house owned by her and let to a tenant, it was held that the husband was not liable with the wife, the tort being such as was committed by her in the control and management of her personal estate, she holding such property as though husbandless. Lansing v. Holdridge, 58 How. Pr. 449.

Where land belonged to the wife, who was active in the business and leased the same for cultivation, and subsequently disputes arose between the tenant and the landlord as to the cultivation of the crop, and the husband took possession and plowed the field his wife walking behind him with a gun, it was held they were properly joined in the action, the tort being committed in the presence of the husband, the wife acting deliberately and freely. Henderson v. Wendler (S. C.) July 19, 1893.

In Quilty v. Battie, 17 L. R. A. 621, 135 N. Y. 201, the husband and wife were sued for injuries resulting from the bite of a vicious dog, the liability of the wife being disputed upon the ground that she was a married woman and the dog belonged to her husband, and that she was not responsible for the trespasses committed by it, but the court held her liable upon the ground that she harbored the dog on her own premises with full knowledge of its vicious propensities and that the husband who had no knowledge of such propensities was not liable.

Commenting upon the Married Woman's Act of 1848, chap. 200, amended by the Act of 1849, chap. 375, the court stated that full and absolute ownership of all property which the wife might have or acquire, with all its incidents, privileges, and burdens, was conferred upon her by the statutes, that in the acquisition and indictment thereof she should be deemed to be an unmarried woman; and further that marital control of it was completely abrogated, not a trace of it was permitted to remain, the husband being placed upon the same footing as a stranger, with no greater authority to impose a burden upon her separate estate or to restrict or embarrass her in the exercise of exclusive dominion over it. Quilty v. Battie, supra.

With regard to the Act of 1890, chap. 90, amended by the Act of 1892, chap. 172, the court stated that she had the same remedies to prevent or restrain her husband from unlawfully interfering with her property, as she had against any other person; that if he kept upon her premises a ferocious animal, she had the same authority of law to protect herself against this infringement of her property rights as against a like trespass by a neighbor,—the husband is required to respond for the personal torts of the wife but for a trespass committed by her in the care and management of her separate estate he was not a proper party to defend. Ibid.

In McLaughlin v. Kemp, 153 Mass. 7, where the husband and wife were sued for damages for the bite of the husband's dog kept upon her separate premises, the court held that the wife was not necessarily a keeper of dogs which her husband owned and kept on premises which she owned, and which both occupied as husband and wife, although she carried on a separate business upon the premises.

It is a question for the jury whether the wife was the keeper of the dogs, and a ruling that "if they were her husband's dogs and he kept them there against her consent and contrary to her consent, and she did nothing to maintain or keep them, did not give them food or protect them, or provide for them in any way, she would not be in the sense of the law a keeper of the dogs," is correct. Ibid.

fense she could have made under the plea to which the demurrer was sustained, but she actually introduced proof, and had the jury pass on the identical question she had sought to present by the special plea. This, under all the authorities, cured the error, if any had been committed, in sustaining the demurrer to the latter clause of the special plea.

The doctrine is well settled that the owner or keeper of a domestic animal which is vicious, and prone or accustomed to do violence, having knowledge of such violent disposition or habit, must safely and securely keep such animal, so that it cannot inflict injury. Whether or not there was special negligence in permitting the dog's escape from the premises is not the inquiry. The keeper must, at his peril, safely keep such animal. Such is the condition on which the ownership or custody of known vicious animals is tolerated. Ownership or custody of such vicious animal is not one of the natural, inherent rights of property. It is a qualified or restricted right,—qualified by the condition that the animal can be, and is, safely confined and kept. Cooley, Torts, 848 et seq.; 1 Addison, Torts, § 261; Whittaker's Smith, Neg. 99; 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 628-631; The Lord Derby, 17 Fed. Rep. 265; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 581; Garlick v. Dorsey, 48 Ala. 220; Nolan v. Traber, 49 Md. 460, 38 Am. Rep. 277.

Previous knowledge of the animal's vicious habits must be alleged and proved. But positive proof is not always necessary. It may be inferred from circumstances. But the knowledge of the vicious habits of an animal need not refer to circumstances of exactly the same kind. All that the law requires to make the owner or keeper liable is knowledge of facts from which he can infer that the animal is likely to commit an act of the kind complained of. 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 582, and note.

The pivotal question in this case is whether Mrs. Strouse, the wife of Simon Strouse, living in the same house and in marital relations with him, can, under the facts of this case, be adjudged guilty of the tort complained of. Let us first ascertain precisely what was done which led to plaintiff's alleged injury, or sheds light on the circumstances attending it. We premise that what is here stated is proved by all the testimony bearing on the question or questions, without a shade or semblance of conflict: The house and premises in which Mr. and Mrs. Strouse lived together as husband and wife was the property of Mrs. Estra Strouse, the defendant in this suit. They lived there as husband and wife, having their children around them, and had lived at the same place for many years. A dog had for years been on the premises, not otherwise confined than by the inclosure of the lot. In the daytime, when neither Mrs. Strouse nor her husband was at home, the dog escaped through the back gate of the lot, and inflicted the injury complained of, in an open, public alleyway which extended across, from street to street, at the rear of the premises. No special act of negligence—in fact, no direct agency—is charged either against Simon or Estra Strouse in immediate connection with the escape of the dog at the time it took place. The immediate cause, according to the testimony, was the act of a visiting stranger. But, as we have shown above, negligence in permitting the dog to escape from the inclosure was not essential to the maintenance of this action. The fault and liability for the injury which ensues are established according to legal requirements, when it is shown that a vicious animal, prone, and known to be prone, to inflict personal injuries, is kept, and such animal escapes from confinement and inflicts injury. This constitutes an actionable tort, perpetrated by the keeper of such animal. That there was testimony tending to prove the vicious, if not dangerous, nature and temper of the dog, and tending to charge his keeper with a knowledge of such his evil disposition, cannot be gainsaid. A verdict finding such to be the fact could not be set aside, as unsupported by testimony. The testimony as to the ownership, custody, or keep of the dog was as follows: Plaintiff testified: "It was Mrs. Strouse's dog. She would go to the butcher wagon, and ask for meat for the dog. She got the dog from Mr. Hayes, who is now dead. I heard Mrs. Strouse say that Mr. Hayes gave her the dog when it was a small puppy. Mr. Strouse's cook fed the dog. I do not know who took care of him." This was the entire testimony for plaintiff on this question. For defendant, Strouse and his wife testified that Hayes or Haas gave the puppy to Mr. Strouse; that he had always owned him, and gave directions as to his being fed. Their two children and the cook confirmed them in this testimony. It is not our intention to compare the relative weight of this conflicting testimony.

The authorities are uniform that the husband is the head of the family, so long as the marital relation is maintained. He determines where the home shall be, is entitled to the wife's labor and services, has the right to have her society, controls the home and the household, and, with limited exceptions, she must obey his commands. In domestic management she is not presumed to have an independent will of her own. And our statutes securing to married women their separate estates have wrought no change in these relative rights and duties that affect the questions presented in this case. In Hanberry v. Hanberry, 29 Ala. 719, it was said: "It is settled law that the domicile of the wife follows that of the husband." In Firebrace v. Firebrace, L. R. 4 Prob. Div. 68, 67, it is said: "The domicile of the wife is that of the husband." This was said in 1878, after the enactment of the married woman's act in England. In Re Cochrane, 8 Dowl. P. C. 630, 635, Coleridge, J., replying to the contention "that the wife, as to her residence and manner of passing her time, was independent of her husband," said: "But our law has not so limited his rights, nor rested them on so narrow a foundation. Although expressed in terms simple almost to rudeness, the principle on which it proceeds is broad and comprehensive. It has respect to the terms of the marriage contract, and the infirmity of the sex. For the happiness and honor of both parties it places the wife under the guardianship of the husband, and entitles him, for the sake of both, to protect her from the danger of unrestrained intercourse with the world, by enforcing cohabitation and a common residence." In the same opinion he quoted Lord Mansfield as saying: "The husband has, in consequence of his marriage, a right to the custody of his wife; and whoever detains her from him violates that right, and he has a right to seize her wherever he finds her." In Ashbaugh v. Ashbaugh, 17 Ill. 476, the court said: "In contemplation of law, the husband and wife are one person, and her residence follows that of the husband." This principle was reaffirmed in Davis v. Davis, 80 Ill. 180, and in Kennedy v. Kennedy, 87 Ill. 250. In Elijah v. Taylor, 87 Ill. 247,—a case controlled by their statute securing to married women the ownership of their property,—the court employed this language: "We desire to proceed cautiously in the construction of that act, because, although passed without much consideration, it involves interests of great magnitude, and questions of no little difficulty. All that we deem it necessary to say in regard to the case before us is this: That where the husband, as the head of the family, occupies and cultivates the land of the wife, he must be considered as occupying it with her consent, for the common benefit of the family: and the products of his toil upon such land are as much his property, notwithstanding the Act of 1861, as if he had occupied, as a tenant, land rented from some third person. Any other rule would plainly lead to great confusion, and open a wide door to fraud." In Boyce v. Boyce, 28 N. J. Eq. 387, 348, the principle is thus expressed: "The wife is bound to follow her husband when he changes his residence, even without her consent, provided the change is made by him in the bona fide exercise of his power, as head of the family, of determining what is the best for it." In California the right of the wife to the ownership and control of her property were never framed after the common-law model. They partook more of the civil-law system. In Hardenbergh v. Hardenbergh, 14 Cal. 654, is this language: "The husband, being the head of the family, and bound for its support and maintenance, may change the matrimonial domicile at pleasure, and it is the duty of the wife to submit to the reasonable exercise of this right." The case of Glover v. Alcott, 11 Mich. 470, arose after the enactment of their statute securing to married women the ownership and control of their property. The wife had permitted the husband to conduct a large business, styling himself "W. W. Alcott, Agent." Indebtedness was incurred in the conduct of the business, and some barrels of flour, the product of the enterprise, were seized and sold in payment thereof. The wife brought an action of trover for their conversion. In discussing the question of her right to maintain the action the court (Christiancy, J.) said: "We see nothing in the statute to satisfy us that the legislature contemplated so radical a change in the legal relations of husband and wife while they continue to live together, and he is competent to the transaction of business, and guilty of no gross neglect of his duties to her and his family. But the husband must, as a general rule, still be regarded as the head of the family, and as the only one of the two authorized to carry on such general trade and business."

In Massachusetts they have legislation somewhat analogous to ours, relating to the rights of married women in their separate property. In Com. v. Wood, 97 Mass. 225, the husband was indicted for keeping a house of ill fame. The house was the separate property of the wife. The defense relied on and ruled upon is shown in the following extract from the opinion of the court: "The defendant contends that he is not liable, because the house was owned by his wife, as her separate property, and the business of keeping a house of ill fame therein, which was resorted to for prostitution and lewdness, was carried on by her, and she took the profits thereof, and he did not participate in them. Whether he is liable in such a case must depend upon the relations which he sustained to the household, while he lived with his wife as her husband. The doctrine of the common law is that, by marriage, the husband and wife become one person in law; that she is under his protection, influence, power, and authority, and that he is the head of the household. This condition of the wife is designated by the expressive term 'coverture.' One effect of it is, as a general rule, though subject to many exceptions, to excuse her from punishment for many crimes committed by her in the presence of her husband, on the ground that she acted under his compulsion. He alone is held responsible for such crimes. [Citing many authorities]. How far he may exercise force in restraining her is not precisely settled; but there can be no doubt that he may exercise as much power as may be reasonably necessary to prevent her, as well as other inmates of the house, from making it a brothel. It is said in Dalton's Justice that he is liable if she keep an alehouse, without license, against his will. But it is contended that the recent legislation of this commonwealth has made married women so far independent of their husbands as to release the defendant, in such a case as the present, from all responsibility for the conduct of his wife. It is true that the house they lived in appears to have been owned by her to her sole and separate use, free from the control of her husband. But, ever since the law of equitable trusts existed, married women have been able to hold property thus independent of the husband's control; and the fact that the family lived in a house they owned has never been regarded as affecting the rights and power of the husband as head of the family. . . . These provisions of the statute relate to legitimate business, and not to the keeping of brothels. They do not take away his power to regulate his household, so far as to prevent his wife from committing this offense, or relieve him from responsibility if it is committed." See also Com. v. Flaherty, 140 Mass. 454. A misdemeanor or tort committed by a married woman conjointly, with, or in presence of, her husband, is presumed to be his act, because the law raises the presumption that she acts in obedience to his will or under his coercion. The same rule applies as to crimes, except a few of the higher grades. Douge v. Pearce, 18 Ala. 127; Williamson v. State, 16 Ala. 431; Lawson v. Lay, 24 Ala. 184; Mulvey v. State, 43 Ala. 316; Quinlin v. People, 6 Park. Crim. Rep. 9; Cooley, Torts, 115.

"There is a presumption," says Judge Cooley, "corresponding to that which is made in the criminal law,—that, if a wrong is committed by the wife in the presence of the husband, it must have been committed by his consent and under his influence, and consequently is his wrong, rather than that of the wife, and should be redressed in a suit against him alone; but any such presumption is liable to be overthrown by evidence." See also Carleton v. Haywood, 49 N. H. 814. This same learned author (Judge Cooley; page 118) says: "It is not very clear how far the law of torts has been modified." He was speaking of the influence exerted by the statutes by which married women have been given independent power to make contracts and to control property. Continuing, he says: "We should probably be safe in saying that, so far as they give validity to a married woman's contracts, they put her on the same footing with other persons and, when a failure to perform a duty under a contract is in itself a tort, it may doubtless be treated as such in a suit against a married woman. The same would probably be true of any breach of duty imposed upon a married woman as owner of property which she possesses and controls the same as if sole and unmarried."

We have referred to our statute which authorizes suits to be brought against the wife alone,—section 2345 of the Code of 1886. That section, in its entirety, reads as follows: "The husband is not liable for the debts or engagements of the wife, contracted or entered into after the marriage, or for her torts, in the commission of which he does not participate; but the wife is liable for such debts or engagements entered into with the consent of the husband in writing, or for her torts, and is suable therefor, as if she were sole." All who are familiar with the principles of the common law will readily perceive and take in a large field for the operation of this statute. Under that system a wife could make no contract or agreement which, as such, would authorize an action and recovery against her. Under the statute, if she enter into a contract or agreement with the written consent of her husband, an action for its breach may be maintained against her alone. Nor could she be sued alone, under common-law rules, for any tort committed by her, no matter how wrongful, violent, or independent of presumed marital restraint her conduct may have been. Under that system, if the tort was committed in the presence of her husband, prima facie it was not her tort, but was presumed to have been the work of her husband's coercion. For such act, unless it was affirmatively shown that she acted independently of her husband's will, she could not be sued, even conjointly with her husband. It was his tort, and his alone, and he alone was suable for it. If she committed a tort in the absence of her husband, or, if present, if it was affirmatively shown that she acted of her own will and independently of his, then she could be sued, but the suit could only be maintained against her and her husband jointly. In this last class of cases the statute has changed the law to this extent: It is now neither proper nor permissible to join the husband as a defendant in an action for a tort committed by a married woman, "in the commission of which the husband does not participate;" that is, in those cases of tort by the wife in which, at common-law, the husband and wife could be jointly sued, the wife, under the statute, may and must now be sued alone. There was no intention to change the domestic relations between husband and wife, or to revolutionize the economy which pertains to that domestic relation. The statute relates to remedies. It confers a remedy for the enforcement or breach of a contract or agreement which itself had authorized a married woman to enter into, and a new remedy for an actionable tort committed by her. For either of these she must be sued alone. There is not a word or syllable in the statute which gives intimation of an intention to declare and fasten an enlarged liability for torts. It compasses all its ends, and gives effect to its every provision, when it transfers the burden from the joint shoulders of husband and wife, and places it on the wife alone. We repeat, so far as it relates to torts, it deals with the remedy, not the liability. We do not doubt that a married woman may commit a tort, even in the presence of her husband, for which an action may be maintained against her individually and separately. Personal violence, or any other active wrong showing that it was prompted by her personal will, passion, wantonness, or recklessness, would fall within this class. Proof of such self prompted action would overcome the presumption of marital restraint or coercion. Carleton v. Haywood, 49 N. H. 814.

Let us recur to the facts of this case. The dog had been on the premises for several years. No present act of negligence is charged against husband or wife which led to the escape of the dog and the consequent injury of the plaintiff. The fault charged was and is that a dog with known vicious propensity was kept on the premises, and that, escaping therefrom, he inflicted the injury complained of. The wrongful act was the keep of the dog. This pertained to the government of the household and premises,—the economy and administration of the domestic affairs. It was not the act of a moment, or the work of an hour or a day. It was continuous in its nature, and must be charged to the account of the head—the governing head—of the family. For this injury no suit could have been maintained at common law against the husband and wife jointly. It would have been adjudged to be his act, his wife, at most, acting conjointly with him, and under his presumed control. Nor has the statute wrought any change in this bearing of the question. If the wife had any part or lot in the keep of the dog, it cannot be classed as her tort, "in the commission of which he did not participate." She could not keep the dog without his consent and participation. Hence, the case is not brought within the provisions of the statute.

A further argument: Let us suppose the husband had been sued, and he had pleaded in bar that the wife owned and kept the dog. Every one will say such defense would be frivolous. The husband, the head and governor of the family, must be held accountable for the economy and administration of the household. This power and right have not been taken away or impaired by the statutes securing to married women their separate estates. We are aware that we have given to this subject a somewhat extended consideration. We have done so because it brings before us, for the first time, the inquiry to what extent, if any, our married women's laws have changed the relations of the husband to the household and its government. We have felt that so grave a question should not be slurred over, but should be clearly and definitely settled; and, notwithstanding our statutes have revolutionized the property rights of the wife, they have effected no change in the headship—the dominion and control—of the husband over the household, or in the government of the home and its appurtenances. Charges 6 and 7 asked by defendant are in strict accord with the principles we have declared, and each of them should have been given. We need not consider any other rulings.

"Personal property, whether in the form of moneys, bills receivable, bonds, certificates of stock, or otherwise, held by an assignee of an insolvent debtor whose estate is being settled in the probate court, is not subject to taxation, and it is not the duty of such assignee to make return of the assets of such estate to the county auditor for taxation.

WRITS of error to the Circuit Court for Hamilton County to review judgments reversing judgments of the Court of Common Pleas in favor of complainants in suits brought to enjoin the assessing and taxation of assets in the hands of the complainants. Reversed.

Statement by Spear, J.:

The case of McNeill, assignee, was commenced by the filing in the court of common pleas of Hamilton county, of a petition of which the following is a copy, viz.:

"The said plaintiff, Aaron McNeill, says that he is the assignee of the Metcalfe & Mackey Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of Ohio, for manufacturing purposes, but which is now insolvent, and duly assigned all its property and assets to this plaintiff, in trust, for the benefit of creditors; that the amount of property and assets in the hands of this plaintiff, as such assignee, on the 10th day of April, 1893, being the day preceding the second Monday in April, in said year, was as follows:

"Notes received for property sold by this plaintiff, as such assignee, amounting to $16,290; other notes and accounts, probably collectable, amounting to $3,620, making a total amount of notes and accounts in the hands of this plaintiff, as such assignee, as aforesaid, at the time aforesaid, of $18,910; this plaintiff also had in bank, to his credit, as such assignee, the sum of $7,000.90, making a total of cash, notes, and accounts, comprising the entire assets in the hands of this plaintiff, as such assignee, of $25,910.90; that claims have been presented to this plaintiff, as such assignee, by creditors of said, the Metcalfe & Mackey Company, duly proven, aggregating the sum of $65,000; that the assets in the hands of this plaintiff, as such assignee, after paying the necessary costs and expenses of such assignment, will only pay a dividend of between thirty and thirty-five per cent upon the claims so proven and allowed, as valid claims, against the said assignor, by this plaintiff; that the said defendant, John Hagerty, as auditor of Hamilton county, Ohio, has duly made demand upon this plaintiff, as such assignee, to return said assets to him, as such auditor, to be placed upon the tax duplicate of Hamilton county, Ohio, for taxation; that this plaintiff refused to make such return until said auditor threatened to take legal steps against this plaintiff, for failing to make such return, and thereupon this plaintiff made a statement and return to the said auditor of the assets in his hands, as such assignee, as hereinbefore set forth, and also for the amount of the claims proven against said, the Metcalfe & Mackey Co., as hereinbefore set forth, and the said

NOTE—The question touched by the above decision seems to have arisen in but few instances and to have been noticed in none of the text-writings on the subjects of taxation or insolvent estates. The Connecticut case cited by the court was that 23 L. R. A.

of a receiver of an insolvent corporation, and it is evident that the question is much the same whether the property is in the hands of a receiver or of an insolvent's assignee, but the text-books on receivers seem to be also silent on the subject.

defendant as such auditor threatens and is about to place upon the tax duplicate of said county of Hamilton the amount of said assets for taxation against this plaintiff, as such assignee, and unless restrained from so doing will place on the tax duplicate of said county the sum of $25,910.80 the taxes upon which will be charged to this plaintiff, as such assignee.

"The said plaintiff denies that the said assets in the hands of plaintiff, as such assignee, are, under the laws of Ohio, taxable, and denies the right of defendant to place the same upon the tax duplicate as subject to taxation. The amount of said assets being far less than the amount of the liabilities of said assignor, and the said assets being in the hands of this plaintiff, as an officer of the probate court, subject to an order of distribution by said court, as soon as the same can be made, and to the extent of the value of the claims against said assignor of the creditors of said assignor are, under the laws of Ohio, required to be returned for taxation, by said creditors, and not by this plaintiff, as such assignee, and to charge the taxes upon said assets against this plaintiff, as assignee, would be a great and irreparable injury, for which this plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law.

"Said plaintiff therefore prays that a temporary injunction may be allowed herein, enjoining and restraining the said defendant, as such auditor of Hamilton county, Ohio, from placing upon the tax duplicate the said assets in the hands of this plaintiff, as such assignee, the taxes upon which to be charged against this plaintiff, as such assignee, and that upon the final hearing hereof that said injunction may be made perpetual, and for such other and further relief as may be just and equitable."

In Goebel, trustee, against the treasurer, the property was described as moneys subject to draft, and as moneys invested in bonds, stocks, joint stock companies and otherwise. In other respects the petition was substantially the same in its allegations as the one copied above, and as to relief desired.

A demurrer to the petition in each case was overruled by the court, and, defendant not desiring to plead, judgment allowing perpetual injunction was rendered against defendant, and for costs. On error to the circuit court the judgment in each case was reversed for error in overruling the demurrer, and giving judgment for plaintiff, that court holding that the common pleas erred in ruling that the money, and the bonds, certificates of stock, etc., were not subject to taxation as against the assignees. To reverse these judgments the present proceedings in error are prosecuted.

Messrs. Follett & Kelley, Goebel & Bettinger, and Archer & McNeill, for plaintiffs in error:

If the assignee is required to return the same for taxation the result would be double taxation, and, in the construction of statutes relating to taxation, courts will always avoid such construction as results in double taxation, if possible, and will adopt such construction only when the legislative intent is clear.

Jack v. Weiennett, 115 Ill. 105, 56 Am. Rep. 129; Dunlap v. Gallatin County, 15 Ill. 7.

Spear, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It was the judgment of the circuit court that, by force of the statutes relating to taxation, it became the duty of an assignee for the benefit of creditors, acting under our insolvent laws, to return for taxation all moneys, the proceeds of the sale of assets of the assignor, which he might, as such assignee, have on hand, or on deposit in bank, on the day preceding the second Monday of April, and all investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, or otherwise, held by him as assignee, which, under the law, would be taxable if held by an individual, resident of the state.

That court was further of opinion that from the value of such property so to be returned the assignee could not legally deduct the sum of the legal bona fide debts owing by his assignor at the time of making such return.

The reasoning in support of these conclusions is, in substance, that it was the purpose of the statute, enacted conformably with section 2 of article 12 of the Constitution, that the assignee should represent the estate of his assignor, and that the return for taxation should be made by the assignee substantially in the same manner as if the property still stood as that of the assignor; and that this purpose is expressed by the statute itself, section 2781, that "all property whether real or personal in this state, and whether belonging to individuals or corporations; and all moneys, credits, etc., of persons residing in this state, shall be subject to taxation, except only such as may be expressly exempted therefrom." No exemption existing in favor of property so held, it must be regarded as included within the language quoted. Although the statute does not seem to make taxes on personal property a lien thereon, yet it does provide that "all personal property subject to taxation shall be liable to be seized and sold for taxes." And if the tax levied by reason of the return made by the assignee is paid by him, he could, under the provisions of section 6357, be allowed for such payment as part of the legitimate expenses of the trust; and, in default of payment, that distraint might be made by the tax collector by force of the authority above quoted. The mere fact that the assignee or trustee of an insolvent estate is not specially mentioned in section 2784, which points out who shall list personal property, is not a legislative declaration that such trustee is not bound to return personal property in his hands for taxation, because the statute says it shall be returned by the trustee for every person for whose benefit property is held in trust, and this is not limited to cases where the trustee has the assets invested in some permanent form from which income or interest may be derived. The moneys so on hand receive the protection of the state and ought to pay their proportion of the taxes levied to furnish that protection. The fund does not belong to the individual creditors until the estate is settled and order of distribution made; nor does the mere fact of insolvency of the assignor put the fund in any different position with respect to the claims of creditors. If the fund represented credits, then debts might be deducted, and as the latter exceed the former there would be nothing to return; but the fund on hand is not a credit. Nor are the investments in bonds, stocks, etc., credits. Large amounts, in the aggregate, are at all times in the hands of assignees, and the legislature could not have contemplated the escape of so vast an amount of property from the burden of taxation; and, unless taxed in the hands of assignees, the property would escape, because, even if treated as belonging to the creditors, still it would not be practicable for even an honest creditor to make his return on such claims because he would have no means of knowing their value. These conclusions are supported directly by the opinion of the very able court whose judgment is here brought in review (Sloans v. People's Electric R. Co. 7 Ohio Ct. Ct. Rep. 388), and by Dunlap v. Gallatin County, 15 Ill. 7. And, as bearing upon the question, the following citations are given: Campbell v. Wiggins, 85 Tex. 424; Campbell v. Riviere (Tex.) 22 S. W. Rep. 993; Jack v. Wiennett, 115 Ill. 105, 56 Am. Rep. 129.

While recognizing the cogency of the reasoning, we have been unable to agree with this view of the law as bearing upon these cases.

For the purpose of the inquiry it may be assumed that the money in bank is as much subject to taxation as though it were in the personal possession of the assignee. Whether such of the assets as are in the form of stocks or bonds are credits within the meaning of the decisions of this court giving construction to section 2780, Revised Statutes, we do not regard it necessary to discuss.

It may be further assumed that there is no specific exemption of property in the hands of assignees from taxation, either in the statute, or in the constitution.

It is to be noted that the question is not 23 L. R. A.

whether the assets of the insolvent may be subjected to payment of taxes owing by him. But the question is whether or not the fund itself in the hands of the assignee is subject to taxation.

The constitutional requirement (sec. 2, art. 12), is that "laws shall be passed, taxing by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks," etc., and the law relating to the subject is embraced in section 2780, Revised Statutes, and following.

Looking at these sections alone, it is, we concede, natural to conclude that a duty would devolve on assignees to return for taxation, property in their hands, except perhaps that which might be in the form strictly of credits. But the purpose of the legislature is to be arrived at by a consideration of all the legislation bearing upon the subject, and not by a consideration of a portion only.

Our statutes, sections 6335 to 6358, place the disposition of insolvent estates within the control of the probate court, and direct the duties of the assignee, and the procedure in the administration of the trust. When once acquired, the jurisdiction is exclusive. Saylor v. Simpson, 45 Ohio St. 144; Clapp v. Huron County Bkg. Co. 50 Ohio St. 528. There is thus provided a convenient, expeditious, and inexpensive tribunal for the distribution of the assets of insolvents ratably among creditors. Necessarily that court, by operation of law, upon the filing of the instrument of assignment, acquires control of all the property and estate embraced therein, subject, of course, to all liens and just claims then existing upon the property, whether by the state or by creditors. Though the legal title is in the assignee, after his qualification, it is so only because he has qualified, and because his appointment has received the sanction of the court, and he, as well as all persons claiming an interest in or upon the fund, are subject to the summary jurisdiction of the court. The person named by the insolvent assignor may not qualify; or, having qualified, he may be removed and another, called a trustee, appointed; and, in either case, the legal title to the property follows the order of the court, and is lodged in such person or persons as may, by the court's order, be given its actual custody.

It is made the duty of the assignee to convert the assigned property into money, and, at the expiration of eight months, file an account, as a step preliminary to an order distributing the money to creditors, which is to be done without unnecessary delay, according to their respective claims and rights. The effect of the assignment is to devote the property absolutely to the satisfaction of the debts of the assignor, just as they existed at the time of the assignment, subject, necessarily, to be depleted by the expenses of the trust.

The assignee has no power to create any new lien, nor to divert the property from the purpose contemplated by the law.

Provision is made for the payment by the assignee of preferred liens upon the property, if any exist, and for the payment of taxes in preference to any other claim against the assignor. The language in this regard is significant: "All taxes of every description assessed against the assignor upon any personal property held by him before his assignment, shall be paid by the assignee or trustee, out of the proceeds of the property assigned in preference to any other claims against the assignor." Nowhere is it in terms provided that the assignee shall list the property for taxation, nor is provision made for the payment of any taxes save those existing against the assignor. This omission seems to us significant when contrasted with the duty enjoined by other sections of the statute upon other trustees. By section 2784, returns must be made of the property of every ward by his guardian, "of every estate of a deceased person, by his executor or administrator; of corporations whose assets are in the hands of receivers, by such receivers." It is made the duty of every executor or administrator "to apply the assets to the payment of debts in the following order: . . . Fourth, public rates and taxes, and sums due the state for duties on sales at auction." For such payments of taxes the administrator or executor is allowed in the settlement of his accounts. The provision relating to the payment of taxes by assignees is that "all taxes of every description assessed against the assignor upon any personal property held by him before his assignment, shall be paid by the assignee," etc., and if we apply the familiar rule expressio unius exclusio alterius, it would seem that those are the only taxes, payment of which may properly be included in his accounts.

The omissions referred to would seem also to suggest a distinction between the relation of an assignee to creditors of the assignor and to the trust property held by him, and the relation sustained by a guardian, an administrator, or a receiver of a corporation, to beneficiaries interested in the trust property, as well as to the property itself; and we think a distinction is observable between the relation sustained by creditors of an insolvent assignor to the assigned property, and that of beneficiaries of property in charge of the other functionaries above named.

The relation of guardian to the ward is, while it lasts, a permanent one. He manages the estate for the benefit of the ward, and it is his duty to so manage as to make profit and interest for the ward. As to the property, the ward has no power over it, nor duty respecting it.

As to administrators, it is true that property in their hands is subject to the payment of the debts of the decedent, and that creditors are expected to list their claims as credits, and often it happens that the debts consume the entire assets. But usually there is in fact as well as in contemplation a residue going to widows and legatees or heirs, and they are not required to list for taxation any amount until it is actually received.

The duty enjoined upon receivers to list is confined to receivers of corporations. Such receivers are usually empowered to prosecute the business for the benefit of the parties interested. This carries the idea of a continuance of the business as by the corporation, and its eventual surrender to the corporation again. Receivers for partnerships, concerns whose affairs are to be wound up and dissolved, are not named. Certainly this omission is also significant. Such receivers perform duties similar, in many ways, to the duties of assignees of insolvents, and had it been intended to enjoin upon them the duty of listing property in their hands for taxation, one would suppose that the discrimination found in the statute would not have been made.

It is, however, urged that the clause of section 2784 which requires that the property of every person for whose benefit property is held in trust must be listed by the trustee, furnishes authority for requiring such listing by an assignee of an insolvent. It is true that, in a general, broad sense, an assignee is a trustee, and, in other sections of the revised statutes, the terms "assignee" and "trustee" are coupled, as though the words mean the same.

But it does not follow that the term "trustee" is used in this broad sense in this clause of the statute, for equally, in the same sense, is a guardian, or administrator, or a receiver, a trustee, and if the term had been intended in so broad a sense as to include assignees of insolvents, it would also embrace the other trustees named, and the special provisions regarding them would be superfluous. We think the purpose of this clause is fully satisfied by confining its application to that large class of trusts where title and possession are placed in one for the benefit of others, in some permanent form, and from which, in general, interest, income, or profit is expected to be derived.

That portion of the estate which is described in the petition as being bonds and stocks can, we think, in fairness, hardly be included under the head of "investments in bonds, stocks," etc., because, as said by McIlvaine, J., in Payne v. Watterson, 87 Ohio St. 125, "the common understanding is, that money invested is withdrawn from ordinary trade and active business and placed at interest for the sake of interest." These securities are not held by the assignee as an investment for the sake of interest, but are in that form for temporary purposes only, being held subject to the order of the probate court, and may be required to be converted into money, and that money distributed, at any time.

To hold that property in possession of an assignee, as in these cases, must be listed and taxes paid on it is, in effect, to hold that the creditors must be taxed twice on the same value. While the legal title to the property is in the assignee, it is so only for the purpose of facilitating the settlement of the trust. Equitably, the property is vested in the creditors. Every dollar paid in taxes by the assignee reduces by that amount the dividend which the creditors will receive. That it is the duty of creditors, under the law, to list their claims as credits, admits, we suppose, of no doubt, and, we submit, that it is no answer to say that creditors cannot know the value of such credits. Such condition attaches to a very large proportion of credits held by the commercial, and especially the mercantile, world. Nor, is it any answer to say that, as matter of fact, they will not list the claims. No good reason why they should not exist, unless it would be furnished by a requirement compelling the assignee to do so. A statutory construction which, to use the language of Judge Cooley, "requires that one person, or any one subject of taxation, shall directly contribute twice to the same burden, while other subjects of taxation belonging to the same class are required to contribute but once," is to be avoided because, in the judgment of that author, it is duplicate taxation, and is not permissible under a constitution which requires equality and uniformity. This proposition seems to be applicable to the present cases, as our constitution requires both equality and uniformity. It is not necessary to hold that the legislature might not include assignees in the class of trustees who are required to list property in their hands, even though duplicate taxation results; it is enough, for the disposition of the present cases, if the purpose to do so has not been expressed.

The assignee is, in every essential particular, an officer of court. The fund is in his hands as such and he is bound to do with it just what the court directs. The fund, therefore, is really in the custody of the court, and, as before stated, the beneficial interest is in the creditors. They cannot, it is true, receive their own at once but that is because it requires some time to reduce the assets to money, and for the adjustment of the debts and claims. To require the listing of any of the property thus held by the assignee, and the payment of taxes on it, would manifestly interfere with the orderly execution of the trust. And if, as is claimed in argument, in case payment of taxes so levied is not voluntarily made by the assignee, distraint might be resorted to by the tax collector, and the property seized and taken forcibly from the possession of the assignee, thus taking it from the control of the court, so much the more apparent is it that the construction claimed by the defendant in error is inadmissible because it would result in unreasonable interference with the rightful exercise of authority by the probate court. It cannot have been the purpose of the legislature, by one statute to lodge exclusive jurisdiction and dominion over property in a court, and, by another statute, authorize a taxing officer to cast contempt upon the court by ousting its jurisdiction, and overriding its powers.

If the clause of section 2784, relating to the listing of trust property by trustees, requires a listing of property by the assignee of an insolvent whose estate is being settled in the probate court, no reason can be given why the same duty would not devolve upon receivers of partnerships, clerks of courts, sheriffs, or master commissioners, as to funds which may chance to be in their hands on the day preceding the second Monday of April, subject to payment upon order of court. To state such a proposition is to refute it. And this because it is unreasonable to assume that, in the absence of express authority, the duty to list embraces property which the law has taken into its own hands simply to collect and distribute, and of which it has designated a temporary trustee for the better accomplishment of its work.

Our conclusion is that neither by the constitution, nor by the statute, when construction is given to all the sections bearing upon the subject, is it made the duty of an assignee of an insolvent whose estate is being settled in the probate court, to list the property so held by him for taxation.

Authorities bearing one way or the other upon the question are not abundant. But the conclusions here announced are fully supported by decisions in two well-considered cases, one by the supreme court of Pennsylvania and one by the supreme court of Connecticut. Lancaster School Directors v. Rathvon, 80 Pa. 533; Brooks v. Hartford, 61 Conn. 112. The Connecticut case is especially apt because their statute designating property subject to taxation, and the duty of trustees regarding the same, appears to be substantially similar to our own upon those subjects.

The judgment of the Circuit Court will be reversed and those of the Common Pleas affirmed.

Richard A. WALSH et al., Resp'ts.

(.....Minn.....)

*Article 4 of section 8 of the Constitution of the state of Minnesota provides

*Headnote by BUCK, J.

NOTE.—Privileges of members of congress and state legislature from suit.

Civil suits.

There is some conflict on the question as to immunity of members of congress and legislatures from suit on civil process. Some of the cases with the main case hold that the privilege from "arrest" 38 L. R. A.

as follows: "The members of each house shall in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during the session of their respective houses and in going to and returning from the same." Held, that, under such constitutional provision, a member of the legislature is not privileged from the service upon him of a summons in a civil action during a session of said legislature.

(December 21, 1893.)

does not extend to a privilege from service of process in a civil suit. Gentry v. Griffith, 27 Tex. 481; Merrick v. Giddings, MacArthur, & M. 58; Cattett v. Morton, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 123; Johnson v. Offutt, 4 Met. (Ky.) 20.

The attendance upon congress by a member does not entitle him as a matter of right to have his suit postponed. Nones v. Edsall, 1 Wall. Jr. 184.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County setting aside the service of summons on certain of the defendants in a proceeding to recover damages for alleged malicious conspiracy to secure plaintiff's private books and correspondence. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. C. D. O'Brien and Thomas D. O'Brien for appellant.

Mr. H. W. Childs, Atty-Gen., with Messrs. Warner, Richardson & Lawrence, for respondents:

The members of each house shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during the session of their respective houses and in going to or returning from the same. For any speech or debate in either house they shall not be questioned in any other place.

Const. art. 4, § 8.

In Doty v. Strong, 1 Pinney, 84, the word "arrest" was construed and the court decided that it must be given a liberal rather than a literal meaning.

In Anderson v. Rountree, 1 Pinney, 115,

And an exemption from "all other process whatsoever" does not prohibit during the period prescribed, the issuing of process against them, during that time. McPherson v. Nesmith, 3 Gratt. 237.

But in Bolton v. Martin, 1 Dall. 206, it was held that a member of the state convention of Pennsylvania, met to consider the Constitution of the United States, was privileged from the service of summons during the session, and this on the ground of the privileges of parliament.

This was followed in Pennsylvania by a dictum in Geyer v. Irwin, 4 Dall. 107, stating, substantially, that a member of the general assembly was privileged from summons during his attendance on public business, but in that case the court held that the privilege would not be noticed unless claimed.

Since then it has been held in Pennsylvania, following these cases, that the privilege of a legislator from arrest extends to the service of process. Gray v. Still, 13 W. N. C. 55; Ross v. Brown, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 142.

These cases were followed by Doty v. Strong, 1 Pinney, 84, which extended the privilege to a delegate from a territory, and in Anderson v. Rountree, 1 Pinney, 115, to a member of the legislature.

These cases were based upon the dictum in Geyer v. Irwin, supra.

In Miner v. Markham, 28 Fed. Rep. 387, which was a federal case in Wisconsin, the court followed the construction placed upon the term "arrest" by the Wisconsin courts and held that a member of congress was exempt from civil process, as well as arrest, on his journey to and from the session, and was entitled to reasonable time. This was on the ground "that it has been the law in this jurisdiction from territorial times, that the privilege in such a case as that at bar extends to exemption from civil process, with or without actual arrest."

And where a statute provides that he shall not be molested or troubled or compelled to answer to any suit, bill, plaint, declaration, before any other court, judge, or justice, the privilege of a member of the assembly during the session extends to a writ of error although not returnable until after the termination of the session. King v. Colt, 4 Day, 120.

And the Ohio Act of 1881, taken in connection with the Act of 1862, (§. 8. & §. 18) privileges a legislator from being served with a summons to answer out of his county where the cause of action ac-the defendant was a member of the legislative council of the territory. The day after the adjournment of the legislative assembly he was served with a summons in the case.

The court dismissed the cause.

The word "arrest" is broad enough to exempt the defendant from any action whether accompanied by actual seizure of his person or not.

When our constitution was adopted the word "arrest" had a fixed and definite meaning in the minds of those for whose benefit it was framed.

The will of the people and the intention of the law-giver as understood at the time of adoption must be carried out.

Osmun v. Reynolds, 11 Minn. 459; Nicollet Nat. Bank of Minneapolis v. City Bank, 38 Minn. 85; Re St. Paul & N. P. R. Co. 37 Minn. 164; McNamara v. Minnesota Cent. R. Co. 12 Minn. 388; Drennan v. People, 10 Mich. 169; Daniels v. Clegg, 28 Mich. 82; Pangborn v. Westlake, 36 Iowa, 546; Cronan v. Cotting, 104 Mass. 245, 6 Am. Rep. 232.

This interpretation was adopted in other jurisdictions, long prior to the Wisconsin de-crued ten days prior to the session of the assembly. Orth v. McCook (Ohio Super. Ct.) 4 Week. L. Month. 215.

And a constitutional provision that "the members of both houses shall be protected in their persons and estates," means exemption from all suits, whether by arrest or summons. Tillinghast v. Carr, 4 McCord, L. 152.

Arrest.

The privilege from arrest of a member of congress is limited to a reasonable time for going and coming. Hopkin v. Jenckes, 8 R. L. 453, 5 Am. Rep. 597.

And in Lewis v. Elmendorf, 2 Johns. Cas. 223, it was held that the benefit of the privilege only applied while attending congress or actually on his journey going to or returning from the seat of government.

But one who goes to Washington to represent a state in congress is privileged from arrest though not entitled to a seat, and delay in returning through lack of funds will not affect the privilege. Dunton v. Halstead, 2 Clark (Pa.) 450.

And where a member of the legislature is entitled to fourteen days to reach home before he can be arrested, the motion to discharge from arrest must show where he was arrested. Colvin v. Morgan, 1 Johns. Cas. 415.

And cannot be claimed after he reaches home. Corey v. Russell, 4 Wend. 204.

In Coxe v. McClenachan, 3 Dall. 473, where a member of congress was surrendered by his bail and demanded discharge as privileged, the matter was compromised by the bail agreeing to surrender him within four days after the session of congress and the privilege must be claimed at the proper time or if not claimed until after judgment it will be too late. Prentiss v. Com. 5 Rand. (Va.) 697, 16 Am. Dec. 732. See Geyer v. Irwin, 4 Dall. 107.

Under Pa. Const., art. 2, providing for privilege from arrest of members of the assembly, in all cases except treason, felony, and breach or surety of the peace, the privilege does not extend to crimes, but only applies to civil restraint. Com. v. Keeper of the Jail, 13 Phila. 573.

And a member of congress is not exempt from the service of a subpoena in a criminal case. United States v. Cooper, 4 Dall. 341; Respublica v. Duane, 4 Yeates, 347.

cisions, and it has been repeatedly reaffirmed.

Bolton v. Martin, 1 Dall. 296; Geyer v. Irwin, 4 Dall. 107; Gibbes v. Mitchell, 2 Bay, 406; King v. Coit, 4 Day, 129; Nones v. Edsall, 1 Wall. Jr. 189; Holmes v. Nelson, 1 Phila. 217; Huddeson v. Prizer, 9 Phila. 65; Miner v. Markham, 28 Fed. Rep. 337.

On grounds of public policy, witnesses and others are treated as having the same right, and it is in such cases that the word "arrest" has been most frequently construed.

Bridges v. Sheldon, 7 Fed. Rep. 17; Re Healey, 53 Vt. 694, 38 Am. Rep. 713; Person v. Grier, 66 N. Y. 124, 23 Am. Rep. 35; Sanford v. Chase, 3 Cow. 382; Larned v. Griffin, 12 Fed. Rep. 590; Sherman v. Gundlach, 37 Minn. 118; First Nat. Bank of St. Paul v. Ames, 39 Minn. 179.

A witness called before a legislative body to give evidence cannot be annoyed and distracted by the service of civil process upon him while attending.

Thompson's Case, 122 Mass. 428, 23 Am. Rep. 370; United States v. Edme, 9 Serg. & R. 147; Lyell v. Goodwin, 4 McLean, 29.

The right for which we are contending was surrendered by statute in England in 1770, but it none the less existed there up to that time. There could be but little need for parliament to relinquish what it never had. It certainly claimed it again and again, and it was recognized by many decisions of the courts.

Cassidy v. Stuart, 3 Mann. & G. 437.

Messrs. George B. Edgerton and John Day Smith also for respondents.

Buck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff commenced a civil action in the district court of Ramsey county, in this state, against the defendants, on the 20th day of March, 1893, alleging in his complaint that prior to that time the defendants, except defendants Wells and Scheffer, had unlawfully and maliciously conspired to break and enter the plaintiff's office, to take and carry away his private books, papers, and correspondence, and that in pursuance of such conspiracy they unlawfully directed and required said Wells and Scheffer to proceed to plaintiff's said office, and forcibly break and enter the same, and take and carry away therefrom plaintiff's said books, papers, and correspondence, and that on the 14th day of March, 1893, in obedience to said instructions and orders, said Wells and Scheffer did so unlawfully break and enter plaintiff's said office, and carried away said books, papers, and correspondence, and demanded judgment in the sum of $50,000. At the time of these transactions, several of the defendants, including Horton and Boggs, were members of the legislature, then in session. Subsequently to the service of the summons upon them, but before the expiration of the time for answering, Horton and Boggs filed a petition in the court below alleging that they were members of the legislature of the state of Minnesota at the time of the service of the summons upon them, and that as such members they were privileged from the service of civil process during the session of the legislature, and that they were members of the house of representatives. Upon this petition an order to show cause was issued by the court below, requiring the plaintiff to appear and show cause why the service of the summons upon Horton and Boggs should not be set aside upon the ground that they were members of the house of representatives. Upon the hearing, April 7, 1893, the court set aside the service of the summons upon the two defendants, Horton and Boggs, upon the ground that, as such members of the legislature of the state of Minnesota, they were privileged from the service of any summons in a civil action during the term of such legislature.

The question involved here is whether such privilege existed, and whether the service of the summons was valid. In order that there shall not be any misunderstanding of this opinion, we state that in no way do we pass upon the merits of the plaintiff's complaint, or whether the defendants had the right to commit the acts which plaintiff, in his complaint, charges them with having done. That question is not before us. The question, however, involved, is one of very grave importance, and deserves, as it has received, the most careful and serious consideration. Even though, upon the first examination of the question, we may have had no doubts as to the law upon the subject, yet, when a large and intelligent body of men, representing a co-ordinate branch of the state government, claim certain privileges under a clause in the fundamental law, it becomes our imperative duty to examine the question with all the care, good faith, and ability which it is possible for us to do.

It is well understood that the powers of the state government are divided into three distinct departments,—legislative, executive, and judicial; and no person or persons belonging to or constituting one of these departments shall exercise any of the powers properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances expressly provided in the constitution. Const. art. 3, § 1. Each of the departments, within its proper sphere, is supreme. Probably, it would be difficult to find a more harmonious system of governmental workings than exists in these three co-ordinate departments, by which the functions of our state government are carried on. Each having due respect and proper regard for the rights of the other, no conflict need arise, as none has arisen, during the entire history of the state. Nor is this a case arising between these co-ordinate departments of the state government, but a question arising between one or more members of the legislature and the individual citizen. It is therefore a judicial, and not a legislative, question: that is, the question is not one of legislation or legislative powers upon general legislative subjects, but one affecting the privileges of the individual member, and the individual rights of the citizen. The main question is over the meaning or interpretation of a constitutional provision, which, in this case, is for the judiciary to determine, and which it must determine, because it has been brought before us. However disagreeable or difficult the questions submitted for our consideration and determination are, there is but one course for us to pursue, and that is to abide by the law and the constitution. It may not be inappropriate to cite the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall upon this subject in the case of Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 404, 5 L. ed. 291, where he said: "The judiciary cannot, as the legislature may, avoid a measure because it approaches the confines of the constitution. We cannot pass by a question because it is doubtful. With whatever doubts, with whatever difficulties, a case may be attended, we must decide it, if brought before us. We have no more right to decline the exercise of deciding than we have to usurp a power not given. The one or the other would be treason to the constitution. Questions may occur which we would gladly avoid, but we cannot avoid them. All we can do is to exercise our best judgment, and to conscientiously perform our duty."

Referring again to the main question, is there such inviolability surrounding a member of the legislature that service of a summons in a civil action cannot be made upon him while such legislature is in session? He has a right, during all such time, to bring a suit himself against the individual citizen, and individual rights should be equal and reciprocal; and they are so, unless there is an exemption or privilege paramount and superior in behalf of the legislator. All citizens should be deemed to stand equal in their rights before the law. This country recognizes no special privileged class, except those exempt by express provision of law or the constitution; and, when a citizen or officer claims such privilege, it is his duty to show affirmatively and conclusively that he is privileged above other of his fellow citizens.

We do not concede any such inherent right on the part of a member of the legislature as contended for by defendants' counsel. If it exists at all, it is because it is conferred by the constitutional provision in question. Before considering this provision more particularly, let us examine some of its other provisions, and see what are the rights of the people: "Government is instituted for the security, benefit, and protection of the people." Const. art. 1, § 1. "Every person is entitled to a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries or wrongs which he may receive in his person, property, or character; he ought to obtain justice freely and without purchase; completely and without denial; promptly and without delay, conformably to the laws." Id. § 8. These words were not inserted in the constitution as a matter of idle ceremony, or as "a string of glittering generalities." It is the pride of the American citizen, and one of the grandest attributes of citizenship, that these provisions of the fundamental law stand as a protection and unassailable bulwark against the enforcement of unjust and illegal power. The constitution did not create property, or the liberty of the citizen, but it does protect both; and its prohibitions and inhibitions stay the march of organized or individual power, when it attempts the conversion of one or the destruction of the other. The exercise of official or individual power can only be enforced within the constitutional restrictions, and it should pause when the danger line is reached, and the life, liberty, or property of the citizen becomes thereby imperiled. The attempt sometimes made to exercise illegal power is the first warning which the people have of its assumed existence.

Turning now to the constitutional provision in question, we find it reads as follows: "The members of each house shall in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace be privileged from arrest during the session of their respective houses and in going to and returning from the same; for any speech or debate in either house they shall not be questioned in any other place." Id. art. 4, § 8. The defendants contend that the word "arrest," in the above constitutional provision, is broad enough to exempt them from the service of process, whether accompanied by actual seizure of the person or not, and that courts cannot strip them of this right. If this right or privilege exists, they would be correct in their contention. This, however, is not an attempt to strip them of power, but a question of the very existence of the power itself. If it does not exist, then they are not stripped of any power whatever. An exemption or privilege cannot be created or lawfully exercised simply because it is claimed or asserted. The English parliament once asserted the legislative privilege of its members from arrest, and then, as an omnipotent judicial body, decided that such privilege existed, but that system of procedure is not a part of our governmental administration. And even there such proceedings became so odious and unpalatable, and such abuses were practiced under it, that the privilege was finally abolished by statute,—matters which we shall refer to hereafter in this opinion.

It is further contended by the defendants that the courts of the state of Wisconsin, prior to the date of our organic law, decided this question in accordance with their claims, and that when our constitution was adopted, October 18, 1857, the word "arrest" had a fixed and definite meaning in the minds of those who framed it, and that we should follow the decisions of the courts of that state; and in support of this view they cite the case of Doty v. Strong, 1 Pinney, 84, where a summons in a civil action was served on a delegate in congress from that state, and the court construed the clause in the constitution of the United States upon this question in accordance with the view of the defendants herein. The case of Anderson v. Rountree, Id. 115 (decided in 1841), is also cited. It was the case of service of a summons upon a member of the legislative assembly of that state one day after the adjournment of the assembly, and the court held that he was privileged from the service of such summons. These are all of the decisions of the courts of the state of Wisconsin that we are referred to, and they were made prior to the passage of the organic act creating a territorial government for Minnesota.

To further support this view of their case the defendants quote from our organic act (passed in 1849) a part of section 12, as follows: "That the inhabitants of said territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities heretofore granted and secured to the territory of Wisconsin, and to its inhabitants; and the laws in force in the territory of Wisconsin at the date of the admission of the state of Wisconsin, shall continue to be valid and operative therein." This quotation is correct, so far as it goes; but, to understand the full meaning and legal effect of that section, we quote that portion omitted by defendants' counsel, and which follows the above extract, viz.: "So far as the same be not incompatible with the provisions of this act, subject however nevertheless, to be altered, modified, or repealed by the governor and legislative assembly of the said territory of Minnesota." Conceding, therefore, that the decisions of the courts of the state of Wisconsin are part of its laws, yet our organic act expressly reserves to Minnesota the right to alter, modify, or repeal such laws as were in force when the state of Wisconsin was admitted into the Union. We are not willing to concede that this right would not exist without the above provision in the organic act. On the contrary, we think that the territorial legislature of Minnesota, or its constitutional convention, had a right to pass, frame, or adopt such provisions of law as they saw fit, not inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Nor are we bound by the decisions of the courts of the state of Wisconsin in the construction of their legislative laws similar in language to our constitutional provisions, however persuasive or able such decisions may be. And here it may be well to refer to the constitution of that state, adopted February 1, 1848, and in force when Minnesota was organized as a territory, and when our constitution was adopted, in 1857; it being well understood that the territory of Minnesota once formed a part of the territory and state of Wisconsin. The provision of the constitution of that state in regard to the privilege of members of the legislature differs materially from ours. It is as follows: "Members of the legislature shall in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest, nor shall they be subject to any civil process during the session of the legislature, nor for fifteen days next before the commencement and after the termination of each session." Article 4, § 15. If it was the settled law of the territory of Wisconsin that the word "arrest" had a fixed, definite, and settled meaning, and that it covered the service of a summons in a civil action, it seems strange that the latter phrase was inserted in the constitution of that state. Evidently, the members of that convention which framed the constitution had grave doubts about the soundness of the decisions of their court, or else they were guilty of tautology in framing their fundamental law; a transaction unheard of in any other instance, for constitutions are framed in the most concise language possible. If the phrase, "nor shall they be subject to any civil process," be omitted, then the provision would be substantially like ours. Standing together, "arrest" means one thing, and "subject to civil process" means another, or else the latter phrase is utterly useless and unnecessary.

Now, assuming that the Minnesota legislature had the legal power to pass such laws as it deemed proper, not repugnant to the laws and constitution of the United States, we find that it passed a law defining the meaning of the word "arrest." Minn. Stat. 1851, chap. 118, § 1, is as follows: "Arrest is the taking of a person into custody, that he may be held for a public offense." Section 5 of the same chapter provides "that an arrest is made by an actual restraint of the person of the defendant, or by his submission to the custody of the officer." The same statute provides "that a civil action is commenced by the service of a summons delivered to the defendant personally, or by leaving a copy of the summons at his usual place of abode." All these provisions of the Statute of 1851 were in force at the time of the adoption of our constitution, and ever since have been the law of this state. The same definition and meaning of the word "arrest" is given by the lexicographers, and in our law dictionaries. We cite the following authorities in support of our statutory definition of the word "arrest": "An arrest is the taking, seizing, or detaining the person of another, touching or putting hands upon him in the execution of process, or any act indicating an intention to arrest." United States v. Benner, Baldw. 284. "An arrest signifies a restraint of the person; a restriction of the right of locomotion." Hart v. Flynn, 8 Dana, 191. "Arrest is the apprehension or detaining of the person in order to be forthcoming to answer an alleged or supposed crime." Montgomery County v. Robinson, 85 Ill. 176. "By 'arrest' is to be understood to take the party into custody. An arrest is the beginning of imprisonment, when a man is first taken and restrained of his liberty by power or color of warrant." French v. Bancroft, 1 Met. 504. The same meaning of the word "arrest" was well known and understood at the time of the adoption of our state constitution, and it was not questioned in either of the two conventions; and it is a significant fact that the words, "nor shall they be subject to any civil process during the session of the legislature," found in the Wisconsin constitution, were entirely omitted from our constitution. The meaning of the word "arrest," as defined above, has stood so long unchallenged that it will doubtless be a surprise to judges, lawyers, and the people of this state, that it is now for the first time, in any manner, questioned, and it will be a greater surprise if this court shall construe the law to be that, when an officer has served a summons upon a person in a civil action, he has thereby arrested him. Nor does public policy or public interest demand any such interpretation of the word as contended for by the defendants. The provision in question, even as we construe it, is a most extraordinary one. We do not find it discussed during the constitutional debates at the time of the adoption of our constitution, being substantially the same as the provision in the constitution of the United States relating to members of congress, and seems to have been made a part of our constitution without debate or consideration by the conventions. As members can only be arrested, during a session of the legislature, for treason, felony, and breach of the peace, does it not necessarily follow that they could not be arrested during such time for the most serious misdemeanors, unless such ones as may be included in the term "breach of the peace?" If so, then we are fully justified in saying that such provision is a most extraordinary one; and we do not feel justified in enlarging or extending the power by any strained or tortured definition of the word "arrest," or giving it a meaning in violation of the statute, of the decisions of the courts, and of lexicographers. The right already yielded up by the people in this respect seems sufficient, without having their rights in civil actions abated, and possibly lost or destroyed; and we have not the will or authority, by any strained construction, to aid in placing a constitutional provision beyond a reasonable and safe foundation, upon which the people may stand and defend their rights as against any branch of the sovereign power.

But it may be asked, What is the danger if the word "arrest" is construed as contended for by the defendants' counsel? Suppose a member should imprison his wife, child, friend, or a stranger, for some fancied or imaginary cause, and the writ of habeas corpus could not be served upon him, by reason of this legislative privilege, what would become of our constitutional guaranty "that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended." What would this birthright of every American citizen be worth, if his personal liberty can be thus abridged, and stand in abeyance, during a session of the legislature? This writ is not a criminal process. It can be served, and always is served, without arresting the defendant. Are the people ready to surrender up this great charter of human rights in obedience to this demand of legislative privilege? Important as are legislative duties, the advantage of exempting a member from the service of this writ upon him would be a poor compensation for its denial, even for the period of three months. Valuable property rights or interests might also be injured or destroyed if this theory of privilege is upheld. Take the subject of waste, which is legally defined to be whatever does lasting damage to the freehold, and, as ordinarily understood, implies taking of property without right, without sanction of law, in violation of right or liens thereon. The commission of waste might not only be a very serious injury to the individual citizen, but as between members of the legislature themselves. Suppose a senator residing in Dakota county owned a thousand acres of land, valuable principally for its timber, and he should sell the same to the senator from Otter Tail county, receiving back a purchase-money mortgage for nearly the full consideration of the land, and just at the commencement of a session of the legislature the senator from Otter Tail county should, with a large number of employes, commence cutting and removing such timber, with intent to forthwith cut and remove the same, and thus impair, if not substantially destroy, the mortgage security. Would not the senator from Dakota county have a right to apply to the court for redress, and, by a proper writ issued therefrom, enjoin the senator from Otter Tail county from committing such lasting damage? To say that this cannot be done is to say that we can trifle with vested rights in valuable property. Again, suppose a member of the legislature, during a session thereof, should wrongfully and unlawfully enter upon a farm, and drive away a large amount of stock, and carry away other valuable farm property under an assumed claim of right, but not under such circumstances as would constitute larceny or a breach of the peace. Would the rightful owner be without remedy or redress during a legislative session because of this assumed legislative privilege? What are property rights worth, if there is no protection for them? Suppose the time limited for commencing suit upon valuable causes of action against a member would expire during a session of the legislature. Would the cause of action be lost because of this privilege? Certainly it would, if defendants' contention is correct. Suppose, also, that one of the members of the legislature should interfere with our public conveyances, such as railroads and street-cars, and thereby impede public travel and interfere with the public business. Can there be no remedy, no relief, and no redress? Such a claim is preposterous. And the same might be said in cases of the creation and continuance of private or public nuisances whereby serious injury might result. So, too, in case of a member of the legislature becoming insolvent, he could dispose of his property, or attempt to do so, by some fraudulent act, and before the creditor could have any summons served, or other civil proceedings instituted, he might be without remedy, and his rights lost, before an adjournment of the legislature. Attachment proceedings might also be thus rendered useless. One more illustration: It is a well-known fact that at the time of election in several instances, members have been holding important county or town offices, and continued to retain them, and receive the fees and emoluments thereof, in direct violation of a constitutional prohibition. Do the public interests require, or a sound public policy demand, that no writ of quo warrant'o shall be served upon a member of a legislature during a session thereof, in such cases? We say that the highest interests of the public, and especially the public welfare of the communities affected, such as counties and towns, demand that no such privilege or exemption shall exist.

However plausible the theory that a member of the legislature should not be embarrassed with private suits, and thus drawn aside from public duty, we think that the danger and disadvantage is more imaginary than real. We have never heard of an instance where men were deterred from serving as member of a legislature because they were subject to service of process in a civil action, nor that public business was delayed or suffered from any such cause. It is a notable fact that the constitution provides that a majority of each house shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; and the people, through a constitutional amendment, have abolished annual legislative sessions. The rules of nearly all legislative bodies provide for granting leave of absence to individual members, and such leave is seldom refused. Nor under ordinary circumstances, would a case be pressed for trial, against a member of the legislature, during a session thereof. If the claim of privilege is based upon the ground of public policy and public interest, it could as appropriately be claimed by the members of the executive and judicial departments, and by those who have ministerial duties to perform, most of whom are nearly all the time engaged in the discharge of their official duties. And may we not inquire, with great propriety, if it is not as important to execute the laws as to make them?

It remains for us to briefly refer to the authorities upon this subject. Among the English authorities, there appears to be some uncertainty and confusion upon the question of privilege from arrest. It was once the rule there established to protect members of parliament from being molested by their fellow subjects or oppressed by the crown, and to prevent their being diverted from their public duties, and this privilege extended to exemption from the service of civil process. But as early as 1664, in the celebrated case of Benyon v. Evelyn, found in Bridgman, 324, in the court of king's bench, it was held: "It is lawful to sue out an original against a member for the house of commons, although parliament is sitting." The opinion was delivered by the chief justice, Sir Orlando Bridgman, and he attacked Lord Coke for asserting a contrary doctrine in his treatise on the High Court of Parliament. In 4 Frynne's Brief Survey of Parliamentary Writs (page 814), it is stated that "the case of Sir George Benyon v. Sir George Evelyn was adjudged in the court of common pleas (Hil. 15 & 16 Car. II). by all the judges thereof, upon demurrer, as follows: 'It was resolved upon solemn argument by all the judges (especially the lord chief justice, Sir Orlando Bridgman, arguing it very largely and learnedly) that the privilege of parliament did not take away the liberty of the subject to commence and prosecute actions of trespass, debt, account, covenant, and the like, against members of parliament, or their menial servants, even in parliament time.'" Lord Campbell says of Sir Orlando Bridgman, the chief justice, "that this was his most celebrated judgment, and endeared his memory to the enemies of parliamentary privilege." The action itself was one in debt for merchandise, and the defense interposed was that Sir George Evelyn was a member of the house of commons, and privileged from service of process. These privileges and exemptions were pressed and claimed in so many instances that they became odious and intolerable, so that the courts of justice were called upon to determine the question; and finally parliament itself passed an Act in 1869, which we find in 10 Geo. III. chap. 50, which declares: "Sec. 1. Any person may at any time commence and prosecute any action or suit in any court of record, or court of equity, or of admiralty, and in all cases matrimonial and testamentary, against any peer or lord of parliament of Great Britain or against the knights, citizens, or burgesses for the time being or against any of their menial or any servants or any other persons entitled to the privilege of parliament; and no such action, suit, or other process or proceeding thereupon, shall at any time be impeached, stayed, or delayed by or under any color, or pretense of any privilege of parliament." We believe that this act has been the law of England ever since, and settled all controversy upon the subject, and there established the doctrine contended for by the plaintiff here. This, it will be observed, was prior to our Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, and the adoption of the United States Constitution, which was signed in 1787. We fail, therefore, to see how this claim of privilege made by the defendants could have been the common law of this country, or of the territory or state of Wisconsin, or of this state, at any time. The case of Merick v. Giddings, reported in MacArth. & M. 55, is an able decision, rendered by Mr. Justice Wylie, holding that "a member of congress of the United States is at all times as liable to service of process as any other individual, except that during his attendance on the session of congress, and in going to and returning, he is privileged from arrest in any suit or action." In the case of Gentry v. Griffith, 27 Tex. 461, it was held that "members of the legislature are not privileged against the service of citation in civil suits by virtue of the provisions in the constitution of the state granting immunity from arrest to such members during the session of the legislature, and while going to and returning from the same." While some of the authorities cited by the defendants sustain their contention, yet most of them are not in point, and not applicable to this question. The privilege from service of a summons or process in a civil action, of a witness or party, in certain cases, as in attendance upon court, is based upon the ground that it is necessary for the due administration of justice. If witnesses or parties living beyond our jurisdiction, or abroad, were subject to the service of civil process when coming within the jurisdiction of the courts of this state, they would be deterred from coming at all, as nonresidents cannot be compelled to appear here and testify, and there might frequently be a failure of the complete administration of justice in such cases. Nor is there a case cited by the defendants' counsel which, by force of its reasoning, or weight as authority, tends in the least to change our views upon the question submitted for our consideration. We do not think that any practical injury can result to the public or the individual members of the legislature from our holding in this case as we do, but that, on the other hand, public interest and private rights might receive serious injury, and become greatly impaired or destroyed, if defendants' contention is upheld.

Possibly, this opinion has been extended to an unnecessary length, but the importance of the question is our excuse and justification for so doing. In conclusion, we say that this constitutional provision is not a mass of jangled words and unfathomable mysteries, and it should not be wrenched from its obvious meaning, in direct violation of its straightforward, grammatical sense.

The order of the court below is reversed.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

OAKDALE MANUFACTURING CO. et al.

v.

Sebastian GARST.

(.....R. L.....)

1. The issuance of an injunction against violation of his agreement not to engage again individually in the business cannot be prevented on the ground that the contract tends to create a monopoly, by a manufacturer who, for mutual advantage, unites with other manufacturers of the same product in a combination of stocks, machinery, accounts, and good-will, and the formation of a corporation to operate the combined business.
2. A foreign corporation will not be denied recognition by the courts of a state merely because composed exclusively of its own citizens.
3. A contract will not be declared void for unreasonableness which prevents a manufacturer of oleomargarine from again engaging in the business for five years upon his uniting with other manufacturers in the formation of a corporation for the production of that article.

(February 27, 1894.)

BILL in equity to restrain defendant from violating his agreement not to engage in the business of manufacturing oleomargarine. Decree in favor of complainants.

The material part of the agreement which was the foundation of this suit was as follows:

"And it is further mutually covenanted and agreed by and between the parties hereto, each for himself, however, and not for the others, that they will not engage directly or indirectly in any business of the same kind or for the same purpose or purposes as that to be carried on by the corporation to be formed, nor will they directly or indirectly be concerned in or be interested in any firm, firms, corporation, or corporations, engaged in the same business, or business similar to the business of the corporation to be formed, for the period of five years from and after the date of the agreement."

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Arnold Green, with Messrs. Comstock & Gardner, for complainants:

Public policy is a variable quantity; it must vary, and does vary, with the habits, capacities, and opportunities of the public. Originally all contracts in restraint of trade were void; now only such restraint as cannot under any circumstances be needed for the protection of the person for whose benefit it is made is void. Formerly the burden of proof was upon the covenantee to show that the restraint was reasonable; now it is upon the covenantor to show that it is unreasonable.

Mills v. Dunham [1891] 1 Ch. 576.

Where the restraint is partial, that is to say subject to some qualifications, either as to time or space, there is no hard and fast rule which holds the contract illegal by reason of the absence of limitation in one of these respects. The question then is whether the covenant is reasonable, and if reasonable it is good in law.

The reasonableness of the restraint depends upon all the circumstances, which must be duly weighed in each case. If the restraint is greater than can possibly be required for the protection of the business of the covenantee, the covenant is unreasonable and void. If the restraint is not greater than can possibly be required for the protection of the business of the covenantee, it is not unreasonable and will be enforced.

Leather Cloth Co. v. Lonsont, L. R. 9 Eq. 345; Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351; Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Schott [1892] 3 Ch. 447; Printing Numerical Registering Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 462; Hubbard v. Miller, 27 Mich. 15, 15 Am. Rep. 153; Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 73, 4 Am. Rep. 513; Tobé v. Gross, 13 L. R. A. 652, 127 N. Y. 480; Watertown Thermometer Co. v. Pool, 51 Hun. 157; Central Shade Roller Co. v. Cushman, 143 Mass. 853; Ellerman v. Chicago Junction Railway & Union Stock Yards Co. 49 N. J. Eq. 217; Herreshoff v. Routineau, 8 L. R. A. 469, 17 R. I. 8.

A covenant which would otherwise be void, because too broad in its restraints, may sometimes be enforced against the covenantor on the ground that he has not deprived himself of a continuing interest in the business forming the subject of the contract, and therefore is not injured but rather benefited by entering into it.

Diamond Match Co. v. Roeder, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 484; Dolph v. Troy Laundry Machinery Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 653.

Contracts void as tending to create a monopoly are only such as have for their sole or main object the suppression of competition. Covenantants entered into by the vendor of a business and of its good-will with his vendee do not come within the rule.

Spelling, Trusts & Monopolies, 74, and cases cited.

The business of the plaintiff corporation violates no law or policy of either Rhode Island or Kentucky.

Messrs. Edward D. Bassett and Simon S. Lapham, for respondents:

The law does not say that instruments of this description before they may be declared illegal, shall, in plain language, affirm the intention to be to prevent competition and control the market or advance the prices of necessary commodities. If it did it would by that requirement supply a device for evading its wholesome restraints and rendering its principles wholly nugatory.

Woodruff v. Woodruff, 53 N. Y. 58; Phippen v. Stickney, 3 Met. 384; People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 5 L. R. A. 386, 54 Hun, 354.

Such being the true purpose of this combination the law is too well settled to be questioned as to its legality.

Arnot v. Pittston & E. Coal Co. 68 N. Y. 558, 23 Am. Rep. 190; Gardiner v. Morse, 25 Me. 140; Saratoga County Bank v. King, 44 N. Y. 87; Emery v. Ohio Candle Co. 47 Ohio St. 320; Berlin Mach. Works v. Perry, 71 Wis. 495; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346, 23 Am. Rep. 171; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159.

This contract sought to be enforced is one entered into by individuals to form a corporation in violation of the laws of this state. As such it cannot be enforced.

A foreign corporation is only recognized by comity.

Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 558, 10 L. ed. 293; Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 34 N. Y. 208; American & Foreign Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 353, 25 L. ed. 888.

Comity does not require the enforcement of a provision in an executory contract for the breach of its laws.

Montgomery v. Forbes, 148 Mass. 249; Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 31; Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex.) 12 L. R. A. 366.

The agreement in restraint of trade here sought to be enforced is unreasonable. It is world-wide. And unless the business sought to be restricted was commensurate to the space restricted it will not be enforced.

Herreshoff v. Boutineau, 8 L. R. A. 469, 17 R. I. 8; Wiley v. Baumgardner, 97 Ind. 66, 49 Am. Rep. 427; Callahan v. Donnelly, 45 Cal. 153, 18 Am. Rep. 172.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants seek an injunction against the respondent to restrain him from violating his covenant that he would not engage or be concerned in, directly or indirectly, the manufacture or sale of butterine or oleomargarine, for the space of five years from the date of the covenant. Prior to April 30, 1891, the parties carried on that business separately, when they agreed to unite and form a corporation for the purpose of carrying on their business together. To this end, all the parties turned in the stock, machinery, accounts, and good-will of their respective concerns, at a valuation greatly in excess of the value of the property itself, 23 L. R. A.

taking an amount of stock in the corporation represented by such valuation. The corporation has carried on the business since that time. In August, 1892, the defendant sold his stock in the company, to present holders, for $60,000, although, as he says, the property it represented was worth only about $28,000. After this he entered the same business again, and claims the right to do so upon the following grounds, viz.: (1) That he was induced to enter into the contract through false and fraudulent misrepresentations of the complainants; (2) that the contract is void as a combination to raise the price of a necessary and useful commodity in trade, and to stifle competition; (3) that one purpose of the contract was to form a corporation in violation of the laws of this state; (4) that, the contract being in restraint of trade, its enforcement is unreasonable.

As to the first defense, it is sufficient to say that we do not find it to be supported by the evidence. The respondent knew perfectly well what he was doing in making the arrangement, and agreed to it freely. The facts that one of the companies was using a secret process to preserve the freshness of the product, so that it could be exported to tropical climates, and that it was engaged to some extent in such export are shown by the proof.

In support of the second ground of defense, the respondent cites cases of contracts to create a monopoly and to force prices. Such was People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co., 54 Hun, 354, 5 L. R. A. 386, a proceeding to vacate the charter of the company because it had become a partner in the "Sugar Trust." The unlawfulness of such a combination was largely dwelt upon, but in the court of appeals (121 N. Y. 582, 9 L. R. A. 83) the decision was sustained only upon the ground that the company had practically relinquished its corporate functions, and so had forfeited its franchise. Arnot v. Pittston & E. Coal Co. 68 N. Y. 558, 23 Am. Rep. 190; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346, 23 Am. Rep. 171; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159, and Emery v. Ohio Candle Co. 47 Ohio St. 320,—were cases where contracts, based upon a monopoly, were held to be invalid. Undoubtedly, there may be combinations so destructive of the right of the people to buy and sell and to pursue their business freely that they must be declared to be void upon the ground of public policy. In such cases the injury to the public is the controlling consideration. But it does not follow that every combination in trade, even though such combination may have the effect to diminish the number of competitors in business, is therefore illegal. Such a rule would produce greater public injury than that which it would seek to cure. It would be impracticable. It would forbid partnerships and sales by those engaged in a common business. It would cut off consolidations to secure the advantages of united capital and economy of administration. It would prevent all restrictions and exclusive privileges, and hamper the familiar conduct of commerce in many ways. There may be many such arrangements which will be beneficial to the parties, and not injurious to the public. Monopolies are liable to be oppressive, and hence are deemed to be hostile to the public good. But combinations for mutual advantage, which do not amount to a monopoly, but leave the field of competition open to others, are neither within the reason nor the operation of the rule. This is well put in Skrainka v. Scharringhausen, 8 Mo. App. 522, where twenty-four owners of stone quarries, on account of a ruinous competition, which made it impossible to work their quarries at a profit, made an agreement to sell through a common agent for the space of six months, and the agreement was sustained. The court says: "But not every agreement in restraint of trade is illegal. Where the contract injures the parties making it, by diminishing their means for supporting their families, tends to deprive the public of the services of useful men, discourages the industry, diminishes the production, prevents competition, enhances prices, and, being made by large companies or corporations, excludes rivalry, and engrosses the markets,—tends to 'make a corner,' to use the slang of the stock and provision gamblers,—it is against the policy of the law. But restraints upon trade imposed by agreement, under limitations as to locality, time, and persons, are not necessarily restraints of trade in the general sense which is objectionable." So in Tode v. Gross, 127 N. Y. 480, 13 L. R. A. 652, the defendants had sold their business of making cheese by secret process, under a general restriction not to engage in the business for five years, with reference to which it is said: "The covenant was not in general restraint of trade, but was a reasonable measure of mutual protection to the parties, as it enabled the one to sell at the highest price, and the other to get what they paid for. It imposed no restriction on either that was not beneficial to the other by enhancing the price to the seller or protecting the purchaser. Recent cases make it very clear that such an agreement is not opposed to public policy, even if the restriction was unlimited as to both time and territory. The restriction under consideration, however, was not unlimited as to time." These two cases state a very sensible rule, both as to the public and the parties, and they are exactly like the case before us. Here there is no monopoly. Three of the four companies in New England in this line of manufacture agreed to unite; one inducement being to stop the sharp competition then existing between them. But even so, not only is the field open to the other company, equal in strength to either of these, but it is also open to competition from companies in other parts of the country and to the formation of new companies. This is neither a monopoly, nor such an approach to it as amounts to the same thing. It is the common occurrence of a consolidation of firms. It is not illegal on the ground of reducing competition.

With reference to the third ground of defense, it does not appear that the agreement in any way violates the laws or policy of this state, and if it did, the defendant, being a party to it, could not set it up. Chafes v. Sprague Mfg. Co. 14 R. I. 168. The mere fact that the complainant corporation is created under the laws of the state of Kentucky is not sufficient to warrant a dismissal of its case, for foreign corporations have frequently been recognized as suitors in this court. Windham County Bank v. Kendall, 7 R. I. 77; Hove Mach. Co. v. York, 11 R. I. 888; Boston & O. Smelting Co. v. Smith, 18 R. I. 27, 43 Am. Rep. 8; Singer Mfg. Co. v. King, 14 R. I. 511. They are also recognized as doing business here by comity. Pierce v. Orompton, 13 R. I. 312. While the fact that citizens of Rhode Island go to Kentucky for an act of incorporation is one that naturally excites curiosity, if not suspicion, as to the motives and good faith of the concern, yet so long as it pursues a lawful business, and violates no law of this state, we do not see how we can refuse to recognize it. True, the advantages of yearly statements and liability of stockholders, given to creditors under our statute, are wanting; but that is a matter for those who deal with the corporation to consider. We can hardly deny the right of a foreign corporation to do business in this state, upon considerations of public policy, when our own statutes (Pub. Laws, chap. 1900) expressly provide for corporations formed in this state for carrying on business out of the state.

The fourth ground of defense involves the reasonableness of the restrictive covenant. The test of reasonableness is the test of validity in contracts of this kind. The test is to be applied according to the circumstances of the contract, and is not to be arbitrarily limited by boundaries of time and space. There has been much discussion upon this subject, which need not be repeated. The law has advanced, pari passu with social progress, to a point of practical unanimity. The rule, now generally received, has been recognized in this state, that contracts in restraint of trade are not necessarily void by reason of universality of time (French v. Parker, 16 R. I. 219), nor of space (Herrdshoff v. Boutineau, 17 R. I. 3, 8 L. R. A. 469); but they depend upon the reasonableness of the restrictions under the conditions of each case. The diversity of these conditions produces an apparent diversity of decision, and yet it will be found upon examination that most of the cases really turn upon the reasonableness of the restriction. For example, in Wiley v. Baumgardner, 97 Ind. 66, 49 Am. Rep. 427, cited by the respondent, sale was made of a dry-goods store, with the vendor's agreement not to engage in the dry goods business for five years; and in Herrdshoff v. Boutineau the agreement was not to teach within this state. In these cases the subjects of the contracts were of a purely local character, and outside restraint was unreasonable. On the other hand, in Watertown Thermometer Co. v. Pool, 51 Hun, 157, where the business was extensive, restraint within the entire territory of the United States, and in Tode v. Gross, 127 N. Y. 480, 13 L. R. A. 652, unlimited restraint as to territory, were sustained. The contract is to be determined by its subject-matter and the conditions under which it was made; by considerations of extensiveness or localism, of protection to interests sold and paid for, of mere deprivation of public rights for private gain, of proper advantage on one side, or useless oppression on the other. In this case the contracting parties were all capable business men. They knew what they were about. The clause objected to was mutually beneficial and equally restrictive. The respondent was to gain as much advantage from it as any of the others, so long as he remained in the company, and in case of sale it would enhance the value of his stock. And this it did; for, when he sold his stock, he received for it more than double what he testified the property was worth. Having received this large price for his stock, he now seeks to destroy its value upon the ground that the original agreement was unreasonable. The circumstances show that it was not unreasonable. The parties contemplated an extensive business, with a special effort to develop an export trade. No limitation of foreign countries could be made in advance, for the company was to seek its markets. In this country it might need to set branches in different parts for the sale or manufacture or exportation of its products. Time was needed to ascertain what could be done, and where, and so the term of five years was agreed upon within which the company should be free to seek its field of operation. To allow the respondent now to overthrow that agreement would be grossly inequitable.

We think the complainants are entitled to the relief prayed for.

VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

N. F. YOUNG et al.

(89 Va. 675.)

1. A mere possibility, such as the right to a fee in real property in case of sur-

NOTE.—What expectant and contingent interests in real property are subject to attachment or levy on execution.

This note will be confined exclusively to the interest of an heir in the lands of his ancestor, to reversions, remainders, executory devises, inchoate rights of dower, and curtesy initiate.

General rule.

The general rule is that lands, tenements, and hereditaments which may be taken and sold on execution include all possible titles to lands contingent or otherwise, where there is a real interest, but do not include mere expectancies such as that of an heir apparent. Roe v. Humphreys, 1 Yeates, 427.

Thus laid down in a case in which property was devised to a sister of the testator for life remainder to a nephew for life and the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and in default of such heirs, to another nephew in fee, the court holding that the estate of the first nephew is included in the words "lands, tenements, and hereditaments" which may be taken and sold on execution. See also Woodgate v. Fleet, 44 N. Y. 1; Williams v. Amory, 14 Mass. 20; Brown v. Gale, 5 N. H. 417,—for substantially similar rulings.

So the term "land" as used in the California statute embraces all titles legal or equitable, perfect or imperfect, any interest in land therefore, whether legal or equitable, is subject to attachment or execution. Fish v. Fowle, 58 Cal. 373. So held with reference to the interest of a purchaser under an executory contract of purchase.

In Wilkinson v. Chew, 54 Ga. 602, it was said that "upon principle as well as authority subjection to levy and sale should rest on two questions only: Is there a vested interest? and, Is it so definite as to be susceptible of description in terms of legal certainty? What equities may afterwards arise between co-tenants or co-distributees may be left to the general resources of remedial jurisprudence."

But where it is uncertain to whom the estate will pass, or where it is limited to take effect upon a contingency or uncertain event, it is a mere contingency not subject to levy and sale. Haward v. Peavy, 128 Ill. 433; Decker v. Burnham, 146 Ill. 2; Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450.

2. A contingent remainder may be charged with a deed of trust under a statute authorizing "any interest or claim to real estate" to be disposed of by deed or will.

Thus the right of a minor to avoid a conveyance of his real property upon coming of age is not subject to attachment, and a sale thus made which he neither avoids nor confirms is good as against an attachment made by a creditor after he becomes of age. Kendall v. Lawrence, 22 Pick. 540.

So the mere right of survivorship which both husband and wife have in lands held by them by the entirety is an incident of the estate and not a contingent or vested remainder, which is subject to sale on execution. Davis v. Clark, 26 Ind. 423, 59 Am. Dec. 471; Chandler v. Cheney, 37 Ind. 391; Jones v. Chandler, 40 Ind. 588; Carver v. Smith, 90 Ind. 223, 46 Am. Rep. 210; Hulett v. Inlow, 57 Ind. 412, 26 Am. Rep. 64; Vinton v. Beamer, 55 Mich. 559.

The joint estate cannot be sold to satisfy a judgment against the husband. Thomas v. De Baum, 14 N. J. Eq. 87.

And if the creditors have levied upon it during the life of the husband as his estate the wife may recover it after his death if she survive him in an action of ejectment. Brownson v. Hull, 16 Vt. 303, 42 Am. Dec. 517.

Some of the cases, however, have treated the husband's estate in lands held with his wife by the entirety without referring to the expectancy based upon the right of survivorship as subject to execution holding that under statutory provision preserving the rights of the wife, a purchaser at the execution sale takes in subordination to the contingent rights of the wife who will become the absolute owner, if she survives her husband, but if ERROR to the Corporation Court of the City of Norfolk to review a decree establishing certain liens against the shares of certain of the tenants in common in real estate which the tenants were seeking to have partitioned between them. Reversed in part.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Watts & Hutton, for appellants:

Mr. Fearn, in his classification of contingent remainders, places under class 4 those which are contingent because of the uncertainty of the person to take. He says those remainders are contingent where the persons to take are not in esse or not ascertained. It is impossible to tell, during the lifetime of Ann Porter Young, which of her children will survive her. The children of Ann Porter Young took during her lifetime a contingent remainder in the real estate devised and such remainder was contingent on account of the uncertainty of the person to take.

1 Minor, Inst. 387, 389; Fearn, Rem. 1-9, 116, 117; Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450; Watson v. Dodd, 68 N. C. 530.

Such remainder is not such an interest in, or right to, real estate as is liable to, or affected by, the lien of a judgment or attachment, or such an interest as can be passed by a deed or other conveyance.

Our Statute (Code 1887, § 3567; Code 1878, chap. 182, § 6) provides that a judgment shall be a lien on all the real estate of or to which the judgment debtor is possessed or entitled at or after the date of the judgment. And real estate is declared to include lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all rights thereto or interests therein, other than a chattel interest. Code 1887, § 5, par. 10; Code 1878, chap. 15, § 9, par. 10.

At common law where the person was certain and the event uncertain, the remainder was descendable and passed to the heirs of the the husband survives the purchaser becomes the absolute owner thereof, though until the time of the wife's death he cannot take possession or interfere with the property. See Ames v. Norman, 64 Pa. 41; French v. Mehan, 56 Pa. 236.

An estate devised to husband and wife is held in Wisconsin as at common law, and at least the husband's life estate therein is subject to execution. Bennett v. Child, 19 Wis. 362, 83 Am. Dec. 692.

In People v. Haskins, 7 Wend. 462, it was held that a rent reserved upon a lease in fee containing a clause of distress and re-entry, constitutes an interest in land which may be sold on execution as real estate, but that a rent seek is not such an interest.

People v. Haskins, supra, however, was overruled in Payn v. Beal, 4 Denio, 406, in which it is said that the right of re entry is a mere possibility of an estate which is neither lands, tenements, nor real estate within the meaning of the statute authorizing the levy of execution thereon.

But the doctrine that a grant of lands reserving an annual rent to be paid to the grantor his heirs or assigns payable in designated installments upon the proper payment of which the rent shall cease constitutes a rent charge which may be taken on execution, is adopted in Pennsylvania. Hurst v. Lithgow, 3 Yeates, 24, 1 Am. Dec. 326.

A statute allowing the creditor to take in execution "all rights of entry into land" refers to cases in which the debtor has been ousted or dispossessed of a freehold, and does not confer a right to take in execution a right of entry for breach of condition in a deed. Bangor v. Warren, 84 Me. 324, 56 Am. Dec. 657.

Such interests can be taken under execution only under the Illinois statute (Rev. Stat. chap. 77, § 8) as may be disposed of by the debtor himself; so held with reference to a devise of real property for life without the privilege to sell. Emerson v. Marks, 24 Ill. App. 642.

And dicta is to be found in some of the cases to the effect that all such interests and only such as can be sold or assigned can be taken on execution. See Douglas v. Massie, 16 Ohio, 271, 47 Am. Dec. 375; Watson v. Dodd, 68 N. C. 528.

But contingent estates and remainders have been held to be assignable when they were not subject to levy and sale under execution. Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450; Allston v. Bank of the State, 3 Hill, Eq. 236; Patterson v. Caldwell, 124 Pa. 455.

And under statutory provisions authorizing sales under execution differing from provisions 23 L. R. A.

authorizing the assignment of interests in lands, such a rule would of course have no application. See the principal case.

So a restriction on a husband's right to sell an estate granted to the husband for the benefit of his wife has reference to a voluntary sale and does not prevent alienation by process of law to satisfy his debts. Stoebler v. Kuerr, 5 Watts, 181.

In Nugent v. McCaffrey, 33 La. Ann. 271, it was held that under a statute providing that an action for the recovery of an immovable estate or an entire succession shall be considered as among incorporeal rights which are immovable from the objects to which they apply, an action for the recovery of real estate with damages is liable to seizure and sale under execution.

Interest of an heir in his ancestor's lands.

The undivided interest of an heir in lands in the hands of an administrator of his deceased ancestor may be attached, an attachment not dispossessing the administrator or interfering with the administration, but the levy is subject to be defeated, if it is found necessary to resort to the land to pay the debts of the intestate. McClellan v. Solomon, 23 Fla. 427.

And the undivided share of an heir in his ancestor's estate may be seized and sold under execution. Noble v. Nettles, 3 Rob. (La.) 15; Mayo v. Stroud, 12 Rob. (La.) 105; Dearmond v. Courtney, 13 La. Ann. 251; Black v. Steel, 1 Bail. L. 307.

The same rules are also substantially laid down in Hyde v. Barney, 17 Vt. 290, 44 Am. Dec. 335; Douglas v. Massie, 16 Ohio, 271, 47 Am. Dec. 375; Black v. Steel, supra.

The heirs of an intestate have a vested interest in his estate immediately after his death and before settlement thereof. Hyde v. Barney, supra.

And it is not necessary that the executor of an estate should have fully closed up the administration thereof, if he has assented to the life interest therein in order to render the interest in remainder or reversion limited upon the life estate subject to execution. Wilkinson v. Chew, 54 Ga. 602.

So an attachment followed by an execution in due course levied and extended upon the property of a co-heir immediately after the death of the person from whom he inherits and a sale thereunder transfers a good title as against a co-heir to whom that property is regularly assigned in the distribution of the estate. Proctor v. Newhall, 17 Mass. 81.

The seizure by a creditor under execution of the interest of his debtor as one of the heirs of an undivided estate, however, must extend to his whole interest subject to the charges with which it is remainderman, but this was not so where the person was uncertain and the event certain.

Fearne, Rem. 534-546; Lomax, Dig. 601; Watson v. Dodd, supra; 4 Kent, Com. 262.

The distinction is well settled and universally recognized and seems to proceed upon this principle: That where the person is certain and the event only uncertain, though the remainder is contingent, yet the contingency cannot fall in without benefitting that particular person; hence, whatever this thing the remainderman has is, whether you call it a possibility or an interest, however little it may be worth, it is his and no one's else, and whatever an ancestor has in the nature of an interest in land, however small its value, passes by descent; while, on the other hand, it is inherent, in the very nature of descent, that there should be something in the ancestor, and if it is uncertain that the ancestor is to take even if the event happen, then there can be no such thing as a descent from him. And a contingent remainder, whether descendable or not, has never been called an interest in or right to the land.

Story, Eq. Jur. 1040; Fearne, Rem. 15-33.

There is nothing in the statute to indicate any intention to make the judgment lien binding upon interest in or right to real estate, one half of which could not previously have been bound by the elegit.

The writ of elegit did not bind contingent estates.

Gilbert, Executions; Burton v. Smith, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 464, 10 L. ed. 248; Freeman, Executions, p. 178.

There is nothing in either the letter or spirit of the statutes referred to, which justifies an extension of their operation to interests in or rights to lands, which were not included with burdened: the right of the debtor to a part of the undivided property cannot be seized. Mayo v. Stroud, supra.

So in Clarke v. Harker, 48 Ga. 506, it was held that the undivided interest of a devisee in a portion of an estate cannot be sold on execution under a judgment against him, on the grounds that such a sale would defeat the right of the others to have a distribution in kind.

But this case was criticised in Wilkinson v. Chew, supra, however, in which it was held that an interest in reversion or remainder is subject to execution, the court saying that if each distributee can sell privately as much or as little of his individual interest as he chooses it is difficult to see why it may not be levied upon and sold by the sheriff.

Under the Delaware statute declaring that the acceptor or assignee of intestate lands shall take by force of the assignment in the orphan's court all the title which the intestate had at the time of his death and hold it paramount to any incumbrance created by any heir of the intestate, the interest of an heir-at-law of intestate land cannot be attached so as to prevent an assignment. State v. Huxley, 4 Harr. (Del.) 348.

And in Penn v. Spencer, 17 Gratt. 85, 91 Am. Dec. 845, it was held that the sale under execution of an unascertained interest in the estate of a deceased person is void, and that if the purchaser goes into possession thereunder he is liable to account for all rents and profits thereof while he retains possession as well as for the value of any part thereof which he may have converted, lost, or destroyed.

In Thomas v. Simpson, 3 Pa. 60, it was held that where property is devised to descend in the manner directed by law, the interest of the widow of the testator is subject to execution in proceedings against her whether regarded as a right of dower under the Pennsylvania statute or as that of a devisee.

Where lands are devised to be sold and the moneys realized paid over to legatees they are not subject to attachment or execution against a legatee, even though at the death of the testator the legal title descended to him, it being held in trust for the purpose of the sale and distribution. Baker v. Copenbarger, 15 Ill. 108, 58 Am. Dec. 600; Hess v. Shorb, 7 Pa. 231.

Or at least not until the happening of the event upon which the power to sell depends. Hess v. Shorb, supra.

Thus a devise of an estate in the course of administration given to executors to sell whenever they deemed it best and after certain specific bequests giving the residue to trustees to be used for the maintenance of the devisee with others and 38 L. R. A.

paid over upon certain conditions upon his arriving at the age of twenty-five years, has no interest in the lands subject to attachment. Wilkinson v. Severance, 80 Iowa, 438.

So in Ricketson v. Merrill, 148 Mass. 76, it was held that a will giving real estate to executors to sell a part of which was to be held for ten years if a designated price could not be sooner obtained, directing the payment of the proceeds to the children of the testator in such manner as to equalize the amount received by each taking into consideration advances previously made, gives a child no right in the property as such, which is attachable.

And in Hiscock v. Fulton, 17 N. Y. Supp. 406, it was held that one to whom a legacy is given under a will devising all the testator's real estate to other persons has no interest in such real estate which is subject to execution until the legacy is declared a charge thereon by the court in a proper proceeding even though the personal property left by the testator was insufficient to discharge it.

In Eneberg v. Carter, 98 Mo. 647, the rule was laid down that where there are no words in a will which will raise a fee in a devisee, either expressly or by strong implication, the fee remains in the heirs-at-law by virtue of the statute of descent until it shall be divested by sale according to law and in accordance with the terms of the will and until such time the heirs have an interest therein which is subject to sale under execution. But where a clause of the will operates by its own force and without action on the part of the executor to convert the land of the testator into money, the land is not affected by a judgment against a devisee who will become entitled to the proceeds thereof when they shall be sold as directed by the will.

Though there is a power of sale, if no imperative duty to sell is imposed there is no equitable conversion of the land into money. Haward v. Peavey, 123 Ill. 490.

In Morrow v. Brenizer, 2 Rawle, 186, it was held that where real estate is directed to be sold by executors after the decease of testator's wife, and the proceeds divided among his children, a sale of a share of the real estate under execution against one of the children passes no interest to the purchaser though the will empowers the executors to rent the premises if they cannot sell.

But in Brett v. Williamson, 12 Lea, 639, it was held that a devise of land to testator's wife, directing that upon her death or marriage it be sold and the proceeds divided between certain sons and a grandson, gives the grandson an interest therein which is subject to execution and a purchaser at an execution sale made before the death or marin the terms of the statute. A contingent remainder limited to an uncertain person is not an "interest in or right to" land.

Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450; Watson v. Dodd, 63 N. C. 530.

The so-called interest of T. W. Young was just the same as that of his brother, R. W. Young, Jr., derived from the same source, and, in fact and in law, was no interest at all, but a bare possibility uncoupled with an interest and incapable of being passed by any conveyance.

Jackson v. Waldron, 18 Wend. 178; Pike v. Galvin, 29 Me. 183; 4 Kent, Com. 259; 1 Lomax, Dig. 601; Watson v. Dodd, supra; Burns v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 43.

There is nothing in the terms of this deed to create an estoppel.

Jones v. Sasser, 18 N. C. 464.

Where one conveys only his right, title, and interest in and to a piece of property, in which he has no assignable interest or title, with general warranty, without making any recital or averment of particular ownership or estate in such property, than the warranty, it does not estop the grantor from setting up an after-acquired title.

Blanchard v. Brooks, 12 Pick. 47; Comstock v. Smith, 13 Pick. 116, 23 Am. Dec. 670; White v. Brocas, 14 Ohio St. 343; Adams v. Ross, 80 N. J. L. 509, 52 Am. Dec. 237; Hanrick v. Patrick, 119 U. S. 156, 30 L. ed. 896; Rawle, Covenants for Title, 895, 420.

Mr. John Johns also for appellants.

Mr. J. F. Crocker, for appellee:

The facts in proof on the hearing of the attachment are not made a part of the record of said proceedings, and there cannot be a presumption that anything was lacking in the proof to justify the judgment of the court. If riage of testator's wife will take the grandson's share as against other creditors seeking to appropriate it at the time of the distribution. In this case, however, the heir had furnished the boundaries of the land levied upon, waived notice of sale, and stipulated for time within which to redeem his interest, all for the purpose of having his interest in the land applied in satisfaction of the execution, and the court treated these acts as a stipulation that his interest might be sold, the case turning upon that point.

See also Lewitt v. Durant, 78 Mich. 185, in which the question whether a will devising a life estate to testator's widow and giving specific legacies to children, charging them upon the real estate and making them payable out of the proceeds thereof upon final disposition after the termination of the life estate, creates an interest in the legacies which is subject to execution, was raised but not decided, the case going off on other points.

Under a statute authorizing the attachment of rights and credits, lands and tenements, etc., a legacy charged upon real estate may be attached in the hands of the devisee of the real estate for a debt of the legatee. Woodward v. Woodward, 9 N. J. L. 145, 17 Am. Dec. 462.

Reversions, remainders, and executory devises.

A vested remainder in fee may be taken in execution and sold by virtue thereof under a judgment against the remainderman. Den v. Hillman, 7 N. J. L. 213; Wilkinson v. Chew, 54 Ga. 602.

Thus in Wiley v. Bridgman, 1 Head, 63, a bill in chancery framed to reach a remainder or reversionary interest in real property was dismissed upon demurrer upon the ground that such interest can be sold under execution and that therefore an adequate remedy at law existed.

So a devise of land to the testator's mother for life, remainder to be equally divided among her children in fee simple, vests an estate in such children which may be seized under execution during the lifetime of the mother. Davis v. Go-forth, 1 Lea. 31.

And where property is left by will to certain persons for life, the remainder to revert to the estate, the persons entitled to the estate take a vested remainder which is subject to levy and sale under attachment before the death of the tenant for life. Shipp v. Gibbs, 33 Ga. 184.

Likewise a vested remainder in tail may be taken in execution and sold by the sheriff. Humphreys v. Humphreys, 2 Dall. 223.

So also a reversion in fee after a term of years is a subject of execution, and a sheriff's deed there- 23 L. R. A.

under is as effectual to pass title as would be that of the reversioner himself. Murrell v. Roberts, 33 N. C. 424, 53 Am. Dec. 419.

And an heir having a reversionary interest in lands after the death of a life tenant has a vested interest which may be taken on execution though the life estate has not terminated. Wilkinson v. Chew, 54 Ga. 602.

And such an interest may be seized and sold under execution though the reversion is contingent upon the happening of events, which may never occur, and though the extent of interest cannot be ascertained. Woodgate v. Fleet, 44 N. Y. 1.

So one who takes an executory devise defeasible upon the contingency of his dying without issue living at the time of his decease, takes a vested estate in fee or in tail defeasible upon a contingency which is subject to execution and may be taken and held by the creditor and his assigns, until the happening of the contingency. Phillips v. Rogers, 12 Met. 405.

In DeHaas v. Bunn, 2 Pa. 335, 44 Am. Dec. 201, it was held that a devise by a testator to his daughter for life and after her death to such child or children, as she now has or may have in fee, and if she die without issue then over to her son, creates an interest in the executory devise, subject to execution during the lifetime of the daughter though his estate is liable to be terminated by her death leaving issue.

Contingent remainders, however, in which the persons who are to take cannot be identified until the termination of a particular estate, cannot be taken and sold on execution against any of the persons who may be entitled thereto. Haward v. Peavey, 123 Ill. 430; Ducker v. Burnham, 146 Ill. 9; Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 450.

In Ducker v. Burnham, supra, the court distinguished between a vested remainder which can be taken on execution and a contingent one which cannot be taken by defining a vested remainder to be one in which the estate is fixed to remain to a determinate person after the particular estate is spent, and a contingent remainder to be one in which the estate in remainder is limited to take effect either to a dubious or uncertain person or upon a dubious or uncertain event, and the same distinction is substantially made in Roundtree v. Roundtree, supra.

A person in being who will have an immediate right of possession of lands upon the death or marriage of another, has a vested remainder which may be taken under execution before the happening of the event which will give him the right of possession. Kelly v. Morgan, 3 Yerg. 437.

But if the remainderman must survive the first taker to be entitled to take, the remainder is con-it could be made to appear that there was nothing before the court on the matter of what was the interest of the then defendant in the said real estate than the will of Tapley Webb, the question would then have arisen for the adjudication of the court whether that interest was or was not a contingent remainder, and if yea, was a contingent remainder attachable? If the court be taken to have held that a contingent remainder was attachable, it was not without precedents and authority for so holding. Admit that the court was in error in so holding, can such error be impeached or corrected or even inquired into in this suit? This is a collateral impeachment of said judgment. Proceedings of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person cannot be impeached collaterally on account of mere error.

Gray v. Stuart, 33 Gratt. 357.

There is a manifest distinction between an erroneous judgment and a void judgment. The first is a valid judgment, though erroneous until reversed, provided it is a court of competent jurisdiction. The latter is no judgment at all. It is a mere nullity. The first cannot be assailed in any other court but an appellate court. The latter may be assailed in any court, anywhere whenever any claim is made or rights asserted under it.

Ibid.; Lancaster v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 637.

The court of hustings for the city of Portsmouth, in which the judgment was rendered, is a court of general jurisdiction. It has jurisdiction of actions of debts and of attachments, and it therefore had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said suit and attachment and it acquired jurisdiction of the defendant, R. W. Young, Jr., by an order of publication.

Wilcher v. Robertson, 78 Va. 803; Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh, 181, 38 Am. Dec. 237; Prigg v. Adams, 2 Salk. 674; Cox v. Thomas, 9 Gratt.

tingent within these rules. Roundtree v. Roundtree, supra.

Though a power of sale in the life tenant does not make the remainder a contingent one. Ducker v. Burnham, supra.

Thus a devise to a wife for life with remainder to certain named children with a subsequent provision that if any of the children die before the wife the property is to be equally divided among the survivors, creates a vested remainder subject to execution; but where the devise is to the wife for life and at her death to such of the children as shall then be living, the intent which is controlling is that the remainder shall not vest until the death of the wife, the children taking as survivors of the wife, though in the absence of anything showing such intent words of postponement will be presumed to relate to the enjoyment of the estate and not to the vesting thereof. Ibid.

So a conveyance of real estate to the use of a husband and wife for their joint lives, then to his use during life and after his death to their children, creates an estate in the husband and wife for their joint lives which is not subject to execution for his debts, but his life estate based upon the contingency of his survivorship is subject to seizure and sale under execution against him. Roanes v. Archer, 4 Leigh, 550.

Likewise where a devise is to such of several persons as shall be alive at the termination of the particular estate until that time the lands cannot be taken and sold on execution against any of such persons, their interests being nothing but contingent remainders not subject to levy and sale. Haward v. Peavey, 128 Ill. 420.

So also a will creating spendthrift trusts for the benefit of the testator's children and grandchildren providing that either at the death of the last survivor of such children and grandchildren, who may be living at the time of his death or at the expiration of twenty-one years from his own death, whichever event should first happen, the estate should vest in the persons entitled to the income for distribution, leaves it uncertain as to who will be the recipient of the estate at the time of distribution, and the interest in the estate thereby created is therefore contingent and not subject to seizure on an execution attachment. Patterson v. Caldwell, 124 Pa. 455.

In Jackson v. Middleton, 52 Barb. 9, which was a case of a grant made to one for life and after his death to his heirs and assigns forever, it was held that the contingent remainder thereby created was not subject to levy and sale upon execution under a statute charging judgments upon lands, tenements, real estate, and chattels real, and directing the sale of such estates by the sheriffs.

In Moore v. Littell, 41 N. Y. 66, however, which was a case arising upon the same grant as that set forth in Jackson v. Middleton, supra, it was held that the remainder though liable to open and let in afterborn children and subject to be defeated as to any particular charge by his death before that of his father, is a vested and not a contingent remainder. (Justices Grover, Daniel, and Hunt dissenting.)

So in Sheridan v. House, 4 Abb. App. Dec. 218, 4 Keyes, 593, which case also arose upon the grant set forth in Jackson v. Middleton, supra, it was held that where lands are conveyed to one for life and after his death to his heirs and assigns forever, the heirs have a vested estate in the remainder which is subject to execution, and it is not made contingent by its liability to be defeated or modified by the death of any of the children, who are to take the remainder, or the birth of other children during the lifetime of the life tenant.

A devise to testator's widow during life or widowhood and after her death or marriage to another in fee creates a vested remainder in fee in the latter which may be levied upon and sold under execution for his debts during the continuance of the life estate. Harrison v. Maxwell, 2 Nott & McQ. 347, 10 Am. Dec. 611.

But where lands are devised to one for life and at his death to such of his children as might be then living and the issue of such as have died leaving issue, and if such life tenant should die leaving no issue living at his death, then to a third person in fee, the contingent interest of such third person cannot be taken and sold on execution against him while the life tenant remains unmarried and without children, the court saying that contingent remainders, conditional limitations, and executory devises are not assignable at law and therefore cannot be sold under execution. Watson v. Dodd, 68 N. C. 523.

Where lands are devised to testator's wife till their youngest child becomes of age, remainder to the two sons, charged with legacies to be paid to the daughters, and in case of the death of either son without issue, to the other in fee, and one of the sons dies, the interest of the other including that which came to him through the death of his brother, is subject to execution though the estate of the brother has not terminated. Drake v. Brown, 68 Pa. 223.

So in White v. McPheeters, 75 Mo. 203, it was held that where lands are conveyed in trust for the use of a married woman during her natural life remainder 328; Cline v. Catron, 22 Gratt. 894; Lancaster v. Wilson, 27 Gratt. 680; Burniers v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 64; Neale v. Utz, 75 Va. 480.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565, does not rule this case.

The decisions of the United States Supreme Court are not binding on the state courts except in cases involving a federal question. When the United States court comes to pass on the validity of a judgment of a state court, it applies to it the same rule that is applied when the courts of one state come to judge of the validity of the judgments of the courts of another state. No judgment in personam is binding unless the defendant has been served with process or voluntarily appeared in the suit; and that the record of the judgment may be contradicted as to the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction against its recital of their existence. This rule is very different from the rule of a state court in judging of the validity of a judgment of its own state courts.

Bowler v. Huston, 30 Gratt. 266, 33 Am. Rep. 678, announces and applies in the strongest terms this international rule. Our state court has adopted very different principles than those declared by the court in Pennoyer v. Neff, supra; Williamson v. Gayle, 7 Gratt. 152; Schofield v. Cox, 8 Gratt. 528; Fisher v. March, 26 Gratt. 776.

Under these cases not only may a personal judgment be entered against the nonresident defendant, but that judgment creates a lien on the real estate.

T. W. Young conveyed with general warranty, "all his interest being that of one of the children of Ann P. Young" in the property ... question.

It is immaterial whether he then had such interest or not or any title to it or not. He is now entitled and his covenant estops him from denying that he was entitled; his deed was an affirmation that he was entitled, and he is not now allowed to say he was not entitled.

in fee simple in trust for her husband should he survive her, the trustee covenanting to convey to the survivor, and to convey to any person designated by them upon their joint request, the remainder is subject to execution under a statute making all real estate of which the defendant is seized whether in law or in equity subject thereto whether it is a vested or a contingent remainder, the court not deeming it necessary to decide which it was.

A statute providing that the creditor may levy his execution upon the real estate of the debtor, authorizes a levy upon every species of estate in land, a vested remainder or reversion falling within the meaning of the term. Williams v. Amory, 14 Mass. 20.

And an estate in remainder in real estate is property within a statute making "property debts and other effects subject to execution." Lockwood v. Nye, 2 Swan, 515, 58 Am. Dec. 73.

And it is within a provision subjecting houses, lands, and other hereditaments and real estate to execution for the payment of debts. Harrison v. Maxwell, 1 Nott & McC. 847, 10 Am. Dec. 611.

Under the Missouri statute providing that all real estate whereof a defendant is seized either in law or in equity shall be subject to seizure and sale under execution, contingent as well as vested remainders are subject thereto. White v. McPheeters, supra.

In Kissom v. Nelson, 2 Helsk. 4, it was held that a remainder must be levied on and sold as such, and that it will not pass by a levy made in general terms.

But in Atkins v. Bean, 14 Mass. 404, in which an execution was extended upon an undivided seventh part of a remainder in fee when the judgment debtor owned but nine sixty-fourths of it, the court held that this was sufficient to pass the judgment debtor's title.

Right of dower.

The mere right of a widow to have dower assigned to her in the lands of her husband before actual assignment cannot be taken on execution under a judgment against her for her debts. Nason v. Allen, 5 Me. 479; Pennington v. Yell, 11 Ark. 212, 68 Am. Dec. 262; Graham v. Moore, 5 Harr. (Del.) 218; Blain v. Harrison, 11 Ill. 384; Summer v. Babb, 13 Ill. 488; Newman v. Willetts, 48 Ill. 534; Petty v. Malier, 15 B. Mon. 591; Gooch v. Atkins, 14 Mass. 378; Torrey v. Minor, 1 Smedes & M. 489; Wallis v. Doe, 2 Smedes & M. 220; Ligon v. Spencer, 58 Miss. 37; Tompkins v. Fonda, 4 Paige, 448, 3 L. ed. 510; Waller v. Mardus, 29 Mo. 25.

33 L. R. A.

Previous to its assignment a dower right is not an estate of freehold subject to execution. Tompkins v. Fonda, supra.

It is a mere potential interest amounting to nothing more than a chose in action. Pennington v. Yell, Torrey v. Minor, and Waller v. Mardus, supra.

Thus where a widow remarries and her unassigned dower in the lands of her former husband is seized and sold under execution for a debt of the subsequent husband, the purchaser cannot be regarded as a creditor and be substituted in the place of the plaintiff in the execution. Waller v. Mardus, supra.

A right of dower creates no seisin in the widow which can be attached or taken on execution by the widow's creditors until it has been assigned to her even though she be in actual possession with the acquiescence of the persons in interest. McMahon v. Gray, 5 L. R. A. 748, 180 Mass. 229.

And the fact that a widow is in possession of the mansion house of her husband before dower is assigned, does not subject the right to seizure and sale under execution, its possession being only in quarantine. Shields v. Batts, 5 J. J. Marsh. 12.

Nor will a statute providing that lands may be taken on execution after the expiration of eighteen months after the owner's death making no reservation of the right of dower interfere with the widow's right to remain in the mansion house of her deceased husband. Stokes v. McAllister, 2 Mo. 163.

The interest of a widow under the Pennsylvania act providing for partition among children and that her portion shall remain charged upon the land and be recoverable in like manner as rents, is in the nature of a rent charge, and it may be seized and sold under execution when sufficient personalty cannot be found under the Pennsylvania statute authorizing the seizure and sale of "all lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatsoever." The point was decided upon an objection to evidence of a sale and deed under execution. Shaupe v. Shaupe, 12 Serg. & R. 2; Thomas v. Simpson, 3 Pa. 60.

And in Pitts v. Hendrix, 6 Ga. 453, it was held (citing Thomas v. Simpson, supra) that when a wife remains in possession of her husband's lands after his death, her possession is such an interest in the lands as may be seized and sold under execution.

The common-law doctrine that a right of dower before assignment is not subject to execution is not changed by a statute giving married women one-third part for life of all the lands of which their husbands died seized and authorizing them to retain possession of the plantation dwelling house of the deceased husband until dower is assigned. Ligon v. Spencer, 58 Miss. 87.

Peoples, 80 Va. 855; Burners v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 42; Dorrell v. Buchanan, 8 Leigh, 384, 23 Am. Dec. 280.

If the seisin or possession of a particular estate is affirmed in the deed, either in express terms or by necessary implication, the grantor and all persons in privity with him shall be estopped from ever afterwards denying that he was so seised and possessed at the time he made the conveyance. The estoppel works upon the estate and binds an after-acquired title as between parties and privies.

Tenancy by curtesy initiate.

Where a wife acquires or owns a freehold estate and issue is born alike capable of inheriting, the husband becomes a tenant by the curtesy initiate, and has an estate in such freehold which may be seised and sold under execution for the payment of judgments against him. National Metropolitan Bank of Washington v. Hitz, 1 Mackey, 111; Manley v. Bonham, 53 Ark. 354; Shortall v. Hinckley, 31 Ill. 219; Day v. Cochran, 24 Miss. 261; Schermerhorn v. Miller, 3 Cow. 439; Canby v. Porter, 13 Ohio, 79; Mattooks v. Stearns, 9 Vt. 323.

The interest of one who is in possession of premises by virtue of a conveyance thereof in fee to his wife within rules relating to attachment and execution is a freehold estate during their joint lives, and a freehold in remainder to himself for life as tenant by the curtesy. Canby v. Porter, supra. To the same effect, Brown v. Gale, 5 N. H. 417.

And the life estate of the husband together with the wife's remainder constitutes the entire estate in or title to the property. Shortall v. Hinckley, supra.

The rule would be the same where the levy is made before the death of the wife, where the curtesy is initiate, as where made after it becomes consummate by her death; the estate when initiate is the husband's freehold, and when consummate it can be nothing more. Re Winne, 1 Lans. 514. This statement which was not necessary to the decision was made in case a holding that the husband's common-law estate by the curtesy is abolished in New York in all the wife's property affected by the Married Women's Act of 1848, 1849.

Where one of the heirs of an intestate is a married woman her husband has an interest vesting at the instant of the death of the intestate even though no settlement of the estate has been made, which may be attached or taken on execution for his debts. Hyde v. Barney, 17 Vt. 280, 44 Am. Dec. 335.

And when a husband and wife are seised of a remainder in fee in her right he has a present vested interest against which an execution against him may be extended. Brown v. Gale, 5 N. H. 416.

In Gentry v. Wagstaff, 14 N. C. 270, however, it was held that the husband acquires no interest in a vested remainder belonging to his wife, and a sale thereof upon execution against the husband passes nothing to the purchaser, the court adopting the rule that a husband can acquire no interest in 28 L. R. A.

Any conveyance by matter of record or by deed indented, of an executory or contingent interest will work an estoppel. Estoppels exist when no interest passes from the party.

1 Lomax, Dig. 602; 4 Kent, Com. 260, 261.

The provisions of the code relative to the effect of deeds are broad enough to include the conveyance of pretended titles to land.

Middleton v. Arnolds, 18 Gratt. 489; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 10406.

Hinton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

By his will, which was probated in February, 1886, one Tapley Webb, of the city of Portsmouth, devised the two lots of land, with the buildings thereon, in the proceedings mentioned, to his daughter Ann Porter Young, for life, with remainders in fee to such of her issue as might be living at her death. On the 5th day of November, 1884, Mrs. Young died, the estate of his wife of which he is not actually seised. But in this case there had been no living issue and therefore the tenancy was not by the curtesy initiate.

The levy of an execution against a husband upon his wife's land will pass his interest in the land whatever it may be or however it may have been derived, though the return does not show whether he is entitled to curtesy or not, or describe the land as being held in the right of the wife. Litchfield v. Cudworth, 15 Pick. 23.

And the extent of an execution upon lands as those of the debtor owned in fee when in fact he was a tenant by curtesy initiate vests in the creditor a freehold estate for the life of the debtor. Mechanics Bank in Newburyport v. Williams, 17 Pick. 438.

The moment the wife acquires title to land the rights of the husband therein are perfected and the liability of his interest to execution for his debts attaches, and is not affected by the subsequent enactment of statutes securing to married women their rights to property. Beale v. Knowles, 45 Me. 479; McLellan v. Nelson, 27 Me. 129; Meyers v. Gale, 45 Mo. 416; Harvey v. Wickham, 23 Mo. 112; Cunningham v. Gray, 20 Mo. 170.

Where estate by the curtesy vests before the passage of an act changing the common law with reference to what property is subject to execution, the estate is liable whether the credit was given before or after the passage of the law. National Metropolitan Bank of Washington v. Hitz, 1 Mackey, 112.

The Connecticut statute providing that the interest of a married man in the real estate of his wife shall not be taken by attachment or execution, however with a proviso that the act shall not affect suits then pending, exempts any suit then pending and the judgment therein rendered, from the operation of the act so that an attachment creditor whose suit was pending at the time of the enactment of the statute may, after the lien of his attachment has expired, levy his execution upon the husband's interest in the wife's real estate. Johnston v. Chapman, 35 Conn. 550.

A statute providing that the separate property of a wife shall not be liable for her husband's debts does not exempt his estate by the curtesy from liability to levy and sale for his debts. Uhler v. Adam, 1 D. C. App. 302.

And the effect of an act providing that no real estate acquired by marriage shall be liable to execution during the life of the wife for the debts of the husband, is not to destroy the right of curtesy but merely to suspend the right of execution on leaving the following issue: Robert W. Young, Jr., Tapley W. Young, Anna Virginia d'Abbadie, and Nathaniel F. Young; and upon her death the remainders, which had theretofore been contingent, became vested. In June, 1886, this suit was instituted. In their bill the plaintiffs, who are the above-named remaindermen, ask for a partition of the property, which they allege is free from incumbrance, although they say that they are informed that the interest of Robert W. Young, Jr., is claimed to be affected and charged with a judgment recovered against him at the April term, 1874, of the hustings court of Portsmouth, in an action brought by his uncle N. P. Young, but that said judgment is void, the said court having had no jurisdiction to render it; and that the interest of said Tapley W. Young is claimed to be affected and charged with a deed of trust made by said Tapley W. Young to R. V. Boykin, trustee, in whose place and stead R. C. Marshall has been substituted, but the said deed of trust constitutes no charge upon the said interest of said Tapley W. Young, and is of no effect. And, after making some other allegations not material to these proceedings, the bill prays that N. P. Young, Nathaniel F. Young, and R. C. Marshall, trustee, be made defendants, and required to answer the same. That partition be made of the said real estate, or that the same be sold, and the proceeds divided. And that the cause be referred to one of the commissioners of the court to take and report, among others, the following accounts: (1) An account of all liens and charges against the interest of said Tapley W. Young, and the priorities thereof; (2) an account of all liens and charges against the interest of Robert W. Young, Jr., and the priorities thereof. That a decree be entered determining the validity and priority of all liens existing, or claimed to exist, against the said property, or the interest of either party therein, and that an injunction be awarded, restraining said R. C. Marshall, trustee, and N. P. Young, from making any sale under said deed of trust. The commissioner reported that the judgment constituted no lien or charge on the interest of R. W. Young, Jr., and that the deed of trust executed by T. W. Young to R. V. Boykin, trustee, dated the 3d of February, 1858, was a valid lien on the one fourth interest of T. W. Young in said property. The first of these reports was duly excepted to by N. P. Young, and was excepted to by the said Tapley W. Young. At the hearing the court entered a decree sus-

the part of the husband's creditors during the life of the wife. Rice v. Hoffman, 35 Md. 344; Schindel v. Schindel, 15 Md. 290; Logan v. McGill, 8 Md. 481; Anderson v. Tydings, 1d. 427, 68 Am. Dec. 708; White v. Dorris, 35 Mo. 181.

Under the Rhode Island statute providing that the real estate, chattels real, etc., of a married woman shall be so secured to her sole and separate use that the same and the rents, profits, and income thereof shall not be liable to be attached or in any way taken for the debts of her husband, a tenancy by the curtesy initiate is not subject to attachment for the husband's debts. Greenwich Nat. Bank v. Hall, 11 R. I. 124.

So a statute providing that the real estate of a married woman shall not be liable for the debts of her husband, but shall be deemed and taken to be her separate property, protects her property from sale on execution for his debts but does not impair his rights therein. Junction R. Co. v. Harris, 9 Ind. 154, 68 Am. Dec. 618.

The North Carolina statute providing that no interest of the husband in the real estate of his wife shall be subject to sale to satisfy any execution obtained against him is designed to preserve the rights of the wife during her life, but it leaves the interest of a tenant by the curtesy consummate by the death of the wife subject to execution. McCaull v. McCormac, 99 N. C. 548.

Under the New York Statutes of 1848 and 1849 vesting in the wife the legal title to the rents, issues, and profits of her real estate as against her husband and his creditors, if the title is in her, it cannot be seized to satisfy his debts without proof that her title is fraudulent as against his creditors. Gage v. Dauchy, 34 N. Y. 238.

The levy of an execution against a husband upon his life estate in the lands of his wife is not defeated under the Maine Statute of 1874, providing that a married woman may become seised of property in her own right providing it be made to appear that it did not in any way come from her husband after coverture, unless she affirmatively proves that the property levied upon did not thus come to her. Eldridge v. Preble, 34 Me. 148.

The Pennsylvania rule adopted under the orphans' court act, however, that a life estate is not 28 L. R. A.

subject to levy and sale under execution, protects a husband's estate in the lands of his wife as tenant by the curtesy initiate from such seizure and sale. Snively v. Wagner, 3 Pa. 275, 45 Am. Rep. 640; Kints v. Long, 30 Pa. 501; Parget v. Stambaugh, 2 Pa. 486; Gorlion v. Lughram, 1 Grant, Cas. 158.

But where the estate of the wife has been converted into money by a partition between the heirs of the one from whom it descended, the execution creditor is entitled to possession of the fund in the hands of the husband and to take the produce thereof during his life, giving such security for its restoration to the wife at his death as the court may direct. Lancaster County Bank v. Stauffer, 10 Pa. 398.

A decree of divorce a vinculo upon suit of the wife of a judgment debtor, though rendered in another state, determines the right of the judgment creditor who had levied his execution upon the rents and profits of lands held by the judgment debtor in the right of his wife as her dower in the estate of her former husband. Barber v. Root, 10 Mass. 260.

And where a decree of divorce a mensa et thoro is rendered against a husband, his creditors cannot seize the wife's separate property under execution upon judgments rendered against him before the divorce but upon which the executions were issued afterwards, where the wife's separate property is ordered to be applied to the support and maintenance of herself and children. Haviland v. Bloom, 6 Johns. Ch. 178, 2 L. ed. 92.

A husband's life estate in his wife's lands may be taken under execution either by taking the rents and profits for a definite period or by taking the whole life estate at an appraisal founded on a proper estimate of the probability of human life. Litchfield v. Cudworth, 15 Pick. 23.

And an execution against the estate of a tenant by the curtesy may be extended upon the land either by metes and bounds or on the rents and profits. Roberts v. Whiting, 16 Mass. 186.

In Mattocks v. Stearns, 9 Vt. 326, it was said that the mode of levy upon the estate of a husband who holds by tenancy by the curtesy initiate should be by metes and bounds exhausting his interest as far as the levy extends. F. H. B.

taining the exception of R. W. Young, and holding the judgment a lien upon the one-fourth interest of the said R. W. Young, Jr., and the deed of trust a lien upon the one-fourth interest of said Tapley W. Young, and from this decree this appeal is taken.

Upon a careful consideration of the case, the court is of opinion that the corporation court of Norfolk, to which the said suit was transferred, clearly erred in holding the judgment a valid lien upon the interest of R. W. Young in said property, for the reason that the court never had jurisdiction of the case. The proceedings were, as the record shows, commenced by attachment sued out on the 31st October, 1878, long before the death of said Ann P. Young, before the remainder of R. W. Young had become vested, and while he had no interest in said property which could be subjected to a lien of attachment. In the opinion of this court, the words "estate or debts" due him "within the county or corporation in which the suit is," in section 1, chap. 148, Code 1878, were not intended to apply to a mere possibility, such as the said R. W. Young had at the time the said attachment was sued out; and as he was a nonresident, and the court never acquired jurisdiction of his person, there was no foundation for the judgment, and the same is absolutely null and void.

We think, however, that the court was clearly right in holding the deed of trust to be a lien upon the one-fourth interest of Tapley W. Young, although the deed was made before the said Tapley W. Young had acquired a vested interest in the property. At common law, it is true, a naked possibility, such as this remainder (which was uncertain as to the person) was, could not be the subject of assignment or conveyance. But "this matter," as Mr. Miner expresses it, is assisted in Virginia by statute, which provides that any interest or claim to real estate may be disposed of by deed or will. 2 Miner, Inst. 862; Code, § 2418. "The effect of this enactment," as was said by the supreme court of Kentucky in Nuttall v. Russell, 8 Met. (Ky.) 168, "is to obviate at once all the difficulties growing out of the distinctions which had been established by judicial construction between such estates as were alienable, and such as were not. It will not be doubted, we suppose, that under this statute every conceivable interest in or claim to real estate, whether present or future, vested or contingent, and however acquired, may be disposed of by deed or will. Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. 674, 98 Am. Dec. 698. But if this were otherwise it would operate, as we think, as an estoppel. Burners v. Keran, 24 Gratt. 42; Raines v. Walker, 77 Va. 92; Gregory v. Peoples, 80 Va. 355; Watson v. Dodd, 68 N. C. 528. For these reasons the decree of the corporation court of Norfolk must be reversed in the particular indicated, and the cause must be remanded to be proceeded with in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

Patrick W. O'CONNOR, Pff. in Err.,

v.

Fred WALTER.

(.....Neb.....)

*1. Where there were due a resident of Nebraska, from a railroad company operating a line of railroad through Iowa and Nebraska, wages, which, in Nebraska, were exempt from execution and attachment process, but which, nevertheless, by means of an assignment of the claim against the party entitled to such exemption to a resident of Iowa, were procured, by the garnishment of said railroad company in Iowa, to be applied to the payment of said claim, the assignor of such claim is liable to such debtor for the amount so appropriated without his consent.

*2. As between said assignor and the party entitled to the benefits of such exemption in Nebraska, the proceedings in Iowa were in no sense res judicata.

(July 29, 1898.)

*Headnotes by RYAN, C.

NOTE.—On the subject of the protection of non-residents against garnishment proceedings the above case strengthens the authorities which deny the power of court to take away the chose in action of a nonresident who is out of the jurisdiction by garnishing the debtor. See, on this subject, Missouri, 23 L. R. A.

ERROR to the District Court for Lancaster County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount of wages, exemption of which plaintiff had been deprived of by reason of garnishment proceedings in another state by an assignee of defendant, to whom plaintiff owed a certain debt. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Sawyer & Snell, for plaintiff in error:

Can a resident of this state sue another in the courts of a sister state and by garnishment there appropriate certain of the debtor's property to the payment of his claim which by the laws of this state is exempt?

Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 19 Neb. 175, 56 Am. Rep. 747, held that where a debt is contracted in another state, by whose laws it is exempt, the exemption shall continue in this state in case an action is brought on the claim. The courts of Iowa have uniformly held the contrary.

Walter waived his right of exemption to his wages garnished in Iowa.

ri Pac. R. Co. v. Sharitt (Kan.) 8 L. R. A. 385; and Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Smith (Miss.) 19 L. R. A. 577, and note; also the more recent cases of Neufelder v. German American Ins. Co. (Wash.) 23 L. R. A. 287; Bragg v. Gaynor (Wia.) 21 L. R. A. 161, and Douglas v. Phenix Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 20 L. R. A. 118.

A debtor may enjoin his creditor from sending his claim into another jurisdiction for the purpose of evading the exemption law of the state where they reside and from collecting the claim from property exempted by the laws of the home state.

Snook v. Snetser, 25 Ohio St. 516; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 589.

He had his remedy by injunction if O'Connor was using West as a figurehead by which to subject wages exempt in this state to the payment of his debt.

If Walter prevails it would amount to an annulling of the Iowa judgment.

Moore v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 43 Iowa, 388; Thompson, Homesteads & Exemptions, § 28.

Mr. A. G. Greenlee, for defendant in error:

The laborer has his remedy by action against the original creditor if the latter assigned his claim for the purpose of bringing suit in Iowa, and for the purpose of evading the exemption laws of Nebraska.

Abrecht v. Treitschke, 17 Neb. 205; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Moore, 31 Neb. 629.

The garnishment proceedings in Council Bluffs in the case of West v. Walter in the justice court of N. Schurz are not entitled to any more faith and credit than the garnishment proceedings in Omaha in the justice court of Charles Brandes in the case of Abrecht v. Treitschke.

Cooley, Const. Lim. ed. 1890, p. 185.

Ryan, J., filed the following opinion:

The petition of Fred Walter, plaintiff, alleged, as against Patrick W. O'Connor, as defendant, that for a long time prior to the 5th day of March, 1889, the said plaintiff was, and ever since had been, a married man, the head of a family, and a resident of Cass County, Nebraska, and that during the whole of said time the said plaintiff had lived with and provided for his family, by day labor, in the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company, and that said plaintiff's sole income and means of support for himself and his family were the wages by plaintiff earned in said employment; that on March 5, 1889, one D. M. West filed a petition in the court of N. Schurz, a justice of the peace in the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, claiming to be the assignee of said O'Connor of a claim against plaintiff for the sum of $18.50 and costs; that said West caused the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company to be garnished and requiring said railroad company to answer as to the indebtedness of the said company to plaintiff; that on March 11, 1889, the said railroad company accordingly answered that it was indebted to said Walter in the sum of $55, whereupon said cause was continued, and service was obtained by publication upon Walter, and the day for hearing was set for May 10, 1889; that in April, 1889, the said railroad company filed an affidavit of the said Walter that he was the head of a family, and that his wages were exempt from execution, and asking that said proceedings be dissolved; that nevertheless the said justice of the peace entered judgment against plaintiff, Walter, for the sum of $18.50 damages, and 33 L. R. A.

costs taxed at $8.00, and requiring said railroad company to pay into court the sum of $32.10 out of plaintiff's wages, which said railroad company thereupon did, and that said $32.10 was deducted by said railroad company from the sum of $55 due plaintiff, and that plaintiff has never received said sum so deducted; that said sum of $55 was due plaintiff for labor performed as a brakeman by plaintiff for said railroad company within the sixty days immediately preceding said date of garnishment, and that the wages so garnished were exempt from seizure by attachment, execution, or garnishee process in this state, which facts the said West and O'Connor also well knew; that said West was not the owner of the account of the said O'Connor, if any such he had, but held it simply for collection for O'Connor, who was the real party in interest, though a pretended assignment thereof had been made by O'Connor to said West. For a second cause of action, plaintiff claimed to be entitled to $27.50 as damages indirectly resulting from said garnishment, which he alleged was simply a conspiracy between West and O'Connor to deprive plaintiff of his exemptions under the laws of Nebraska. There was an answer in denial of each of the above averments. The allegations of the petition are set out at great length, and with considerable particularity, for the reason that, with the exception of the averments in respect to the second cause of action, each allegation of said petition was, upon the trial, fully sustained by the proofs. These allegations, therefore, fairly state the facts in this case, wherefore it is needless that they be repeated. It was stipulated between the parties in the district court that, by the laws of the state of Iowa, the wages of a nonresident of that state are not exempt from attachment, execution, or garnishment. Upon a trial of the issues the jury returned a verdict in favor of Walter, against Patrick O'Connor, for $24.50, for which, with costs, judgment was duly rendered. For the reversal of this judgment, O'Connor brings this cause to this court by his petition in error, with the necessary record and bill of exceptions.

In Abrecht v. Treitschke, 17 Neb. 205, this court held that, where a judgment creditor procures the exempt wages due to a laborer to be taken by garnishee process, and applied to the payment of his judgment, a cause of action arises in favor of the judgment debtor against the creditor for the amount of such wages wrongfully appropriated, unless the right of exemption is waived by the debtor. The statute exempting from seizure by judicial process such earnings of a laboring man as have accrued within the period of sixty days immediately preceding service of garnishment process was intended for the support of the family of which such laborer is the head and stay. In extending credit, every one dealing with the head of a family must take into account this right of exemption, and, presumably, in every extension of credit, this right is recognized. It therefore in no way operates to the injury of the law-abiding creditor. The rapacity which respects neither implied contract obligations nor statutory enactments must, in damages, respond for this, as for any other act of misappropriation. From the facts
